INTRODUCTION TO VOLUMES II. AND III.

AFTER the publication of Volume II., containing Lord Grenville's correspondence from the beginning of 1791 to the end of 1794, a second inspection of the portfolios at Dropmore brought to light other papers of great interest relating to the periods embraced by Volumes I. and II. These papers are now printed as addenda to Volume III. The earliest of them are confidential letters from Pitt, Sir James Harris, and William Eden, to Grenville, and the replies of the last-named, during and after his missions to the Hague and Paris in 1787. Besides affording valuable information in regard to the internal factions of the Dutch Republic, which involved Prussia and Great Britain as supporters of the House of Orange, and France as the ally of the Burgher party or Patriots, in sharp collision and almost in war, they bring into contrast the methods and characters of Harris and Eden, representing rival schools of English diplomacy; and they show clearly the unbounded trust already reposed by Pitt in Grenville's ability and judgment, in situations of great responsibility for which previous training had not specially fitted him. While Pitt sought by negotiation to obtain the concessions required from France, the Duke of Brunswick cut the knot of the difficulty by marching into the Provinces at the head of a Prussian army, and restoring the supremacy of the Prince of Orange. In April 1788, Harris signed a treaty at the Hague renewing the political alliance that had existed between Great Britain and the Dutch Republic from the English Revolution of 1688 until 1780. In the following June, he induced the King of Prussia to join the maritime powers in forming a Triple Alliance for mutual defence and the preservation of peace. For these services George III., on Pitt's recommendation, raised him to the House of Peers as Lord Malmesbury. As appears from his letter to Grenville, dated December 27, 1787, Harris had aimed at making union between the English and Dutch nations firm and cordial by coming to an agreement in regard to conflicting claims of maritime right and commercial interest which formed a perpetual cause of dissension. "Affection," he wrote, "will follow complaisance, gentle usage, and not too rough and unqualified an exercise of our influence. The reverse of this lost us the Republic."<sup>1</sup> But the British Government demanded advantages which the Dutch would not grant. Later on, William Eden, who had been rewarded for his diplomatic labours at Paris by an Irish barony, with the title of Auckland, and succeeded Malmesbury as ambassador at the Hague, resumed the unfinished work of conciliation on which the stability of the Anglo-Dutch alliance in a great measure depended. His letters to Grenville, now Secretary of State for the Home Department, in 1790 and the earlier months of 1791, indicate clearly that although the Duke of Leeds held the office of Foreign Secretary, Grenville was Pitt's chief confidant and counsellor in matters affecting the external interests of the monarchy.

Lord Grenville's correspondence, however, for the first four months of 1791 is chiefly concerned with the business of the Home Department; the administration of Great Britain, Ireland, and the Colonies. The Quebec Government Bill, to which some reference is made, possesses historical interest as initiating the system of colonial self-government; and as affording occasion for the heated debate on the French Revolution in the course of which Burke renounced the friendship of Fox. Mr. Mitford's Bill, removing some of the disabilities of English Catholics, passed with the assent of Ministers, but forms the subject of a characteristic letter of criticism from Lord Chancellor Thurlow<sup>2</sup>. Most of the letters at this time, however, are from or to Lord Westmorland, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. They are of little value except in so far as they illustrate the system by which a narrow monopoly of power was maintained. The Lord Lieutenant set his face against an extension of the benefits of Mitford's Bill to Ireland. In several letters he complained bitterly of the political conduct of Mr. Robert Stewart, who soon rose to wider celebrity as Lord Castlereagh.<sup>3</sup> Stewart's offence seems to have been an adherence to his hustings' pledges, as a member of the Opposition in the Irish House of Commons, in spite of the fact that before his election his father had obtained an Irish peerage through the influence of Lord Camden, a member of Pitt's Cabinet. Another incident may be noticed as a curious symptom of weakness in an administration which commanded large majorities in both Houses of Parliament. The case of Mr. Bruen, who, having as Deputy Quarter-Master-General of the British army in North America defrauded Government of an enormous sum, took refuge in Ireland, purchased large estates, and set the judgment of the English Court of Exchequer at defiance, had been brought to the attention of the Cabinet by Lord Buckingham.<sup>1</sup> To protect the Crown from such depredations, Pitt, Grenville, and Lord FitzGibbon, the Irish Chancellor, drafted a Bill which, if accepted by the Irish Parliament, would put an end to the immunity Mr. Bruen enjoyed. But Lord Westmorland shrank from the responsibility of introducing the measure. Bruen had become a borough proprietor and returned himself to the House of Commons as a member of the opposition. And the Lord Lieutenant feared "the discredit of attempting to frame a law for the express purpose of catching an Irish patriot."<sup>2</sup>

Towards the end of April the king appointed Lord Grenville Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in succession to the Duke of Leeds. A brief summary of the events leading to this change will supply a key to the correspondence that followed it.

After the formation of the Triple Alliance, the earlier throes of the Great Revolution disabled France for several years from any exertion outside the sphere of domestic politics. Great Britain, however, soon found herself involved in two serious disputes; one on her own behalf with Spain; the other, chiefly on behalf of Prussia, with the Empress Catherine II. of Russia. The first found a favourable issue in a treaty signed at Madrid in August 1790 by Mr. Fitzherbert, soon afterwards created Lord St. Helens, and Count Florida Blanca, the Spanish Prime Minister. The second had less fortunate results. Catherine had entered into a compact with the Emperor Joseph II. for a partition of European Turkey. Notwithstanding the remonstrances and proffered mediation of the Triple Alliance, the Austrian and Russian armies wrested several provinces from the Sultan in the campaigns of 1788 and 1789. Frederick William II., King of Prussia, however, was determined not to suffer the aggrandizement of his powerful neighbours unless fully compensated by an equivalent addition to his own territory. Taking advantage of the troubles which misgovernment had excited throughout the Austrian monarchy, he placed his army on an offensive footing, concluded alliances with Turkey and Poland, and summoned the Emperor to abandon his conquests on pain of war. During this crisis Joseph died. His brother and successor Leopold, accepting the mediation of the Maritime Powers, undertook, by a convention signed at Reichenbach in July 1790, to discontinue hostilities against Turkey and accept the status quo in regard to territory as a basis of negotiation for peace. By another convention, signed at the Hague in October 1790, Great Britain and the Dutch Republic guaranteed the Emperor's dominion over the revolted Netherlands, on condition of his restoring their ancient constitutions. Catherine, having lost her ally, also signified her intention to make peace with the Sultan, restoring all her recent acquisitions, with the exception of the fortress of Ockzakow and a narrow strip of land lying between the rivers Bug and Dniester. Lord Auckland, in letters to Pitt and Grenville, which conveyed the views of the Dutch Government as well as his own, contended that the cession demanded by the Empress was too unimportant even to Turkey to justify a prolongation, much less an extension, of the war.<sup>1</sup> The King of Prussia, however, having failed to effect an arrangement with the Emperor by which he had hoped to gain possession of the Polish cities of Dantzic and Thorn, moved troops to the frontiers of Livonia, and insisted that the condition of the status quo, accepted by Austria, should also be imposed on Russia. Catherine haughtily repelled this interference. The British Cabinet, in its anxiety to preserve the Prussian alliance and the free navigation of the Dniester, a channel of British trade, entered into an engagement to support Frederick William's demands by sending naval squadrons to the Baltic and Black Seas, to co-operate with Prussian and Turkish armies.<sup>2</sup> But the prospect of an armed conflict with Russia for the defence of Turkey caused such general dissatisfaction in England that Pitt found it necessary to retrace his steps. The Duke of Leeds resigned, and Lord Grenville, who alone of the leading Ministers had consistently opposed war, undertook the difficult task of withdrawing without damage or discredit from an untenable position, and accomplishing by moral pressure the English aim of preserving the Dniester from Russian control. His hopes of success seem to have depended chiefly on the action of the Emperor Leopold. If the Emperor could be brought to join the Triple Alliance, or even to give it diplomatic support, Catherine II. might be forced, without a shot being fired, to recede from her demands, or at least to consent to the territory in dispute being laid waste as a neutral zone between the Russian and Turkish empires; and, at the same time, the latter might be secured against further aggression by a guarantee of the chief European powers. With these objects in view, Grenville despatched Lord Elgin on a special mission to confer with the Emperor, then in Italy<sup>1</sup>; and Mr. Fawkeners on another to St. Petersburg,<sup>2</sup> to support the representations of Mr. Whitworth, resident minister of Great Britain. And Mr. Ewart, British Minister at Berlin, who had been for some time in London, ardently advocating warlike measures, returned in haste to his post, with instructions to reconcile King Frederick William to the pacific line of action which Pitt found himself compelled to adopt. An interesting sketch by Mr. Ewart of the past relations of Russia and Great Britain since the middle of the 18th century is dated April 1791.<sup>3</sup>

The course of these various negotiations may be traced, with some help from public despatches, in Lord Grenville's confidential correspondence with Lord Auckland, Messrs. Ewart, Whitworth, and Fawkeners. The letters of Auckland and Ewart are especially worth attention. As the only British Ambassador in Northern Europe, Auckland had control of the packet service between Helvoetsluys and Harwich, and the despatches from Berlin, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Constantinople, passed through his hands. The confidential footing on which he lived at the Hague with the Princess of Orange and the Dutch Ministers, his wide and intimate relations with continental statesmen, gave him command of a great variety of political information, which Grenville, who eagerly sought his advice, encouraged him to communicate without reserve. He represented in diplomacy the pacific views then dominant in England. His letters, intended to be read only by Grenville and Pitt, abound in amusing anecdotes and shrewd comments on men and affairs; and allowing for natural bias, may be regarded as epitomes of instructed European opinion on current events. Ewart had been one of the chief instruments in building up the Anglo-Prussian Alliance. His anxiety to maintain it, as well as the close connexions, private and public, he had formed at Berlin, inclined him to promote the aggressive designs of the Prussian Court, without, as Auckland often complained, taking sufficient account of the situation of the British Ministry and Lord Grenville's instructions. The King of Prussia at first took Pitt's excuses in good part, and sent his ruling favourite, Colonel Bischoffswerder, to Italy, to support Lord Elgin's representations to the Emperor. But Leopold gave the envoys only fair words. He had his own game to play, and he waited on events. His plenipotentiaries, then treating with those of the Sultan at Sistova, under the mediation of the maritime powers, spun out discussion. His armies still occupied Turkey, and he refused to commit himself to any new engagement that might separate him from Catherine II. She on her part set Prussia at defiance, and smote Turkey with redoubled vigour. Being well informed of the state of public feeling in England, she and her ministers showed their sense of the impotence of the British Ministry by their contemptuous treatment of Mr. Fawkener, and the attentions they lavished on Fox's friend Mr. Adair. It appears probable from Mr. Whitworth's letter to Grenville dated June 17<sup>1</sup> that the story of Fox having sent Adair to the Russian Court to thwart Fawkener and bring Pitt's administration into discredit in England, was the suggestion of a mortified diplomatist. Grenville, however, writing to Auckland on August 1,<sup>2</sup> seems to give it credit. And the anxiety felt in official circles to obtain proof of what was only surmise, is shown in the circumstances that Whitworth's official messenger and Mr. Lindsay, his principal secretary, took charge of Adair's letters in order to deliver them at the Foreign Office in London<sup>3</sup>; and that when Adair's arrival at Paris on his return to England became known, Bland Burges, Lord Grenville's Under Secretary, took measures at Dover to obtain a list of his travelling library, in the hope of discovering the key of the cipher in which the letters from St. Petersburg were written.<sup>1</sup>

The turn of events brought still deeper mortification to the King of Prussia. He had urged the Turks to continue the war and engaged to defend them. But the defection of Great Britain and the doubtful attitude of the Emperor reduced him to inaction. In the meantime, reports from Swedish engineers employed to fortify the Dardanelles gave good ground for apprehension that Prince Potemkin might force a passage through the Bosphorus with an armed flotilla and take Constantinople by a coup de main.<sup>2</sup> In this dilemma, Frederick William asked the English Government to send a naval squadron to cruize in the Black Sea. Ewart warned Grenville that the friendship of Prussia depended on compliance. Grenville, however, felt bound at all risks to reply that the British Ministry could do no more than observe strictly the engagements they had contracted by the Triple Alliance, and the Convention of Reichenbach.<sup>3</sup> An attempt of Prince Kaunitz to wring concessions from Turkey, contrary to this convention, threatened for a moment to drag England into a continental war. But the increasing perils of the French monarchy, which affected him sensibly on public and personal grounds, determined Leopold to come to an understanding with his German rival. Frederick William responded eagerly to the Emperor's advances, and throwing over the Triple Alliance, concluded a separate agreement with him, as a preliminary step to a conference at Pilnitz.<sup>4</sup> In July 1791 the Austrian and Turkish plenipotentiaries signed articles of peace at Sistova. Catherine II. to all appearance had European Turkey at her mercy. But the conservative views of the Emperor Leopold and the course of events in Poland counselled moderation. She assumed a more gracious bearing to Messrs. Whitworth and Fawkener, and disclaimed any intention of interfering with the free navigation of the Dniester.<sup>5</sup> Gladly accepting this unexpected concession, the English envoys, in conjunction with their Prussian colleague, Count Goltz, concluded a treaty with the Russian Ministers which gave Catherine the territory she claimed, and left the Sultan the option of acquiescing, or being abandoned to the chances of war. The Prussian Court, without going so far as to disavow Goltz, disclaimed responsibility for this treaty<sup>1</sup>; and the Sultan submitted reluctantly to terms so much more favourable, as George III. wrote to Grenville, than his situation entitled him to expect.<sup>2</sup>

Interesting accounts of the flight of Louis XVI. and his family from Paris in June 1791, founded on statements of Count Fersen, Marquis de Bouillé, and M. de Calonne, and sent to Grenville by the British resident at Brussels, are included in the Addenda.<sup>3</sup> Letters from Lord Gower, British Ambassador at Paris, Lord Robert FitzGerald, Secretary of the Embassy, and Mr. Moore of the English Foreign Office, describe the state of the French capital after the King's return as a prisoner from Varennes. A<sup>4</sup> letter from Lord Auckland throws light on the Royalist plans frustrated by that event.<sup>5</sup> From another, enclosing one of Charles Lameth, as well as from that of Lord Gower already referred to, it would appear that Louis's flight was not less ill-timed than ill-executed.<sup>6</sup>

During the conferences at Sistova, Lord Grenville had continued to hope that the Emperor might be induced to adopt the system of the Triple Alliance, and had even contemplated Catherine II.'s adhesion to it. Upon Leopold's conduct in this respect he had made depend the decision of the British Government as to the ratification of the Convention of the Hague, hitherto withheld by the Maritime Powers in consequence of the [narrow sense in which the obligation to restore the constitutional privileges of the Netherlands had been interpreted at Vienna. But the subsequent agreement between the Emperor and the King of Prussia, instead of drawing the former to the Triple Alliance, drew the latter away from it into a project of armed intervention on behalf of Louis XVI. of France, in which the British Government neither would nor could concur. When, therefore, peace had been concluded at Sistova, Grenville, as he informed Auckland on August 23, publicly announced the intention of his sovereign to observe strict neutrality in regard to the internal affairs of France.<sup>7</sup> He also refused to ratify the Convention of the Hague; and, contrary to Auckland's opinion, insisted that the Dutch Government should adopt the same course. Burke strongly disapproved of this policy. In one of Dundas's letters, dated September 15, he is represented as saying that "if the French Revolution goes off undisturbed, he would not give twenty years' purchase for an annuity on the existence of this country."<sup>1</sup> Richard Burke also figures in the correspondence as a medium of communication between the French princes on the Rhine and the British Cabinet. Later on in the year he acted in a similar capacity for the Irish Catholics.<sup>2</sup> The abstention of Great Britain deterred the Emperor from entering into an open conflict with the French Revolution. Lord Grenville's interpretation of the declaration of Pillnitz was, that the German sovereigns had determined to do nothing.<sup>3</sup> An account of the motives attributed to them, and the chagrin of the French émigrés, is given in a confidential letter from Mr. Jackson, Secretary of Legation at Berlin.<sup>4</sup> In September, the release of Louis XVI. from restraint, on his accepting the constitution offered him by the National Assembly, left no ground for foreign intervention in his behalf. Mr. Ewart, whose too zealous efforts to avert a breach between the Governments of Great Britain and Prussia had gradually brought him into disfavour with both, now found himself compelled by broken health to retire from the diplomatic service. A letter from his friend Hugh Elliott announced to Grenville the melancholy circumstances of his death in January 1792.<sup>5</sup> Pitt granted pensions to his widow and children.

Many of Auckland's letters during the year 1791 deal with current negotiations for a commercial treaty intended to cement the political alliance of the English and Dutch nations. The chief point in dispute concerned the carrying trade of the Dutch in time of war, and conflicting interests in the Eastern Seas. After two years had been wasted in barren discussions, Auckland and Van der Spiegel, Grand Pensionary of Holland, the ablest statesman of the Orange party, drew up articles of agreement in the summer of 1790, by which, as the former averred, the Dutch made concessions which no British Government had ever before ventured to ask from a foreign power.<sup>1</sup> These however failed to satisfy Pitt, or at least Lord Hawkesbury, President of the Board of Trade. Grenville therefore sent a counter project, which not only the Dutch Commissioners but the British Ambassador, in a remonstrance addressed to Pitt, declared to be unreasonable in its demands and impossible to enforce.<sup>2</sup> Van der Spiegel deplored in confidential letters to Auckland this exacting temper as fatal to the union of interests they had laboured to effect. Auckland returned to England on leave of absence in the autumn of 1791, and discussed the points at issue with the ministry. But all his efforts to frame articles which the Dutch Government could accept proved unavailing against the adverse influence of Lord Hawkesbury.

During his absence from the Hague, another cause of difference put a severe strain on the Anglo-Dutch Alliance. In view of common danger from France, the Emperor, as ruler of the Austrian Netherlands, proposed to the Dutch Government a mutual guarantee of their respective rights.<sup>3</sup> Van der Spiegel welcomed a proposal which placed the interests of the House of Orange under the protection of the two great German powers. But the British Government distrusting the Emperor, and fearing to be drawn by him into a quarrel with France, objected to it so strenuously, that the Prince of Orange, having to choose between England and Austria, put an end to the negotiation.<sup>4</sup>

Diplomatic intercourse between Great Britain and the United States of America had been suspended in consequence of breaches by both parties of the articles of peace agreed to in 1784. Mr. Colquhoun, a Glasgow merchant, and Colonel Smith, son-in-law of Vice-President Adams, exerted themselves to improve the relations of two kindred peoples. Encouraged by Colquhoun's letters, Lord Grenville sent Mr. Hammond to Philadelphia in the summer of 1791, to discuss terms of settlement; and, later in the year, Mr. Pinkney came in London to represent General Washington. It appears from one of Hammond's letters that a geographical blunder in an article of the treaty of 1784 framed expressly to secure to British subjects the free navigation of the Mississippi, completely excluded them from that river.<sup>1</sup>

Interspersed with these letters on political affairs are others of freer range and more familiar character from Lord Grenville's elder brother, the Marquis of Buckingham, and the Earl of Mornington, his most intimate friend. Mornington's letters are chiefly concerned with the scenes and incidents of his travels in Italy and Germany during the winter of 1790 and the spring and summer of 1791. They are the gems of the collection, and cannot fail to delight the reader by their power and brilliancy of description, cultivated taste, amusing and instructive comment, and the pleasing light in which they exhibit the writer's personal relations with Lord Grenville. Lord Buckingham's letters too frequently reflect the temper of a dissatisfied politician, irritated by constant disappointment of his hopes of place at Court or in the Cabinet in requital for services and sufferings in great measure self-inflicted, during his second tenure of the post of Irish Viceroy. But the habits of affection and unreserved confidence in which the brothers lived, and the thoroughness with which Lord Buckingham entered into every question affecting Grenville's advancement or happiness, give them great historical value. Though excluded from office, Lord Buckingham remained an eager politician. As Lord Lieutenant of an English county, colonel of a militia regiment, great landed proprietor returning several members to the House of Commons, he led a very active life, and acquired much practical knowledge of local affairs. His views on domestic politics, and especially those of Ireland, in which he took particular interest, appear to have had considerable influence in moulding Lord Grenville's public conduct in times of difficulty; as, for example, when in his letters of December 11 and 13, 1791, he insisted on the expediency of making concessions to the Irish Catholics in spite of the opposition of the Irish Government.<sup>2</sup> Extracts, more or less full, from Lord Grenville's answers to his brother have been published in The Court and Cabinets of George III. But several interesting passages omitted by the editor of that work, are printed in these volumes from duplicates preserved at Dropmore.

The prolonged correspondence on the subject of the Duke of York's marriage exemplifies the chronic ill-humour and biting sarcasm to which Lord Thurlow seems to have given free rein in communicating with his principal colleagues, after Pitt sent Grenville to the House of Lords to take charge of public business. During a visit to Berlin in the summer of 1791, the Duke became engaged to a daughter of the King of Prussia. George III. postponed his formal assent to the union until Parliament should meet and make suitable provision for it. The King of Prussia growing impatient of the delay, Mr. Ewart, at the Duke's solicitation and unmindful of the Royal Marriage Act, assumed the responsibility, on the strength of a private letter of inquiry from Pitt, of signing a provisional contract, which satisfied the Prussian Ministry, and enabled the ceremony to be performed at Berlin. Ewart's letters on the subject of this marriage, and the replies of Pitt and Grenville, will be found in the Addenda.<sup>1</sup> When the news reached London, Lord Grenville wrote to consult Lord Thurlow, then in the country, as to the steps which should be taken to make the marriage legal in England. The Chancellor, conceiving that he had been purposely kept in the dark about such an interesting event, returned a very ungracious answer; and, notwithstanding the intervention of the King, to whom Grenville appealed, the correspondence lost little in acrimony until the second marriage of the Duke and Duchess on their arrival in England in November, brought it to a close.<sup>2</sup> Shortly afterwards, Lord Grenville having obtained the vacant office of Ranger of the Parks, the Lord Chancellor lent countenance to the clamour which, as appears from Lord Buckingham's letters, the appointment raised in exalted circles, by delaying for some time to pass the patent under the Great Seal.<sup>3</sup>

Abundant evidence may be found in the correspondence of the increasing distrust which the aggressive character assumed by the French Revolution at the end of 1791, under the direction of the Girondin party, aroused in the British and Dutch Governments. Barthélemy, French Ambassador in London under the Fevillant régime, having been recalled in December, the King and Queen received him graciously at parting audiences. "His conduct personally," the King wrote, "has ever been as attentive as could be expected from a Frenchman."<sup>1</sup> But the envoys who succeeded Barthélemi seem, without exception, to have been regarded by George III. and his Ministers as revolutionary emissaries, sent to intrigue with the enemies of established order. A letter from J. Petrie, whom Lord Grenville employed to make confidential inquiries on the subject in Paris, gives interesting information in regard to Talleyrand's abortive mission to London at the beginning of 1792.<sup>2</sup> Shortly after Talleyrand's departure, M. du Roveray, another man of mark in the confidence of the Girondin leaders, applied to Lord Grenville for a letter of introduction to Major Hobart, Chief Secretary in Ireland. Grenville did not refuse his request, but advised Hobart to have him "narrowly and carefully watched."<sup>3</sup> Lord Auckland's letters in 1792 contain frequent allusions to the secret relations of De Maulde, the new French envoy at the Hague, with the "Patriot" party, and the care taken by the Dutch Government to intercept and copy his correspondence.

Mr. Lindsay, by his confidential reports as Chargé d'Affaires at Berlin after Ewart's return to England, led Lord Grenville to attribute the estrangement of the King of Prussia to personal faults of Ewart, rather than to political causes.<sup>4</sup> The letters of Sir Morton Eden, Ewart's successor, quickly dispelled this illusion. Eden found himself completely excluded from the confidence of the Prussian Court, while Frederick William concluded a defensive treaty with the Emperor, against whom the Legislative Assembly of France had denounced war. His letters give us striking pictures of the weak and dissolute character of the Prussian monarch, the sway of his profligate favourites, the impotence of Prussian Ministers, the evil influence of court manners on the society of the capital.<sup>5</sup>

In the spring of 1792, on the very eve of the Revolutionary war, three of the leading figures in European politics suddenly disappeared from the scene. Lord Grenville's letters barely notice the deaths of the Emperor Leopold, and Gustavus III. of Sweden. Lord St. Helens, on February 28, sent a report of the dismissal and exile of Count Florida Blanca, without being able to account for it.<sup>1</sup> But a letter of later date, communicated by Lord Auckland, attributed the fall of the Spanish Minister to his opposing the advancement of the Queen's favorite, Godoy, Duke of Alcudia.<sup>2</sup>

Towards the end of April, the Marquis de Chauvelin came to London as French Ambassador, having M. M. de Talleyrand and du Roveray attached to him unofficially as advisers. He brought a letter from Louis XVI. to George III., expressing a desire for a formal alliance between France and Great Britain. The English sovereign's appreciation of the more important members of the French Embassy, in a note to Grenville, dated April 28, and his comments, a few days later, on the disgraceful incidents of a repulse suffered by the French troops, showed little disposition to accept this overture.<sup>3</sup> Lord Buckingham's letters for May 1792, and the following months, refer to various events in England that excited great interest at the time; Lord Thurlow's mutiny and dismissal; Pitt's negotiation with the aristocratic section of the Whig party; a royal proclamation against seditious societies, and the loyal addresses it evoked: the Birmingham riots. "M. de Chauvelin's memoire" censured in Lord Auckland's letters of June 5 and June 15 did not improve the relations of Great Britain and France.<sup>4</sup> But Grenville's answer to Auckland's suggestion that he should demand the recall of the French Ambassador is a very strong testimony to the pacific temper of the English people in the middle of the year 1792. "The quarrelling with France" he wrote on June 19, "wou'd give encouragement to the persons in both countries who wish to introduce French maxims of government amongst us, and would give them the command and direction of the very prevailing wish for peace which I take to be the ruling sentiment both here and in Holland."<sup>5</sup> The British Ministry appears to have adhered strictly to a line of neutrality both in regard to the internal troubles of France, and the war between France and the two great German powers. On the one hand, it provoked the anger of Austria and Prussia by dissuading the Dutch Government from listening to a new proposal from the Emperor Francis II. of a defensive alliance for the protection of the Netherlands.<sup>1</sup> On the other, it refused an official application from the French Government for its mediation to restore peace and a private request, through Lord Gower, for its friendly interference to save the royal family of France from revolutionary violence.<sup>2</sup> Of the utter inability of the French to resist the German armies no doubt seems to have been entertained by Lord Grenville or any of his correspondents. An equally firm conviction finds expression in letters of Grenville and Auckland, that the successful termination of the war in Mysore, known in London early in July, and the happy effect of the King's proclamation in quelling domestic sedition, had assured to Great Britain a long enjoyment of peace and unexampled prosperity.<sup>3</sup>

Lord Grenville's marriage to Annette Pitt, only daughter of Lord Camelford, is the subject of an affectionate letter from the Marquis of Buckingham, dated July 18. His wedding tour was interrupted by the overthrow of the French monarchy on August 10. The Cabinet immediately recalled the British Embassy from Paris. Horrible details of the massacre at the Tuileries, communicated by Morley, a Foreign Office messenger, and Mr. Lindsay, Secretary of the Embassy, are given in letters from Bland Burges to Grenville, dated August 15 and September 3.<sup>4</sup> The "application from Baron de Breteuil," and Chauvelin's official note, referred to in letters of Pitt and Dundas, dated August 17 and 18, are included in the Addenda.<sup>5</sup> Another letter from Burges to Grenville, dated September 8, contains particulars of the September massacres, brought from Paris by Mr. Lindsay, who had been detained in that city for several days after Lord Gower's departure. It is not easy to say whether Lindsay's account of Madame de Lamballe's murder, or of the indifference with which Philippe Egalité received the intelligence of that atrocity, is more revolting. A very interesting memorandum by Lord Grenville, dated September 24, of a conversation with M. de Talleyrand on the subject of the political tragedies of August and September in Paris, may be found among the Addenda; as also two letters from Edmund Burke in reference to the new political situation created by them.<sup>6</sup> A sudden rush across the British Channel of a multitude of proscribed priests, reported by Mason, a Foreign Office messenger, on September 12, seems to have caused some dismay in England. As a set-off against this unwelcome news, Mason wrote an amusing account of Thomas Payne's escape to France.<sup>1</sup> The people of Calais received the author of the Rights of Man with open arms, and chose him, though apparently unable to address them in their own tongue, to represent them in the National Convention. The arrival of the royalist refugees suggested to the Ministry the alarming prospect of an inroad of Jacobin fugitives, in the event, considered at that time certain and imminent, of the Duke of Brunswick's army capturing Paris. In order to provide against this danger, Pitt and Dundas took counsel with Lord Loughborough,<sup>2</sup> who in the beginning of the following year accepted the vacant office of Lord Chancellor. Their deliberations bore fruit in the Alien Act.

Sir James Murray had gone to the Duke of Brunswick's headquarters at the end of July with private instructions from Lord Grenville to send home reports on matters affecting the political or military situation. But the German sovereigns, being much dissatisfied with the policy of the British Government, kept it quite in the dark in regard to their plans and objects. Letters however from General Money, commanding a division of Dumouriez's army, and a letter from another English officer serving under the Duke of Brunswick, giving interesting accounts of the campaign of Valmy from opposite camps, will be found in the Addenda.<sup>3</sup> These also include a report by Stephen Rolleston of intelligence collected from various quarters regarding the secret negotiations between the King of Prussia and the Executive Council of Paris, which paved the way for the evacuation of France by the German armies;<sup>4</sup> and an account of the early career of Lebrun, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, by A. W. Miles.<sup>5</sup> Lord Grenville at first regarded the defeat of the allies as a mere check, involving no material alteration in the political situation of Europe, though testifying clearly to the wisdom of the British system of non-intervention. But the rapid conquest of the Austrian Netherlands by Dumouriez; the revival and spread of political agitation in Great Britain, Ireland, and Holland; the encouragement given to it by French agents; and offensive decrees of the Convention, soon changed this mood of self complacent criticism to one of intense alarm and anger. Every symptom, real or imaginary, of internal disaffection is carefully recorded in the letters of Lord Buckingham, who prescribed as remedies, concession to Irish Catholics and repression of English radicals. The rapidity with which the English Government and people passed from a pacific temper to an ardent determination to bridle effectually the power of France is clearly reflected in Lord Grenville's letters to Lord Auckland during the last months of 1792. On the other hand, the strong desire of the Dutch Government not only to avoid war, but to bring about a general pacification on a basis of non-intervention by any state in the internal affairs of another, is not less clearly expressed in Auckland's letters to Grenville. The Grand Pensionary, Van der Spiegel, appears to have come to a secret understanding with Dumouriez through De Maulde and Joubert, agents of the French Government at the Hague, who, from time to time, were paid sums of money supplied by Grenville through Lord Auckland;<sup>1</sup> and to have received assurances that the Dutch provinces should not be molested by the French so long as England remained neutral.

The papers contain only passing references to the official correspondence between Lebrun or Chauvelin and Grenville, which led up to an open rupture between Great Britain and France. But they supply a good deal of information with respect to a concurrent negotiation, in which Dumouriez seems to have played the principal part. It would appear that the French general conceived a project of inducing the neutral powers to intervene for the restoration of peace; and, with their moral if not material support, of using his army to re-establish constitutional monarchy in France. The Dutch Government identified itself with the first part of this scheme, in which Lebrun also co-operated. Dumouriez made overtures to Lord Grenville through M. de Talleyrand,<sup>2</sup> who had returned to England after the downfall of Louis XVI., and disclaimed all connexion with the rulers of the Republic; and through De Maulde he invited Lord Auckland to a personal conference.<sup>3</sup> Lord Grenville, however, as his letters show, had by this time made up his mind thoroughly as to the necessity or expediency of war with France. He declined to grant Talleyrand an interview on December 22.<sup>1</sup> And although he seems to have entered into communication with him afterwards at the request of M. Malouet, he returned no answer apparently to Talleyrand's remarkable letter of January 28th, 1793, from Juniper Hall, announcing Maret's mission to London; and he only consented to an interview between Auckland and Dumouriez, in order that the Dutch Government might have more time for military preparation.<sup>2</sup> This meeting, however, was prevented by the declaration of war by which the Convention replied to an Order in Council, requiring Chauvelin to quit England. Madame de Stael joined Talleyrand at Juniper Hall after the trial of Louis XVI., and announced her arrival in England to Lord Grenville in a characteristic letter.<sup>3</sup>

Confidential letters and instructions in reference to treaties of alliance with Spain, Prussia and Russia, then engaged in the second partition of Poland, Austria, and Naples; the appointment of the Duke of York to command the British and Hanoverian troops in the Netherlands; and other matters bearing on the war, make up a large part of the correspondence during the first months of 1793. A letter of Lord St. Helens contains an amusing sketch of Godoy, the new prime minister of Spain.<sup>4</sup> Sir Morton Eden, who had resigned the office of British Minister at Berlin in disgust, was transferred to Vienna early in the year; and Count Starhemberg, brief notices of whose character and aims occur in Lord Auckland's letters during the year 1792, replaced Count Stadion as Austrian Minister in London.

Letters of the King and Pitt point to the capture of Dunkirk for Great Britain, and the fortresses of French Flanders as a barrier for the Austrian Netherlands, the destruction of French arsenals, and the conquest of French colonies by naval expeditions, as the main objects to which the efforts of the monarchy were to be directed.<sup>5</sup> Additional light is thrown on British policy at this time by the refusal of government to allow the French princes, Counts de Provence and d'Artois, to set foot in England; the satisfaction expressed by Lord Grenville, in a letter to Lord St. Helens, at the failure of the attempt made by Dumouriez in concert with the Prince of Cobourg to restore the French monarchy while preserving its integrity; and the King's declaration, in reference to a last overture for peace from Lebrun, that "France must be greatly circumscribed before " we can talk of any means of treating with that dangerous " and faithless nation."<sup>1</sup> But the plans of Dundas, as Minister for War, were greatly hampered by a difficulty of obtaining men for the army and navy. The employment of German and Italian mercenaries partly supplied military deficiencies. But deep disappointment, caused by the inactivity of the Channel Fleet and the delays of projected expeditions to the West Indies, is expressed from time to time in Lord Buckingham's letters during the whole year. On the other hand, secret reports from Paris throughout the spring are filled with encouraging accounts of a terrible dearth of food in France, and the strife of republican factions in the capital, which culminated at the beginning of June in the arrest or flight of the Girondin leaders in the Convention, and a general insurrection of the provincial cities in their favour.<sup>2</sup>

A British peerage having been conferred on Lord Auckland for his exertions in Holland, he returned to England after the evacuation of the Netherlands by Dumouriez, and soon afterwards retired from the diplomatic service. In the course of the summer he introduced to Lord Grenville M. de Jarry, a distinguished French strategist, strongly recommended by Count Mercy, Imperial Minister at Brussels.<sup>3</sup> Grenville engaged De Jarry to collect information about the royalist insurgents of Brittany and La Vendée, but seems to have employed him chiefly in drawing up military plans and reports, highly lauded for ability and knowledge, but apparently never followed, or not until it was too late. In July the surrender of Valenciennes, Condé, and Mayence, and repeated defeats inflicted on the French armies, inspired sanguine hopes of a speedy conclusion of the war. But at the critical moment of the campaign the allied forces in the Netherlands separated to besiege the petty fortresses of Dunkirk and Quesnoy, and the King of Prussia remained inactive on the Rhine. Two remarkable letters from M. Malouet, a leading French statesman of the party of constitutional monarchy, and M. Mallet du Pan, one of the ablest political writers of the time, warned Lord Grenville in August that the dilatory tactics of the allied powers, each of them intent on the pursuit of some selfish aim, by allowing time to the Jacobin Government of Paris to crush internal revolt and gather up all the resources of France to repel invasion, would infallibly lead to the triumph of the Revolution.<sup>1</sup> De Jarry also, supported by Lord Auckland, insisted on a concentration of force on Paris, in union with the insurgent royalists, to destroy the Convention.<sup>2</sup> These remonstrances, followed almost immediately by the surrender of Toulon to Lord Hood, to be held for Louis XVII., and the repulse of the Duke of York from Dunkirk, seem to have had considerable influence in modifying British policy. This effect may be discerned in M. Mounier's mission to Switzerland<sup>3</sup> and the substitution of Mr. Wickham for Lord R. Fitzgerald as British Minister at Berne; in urgent applications to the Prussian, Austrian, and Sardinian Governments to move troops to the assistance of the insurgent city of Lyons; in a manifesto written by Grenville, and issued in the name of the allied powers, offering to aid the French people in restoring constitutional monarchy<sup>4</sup>; in the fitting out of an expedition under the command of Lord Moira to assist the Breton royalists.<sup>5</sup> On the other hand the manifesto maintained the demand of "indemnity for the past and security for the future" at the expense of France, formulated by Lord Auckland at the Antwerp Conference in April 1793; and the British Government refused to allow Count de Provence to repair to Toulon, at the invitation of the King of Spain.<sup>6</sup> The correspondence for the remainder of the year 1793 records the failure of conflicting interests and a want of energy in command, to overcome the patriotic efforts of the French people to save their country from partition. After the repulse of the Duke of York from Dunkirk and of the Prince of Cobourg from Maubeuge, the allied armies in the Netherlands remained inactive. The Sardinians made no effectual attempt to relieve Lyons. The King of Prussia having, by a victory at Pirmasens, established himself on the borders of Alsace in September, directed Marquis Lucchesini to inform the British Government that, unless aided by a large subsidy and a guarantee of his recent Polish acquisitions, he must withdraw from the war at the close of the campaign.<sup>1</sup> The Dutch Government refused to assist the Emperor further in annexing towns in French Flanders unless he agreed to restore territory taken from the Republic by his predecessor Joseph II. Lord Moira's armament did not reach the coast of Brittany until the beginning of December, when the royalist insurrection had been temporarily quelled. The evacuation of Toulon later in December, and the complete discomfiture of the Prussian and Austrian armies operating in Alsace, filled the measure of popular disappointment, so freely expressed in Lord Buckingham's letters.

Lord Grenville's letters, however, showed no signs of discouragement.<sup>2</sup> He seems to have relied confidently on the inability of the Jacobin Government, with ruined finances, and a famine-stricken and generally hostile population, to maintain such an exhausting and unequal struggle. A strenuous and united effort of the coalition, on a regular plan, must, it was thought, bring the war to a successful issue. Acting on this conviction the British Ministry sent Lord Malmesbury to Berlin to confer with the King of Prussia; put pressure on the Austrian Government to appease by concessions the jealousies of the Dutch and Prussians; and with judgment biased no doubt by an absorbing care of British interests, caused General Mack's plan of campaign for 1794 to be adopted.<sup>3</sup> Although the Emperor Francis II. assumed the chief command in the Netherlands with Mack as chief of his staff, it appears from a letter of Sir Morton Eden, dated March 11, 1794, that neither he nor his principal adviser, Baron Thugut, had faith in Mack's plan.<sup>4</sup> They condemn it as depending for success on the doubtful co-operation of a Prussian army, and as employing the main force of the coalition in tedious sieges on the northern frontier of France, instead of penetrating at once by more open routes into the interior of the country to rally the royalists of the provinces, and assail the revolutionary Government in Paris, its chief stronghold.

It is clear from Pitt's letters to Grenville in October 1793 that the Ministry at first decided to insist on the King of Prussia fulfilling his engagements to Great Britain. Frederick William pleaded inability to do so on account of the empty state of his exchequer, but offered an army of 100,000 men for a subsidy of about 2,000,000l.<sup>1</sup> Two confidential letters from Lord Malmesbury, written on January 9, 1794, throw considerable light on the state of affairs at Berlin. The first, to Grenville, describes the Prussian Court and the principal personages who figured there.<sup>2</sup> The second, to Pitt, deals more at large with the political situation. "The question," Malmesbury wrote to Pitt, "reduces itself to a very narrow compass. Can we do without the King of Prussia, or can we not? If we can, he is not worth giving a guinea for, if we cannot, I am afraid we cannot give too many."<sup>3</sup> A Prussian army was an essential factor of the military plans adopted, but the difficulty of raising the subsidy demanded could not be overcome. In April, however, Lord Malmesbury, Count Haugwitz, representing Prussia, and the Dutch Government signed a convention at the Hague, by which the King of Prussia engaged to place 62,000 troops, then on the Rhine under Marshal Möllendorf's command, at the absolute disposal of the maritime powers for the remainder of the year, in consideration of monthly payments amounting in all to about 1,200,000l., of which 100,000l. was to be paid in advance.<sup>4</sup> Owing to delay in London it was not until June that Lords Malmesbury and Cornwallis joined Count Haugwitz at Maestricht to arrange for the moving of Möllendorf's army into the Netherlands; and then further delay was caused by intelligence from Baron Jacobi that none of the money due in virtue of the Convention of the Hague, and on which the Prussian Government professed to depend for the equipment and pay of the troops, had been sent to Berlin.<sup>5</sup> In the meantime vigorous attacks of the French and the inactivity of the Prussians had compelled the allied commanders in the Netherlands to abandon Mack's plan and stand on the defensive. A letter from the Duke of York to his father, dated May 23,<sup>6</sup> and correspondence arising out of it, leave no doubt either of the bad feeling that had sprung up between the Austrian and English generals, or of the disbelief of leading ministers at home in the Duke's capacity for independent command. The Emperor returned to Vienna. And on June 26, Lord Hertford, who had been present at the battle, sent Grenville a report of Jourdan's victory before Charleroi, which decided the fate of the Austrian Netherlands.<sup>1</sup> The French Generals Jourdan and Pichégu, having driven the allied armies across the Scheldt and the Meuse, paused for a time to recover the border fortresses still held by Austrian garrisons; but the despatch of Lord Meira, with troops long destined for La Vendée, to the assistance of the Duke of York, was a grievous blow to the royalist cause in France. Marshal Möllendorf having no instructions on the subject from the King of Prussia, declined to obey a summons from Lords Malmesbury and Cornwallis, who reached his camp in the middle of June, to march from the Rhine into the Netherlands.<sup>2</sup> Count Haugwitz, on whose co-operation the British Commissioners relied, had suddenly abandoned them at Frankfort, and returned to Berlin. On receiving Malmesbury's report of this breach of the Convention of the Hague, Grenville seems to have proposed to stop payment of the Prussian subsidy. But Pitt, taking also into account a report from Cornwallis of the military reasons alleged by Möllendorf for remaining on the Rhine, deferred a decision on the question.<sup>3</sup>

A memorandum of Pitt, dated July 15, tells us the measures by which he proposed to retrieve the reverses in the Netherlands.<sup>4</sup> The only new political feature it presents is a concert with the French princes for the enrolling of regiments of émigrés, to reinforce the royalist insurgents in Western France. The King consented to allow Count d'Artois to come to England, in strict incognito and for a short time, to take part in this work; but the invitation had hardly gone, when it was thought expedient to revoke it.<sup>5</sup> Later in the month Lord Grenville despatched Lord Spencer and Mr. Thomas Grenville on a mission to Vienna for the purpose of urging the Austrian Government to make more vigorous exertions. At the same time Baron Thugut sent Count Mercy to London with instructions to demand more efficient military support in the Netherlands; an immediate advance of money as subsidy or loan, to enable the Austrian army to move forward for the relief of the besieged fortresses in French Flanders; financial help on a larger scale for the next campaign.<sup>6</sup> Mercy died within a few days after his arrival in London.<sup>7</sup> Before Pitt could supply the funds immediately required, the besieged fortresses surrendered; and the French generals resumed the offensive, Pichégru against the English and Dutch, and Jourdan against the Austrians. When the campaign of 1794 opened, the Cabinet had earnestly pressed the King to give Lord Cornwallis an important command in the Netherlands<sup>1</sup>; and Pitt now wished to make him Commander-in-Chief of the allied armies. But the opposing claims of the Duke of York and the Austrian General Clairfait received such powerful support as to defeat on both occasions the intentions of the English Ministry. Mr. Grenville's letters from Vienna presented a very discouraging picture of the internal state of the Austrian monarchy, the unpopularity of the war, and the difficulties thrown in Baron Thugut's path by the great nobles who filled the chief places at Court.<sup>2</sup> A want of vigour in the administration, and of accord between its military and political views and those of the British Ministry, impressed the envoys so unfavourably that they set their faces against England incurring any pecuniary risk for an Austrian alliance. When, however, they returned home in November, Lord Grenville sent back Sir Morton Eden, then repenting at leisure of a hasty acceptance of the vacant embassy at Madrid, to resume his post at Vienna, and discuss with Thugut the amount and conditions of an Austrian loan to be raised in London on the credit of the British Government. Marshal Möllendorf having again declined to move his army for the defence of the Dutch Republic, Pitt stopped payment of the Prussian subsidy for October. The King of Prussia retaliated by withdrawing his troops from the Rhine, and refused to take any further part in the war until all arrears had been paid up. A note of the Prussian case, as presented to Lord Grenville by Baron Jacobi, is included in the Addenda.<sup>3</sup> The French generals were not slow in turning the discord of their enemies to account. Letters which passed at this time between Lord Grenville and Lord St. Helens, who had succeeded Lord Auckland as British Ambassador at the Hague, and from the Duke of York to his father, bring out clearly the impotence of the Dutch Government to take effectual measures of defence, in consequence of the disaffection or apathy of a population exasperated by the disorderly conduct of at least a part of York's army.<sup>4</sup> The Duke of Brunswick having declined an offer of the chief command of the British and Dutch troops, the Prince of Orange, with the consent of George III. made an ineffectual attempt to open a separate negotiation for peace at Paris.<sup>1</sup> Other letters from General Clairfait, who had succeeded Cobourg in command of the Austrians, to Count Starhemberg, throw a good deal of light on the circumstances that facilitated Pichégru's rapid conquest of the Dutch provinces in the winter of 1794-5.<sup>2</sup>

References in Lord Grenville's papers, after the breaking out of war with France, to matters of domestic politics, or of merely personal interest outside the catalogue of Lord Buckingham's grievances, are few and brief. In December 1793, Pitt's negligence or inadvertence in respect to a military arrangement affecting the professional prospects of Colonel Nugent, a near connexion of Lord Buckingham, drew an angry letter of remonstrance from Grenville, and ruffled for a time the affectionate relations in which these Ministers lived.<sup>3</sup> Another discussion of more amicable character followed in February 1794 in reference to the rich sinecure of Auditor of the Exchequer which Pitt offered Grenville on disadvantageous terms.<sup>4</sup> A compromise seems to have been arrived at in this case which left Grenville's official income unaltered, and secured to him the auditorship as a permanent provision on his quitting office. Another correspondence in which Pitt and Grenville took part, arose out of one of several strange misconceptions of the conditions on which the Duke of Portland accepted the post of Home Secretary in the summer of 1794. In order to extricate himself from the embarrassments of what seems to have been a comedy of errors, Pitt asked Grenville to resign the Foreign Office to Portland. Grenville readily consented, but the change, besides being unwelcome to the Duke, was rendered unnecessary by a somewhat late discovery of his willingness to satisfy Pitt's requirements, by leaving the conduct of the war in the hands of Dundas.<sup>5</sup> Lord Buckingham's intense dissatisfaction at the ministerial arrangements resulting from Pitt's coalition with the aristocratic wing of the Whig party is abundantly displayed in letters to his brother.

But although poor in information about the internal affairs of the British monarchy, the collection is exceedingly rich in confidential reports on the internal affairs of France. Two series of these, anonymous and in French, dealing with the Revolutionary government established in Paris in the autumn of 1793, its methods, its resources, the perils that beset it, the characters and aims of the men who directed it, the internal dissensions that finally destroyed it, though now published in an incomplete form, are of special interest and importance. Lord Grenville dealt with these two sets of reports in the same fashion. He retained one part of both in his own hands, and left the other part in the Foreign Office, without adding in either case note or comment to denote the author, or the common origin of the separated parts. The concluding papers of one series, of which the more important is entitled Memoire sur le Comité de Salut Public, are printed with the Addenda of this volume.<sup>1</sup> They form the continuation of an elaborate historical treatise, the first part of which, now preserved in the Public Record Office, has been published by Mr. Oscar Browning as an appendix to Lord Gower's despatches from Paris. Copious extracts from both parts in M. Taine's History of the French Revolution leave no doubt as to their being the work of the famous political writer Mallet du Pan. Mallet appears to have been brought into relations with Lord Grenville by M. Malouet in August 1793.<sup>2</sup> Shortly afterwards he sent to Malouet, for Grenville, a mémoire on the state of Switzerland, which has not been found in the portfolios at Dropmore; but his reports on France seem to have been forwarded by Lord Elgin, British Minister at Brussels, after Malouet's departure from England. Mallet's engagements to the Austrian Government may serve to account for the care taken to keep his communications with the British Ministry secret. As to the ability and knowledge displayed in his essays on the French Revolution, it is sufficient to say that Malouet's enthusiastic appreciation of them was not more warm than that expressed by distinguished historians of the present time.

The other series of secret reports, beginning on September 2, 1793, and forming in Volume II. a continuous record to June 22, 1794, came to Lord Grenville from Mr. Drake, British Minister at Genoa. In transmitting the first of these bulletins, as he named them, Drake wrote on November 9:

" I have the honour to enclose a detailed account of the sitting " of the Committee of Nine on the 2nd of September. . . .
 " Your Lordship may rely on the authenticity of it, as it was " drawn up by a person who is employed as secretary of that " Committee, and who conceals his real principles under the " cloak of the most extravagant Jacobinism."<sup>1</sup> He referred Grenville to Lord Mulgrave, then returning to England from Toulon, for information as to the route by which the bulletins reached him, and requested that, for the safety of the writer they might be shown only to his Majesty's Ministers. Lord Grenville retained in his own custody all the bulletins that came to him during the Reign of Terror, generally six weeks after they had been written. Those received after August 2, 1794, he deposited with Drake's secret despatches in the Foreign Office. Although their relations continued with hardly a break during the remaining period of his diplomatic employment in Italy, Drake appears to have been unable for a long time to learn anything more about his mysterious correspondent than the circumstance that he was a royalist of fanatical type, and a secret agent of Count de Provence, known as Monsieur until the death of his nephew in June 1795, and afterwards as Louis XVIII. But his secret despatches in the sequel supply information which seems to fix the identity of the writer of the bulletins beyond reasonable doubt. A royalist agent residing at Venice, referred to in one of the bulletins as a man of considerable mark, personally known to English Ministers, and an old friend of the writer, acted as intermediary between the latter and Drake. This description points to Count d'Entraigues, chief political manager for Monsieur, or some one intimately associated with him. An unsigned covering letter from the intermediary to Drake, dated August 27, 1795, excuses orthographical errors in the bulletins by stating that in order to guard against discovery which might compromise the writer he had the originals copied at Venice by a child only ten years old. In the same month the writer warned the British Government that the plans of Mr. Wickham, its Minister in Switzerland, for raising an insurrection at Lyons and drawing military deserters across the French frontier to recruit the army of Prince de Condé, had been denounced three times to the Committee of Public Safety, in consequence of the indiscretion or infidelity of the agents employed. He had kept back the reports, and would run no further risk for such men, or by holding communication with Wickham. But as the British Government had now identified itself with the cause of Louis XVIII., he undertook, if supplied with 500 louis for preliminary expenses, to establish four trustworthy agents in different parts of France to furnish intelligence and serve its other objects. He asked no other payment for himself or his subordinates; only stipulating that facilities should be given him for the transmission of his own fortune of 400,000 livres to England, and that his agents, if their conduct gave satisfaction, should be assured of means of subsistence, in the event of misfortune compelling them to fly from France. Drake, in forwarding this proposal to Grenville, stated that he had sent his correspondent 100*l.* as a retaining fee, but could not take the responsibility of remitting the whole sum required without special authority. In the following month, having received instructions as Minister Plenipotentiary at Milan to join the headquarters of the Austrian army of the Alps, Drake arranged that the bulletins should be sent direct from Venice to Grenville or Aust, one of the Under-Secretaries of State, and signed (58). But the writer failing to obtain an answer from Lord Grenville to the offer he had made, discontinued them in February 1796. In June 1796, however, Drake wrote in cipher from Venice that the proposal to supply secret intelligence had been repeated, with the same conditions and exceptions, by Ramon, a member of the Council of Five Hundred. Ramon acknowledged having received an instalment of 3,000 livres from Drake, but stated that 9,000 livres more were required to complete his plans. And he refused to have any relations with Wickham, who by his account had done more injury to the royalists of Lyons than Collot d'Herbois. This letter of Drake and a later one in the autumn gave some particulars about Ramon. He had been a member of the Convention, and although a zealous royalist enjoying the confidence of the emigrant princes, had voted for the death of Louis XVI. He had afterwards turned his connexion with the Committee of Public Safety to profitable account, and had placed his large gains for safety in the hands of Sir John Lambart, anxiously awaiting permission from the British Government to transmit them to England. In the autumn of 1796 he travelled in the south of France as a delegate of the Directory, while working secretly for Louis XVIII. He complained that all his efforts for the promotion of the royal cause were hampered by want of money, but was determined to risk none of his own on such an uncertain venture, Louis XVIII. and Monsieur being themselves the chief obstacles in the way of a restoration of the French monarchy. Gamon kept up communication with Drake, sending occasionally interesting reports on French affairs signed Z, until Bonaparte's victories left British diplomacy no foot-hold in northern Italy.

The unbounded confidence Lord Grenville reposed in Wickham, to whom, as their correspondence shows, he allowed a free hand in organising and subsidizing insurrection in France, may explain his tacit refusal of Ramon's proposal, although he must have found in Wickham's confessions of failure to obtain recruits for Condé's army, and the occasional ineptitude of his agents, some confirmation of the indictment which paved the way for that proposal. It may be stated that Ramon's name appears on contemporary public documents as a member of the Committee of Public Safety in the summer of 1795.

Strong antipathies divided the writer of the bulletins, who hated a constitutional royalist more than a Jacobin, from Mallet du Pan, an advocate, like his friend Malouet, of the reforming policy of Louis XVI. One of the bulletins affords amusing proof of this antagonism in the care with which the attention of the British Government is drawn to a boastful letter of Mallet, found among the papers of Herault de Sechelles.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless, a remarkable degree of agreement may be observed in their reports, in regard not only to the leading features of the system of terror, but as to details of its working, and the characters of those who worked it. Another point worth noting is that information supplied in the bulletins as to matters particularly affecting the British Government is frequently confirmed by other evidence in the correspondence. For example, the revelation of a design to murder George III. and Pitt is fully corroborated in the disclosures of an Irish priest named Ferris to Bland Burges at the Foreign Office in London.<sup>1</sup> And Count Mercy, at Lord Grenville's request, caused the emissaries of the Committee of Public Safety to be tracked and arrested in Belgium on their way to England.<sup>2</sup> Drake's own accounts from the south of France correspond with the statement in another bulletin of the number and condition of the French troops besieging Toulon. The double part played by the writer enabled him to diversify his narrative by confidential information drawn from royalist as well as Jacobin sources. But the chief ground on which the bulletins challenge attention is their want of accord with most of the standard works on the French revolution in two particulars of great historical interest: 1. The position they assign to Abbé Siéyès as standing counsel of the Revolutionary government, and more especially, prompter and mainstay of Robespierre; and 2. The part attributed to St. Just as chief opponent of Robespierre's supremacy, after the latter had rid himself by means of the guillotine of all his political rivals, in March and April 1794. The bulletins immediately following the last printed in Volume II., dated June 14-22, embrace the events of the 9th Thermidor, or July 28; and consequently bring the narrative in regard to both of those debatable points to a conclusion. A brief summary of their contents will therefore supply an obvious deficiency caused by the untimely separation of the series. Siéyès is represented in the interval between June 22 and July 19 as exhausting his powers of persuasion in eloquent appeals to the Committee of Public Safety to lay aside internal strife, and unite heartily in carrying on war at the expense of the rich at home and abroad, for the destruction of kings, priests, and nobles, in order that society might be reconstructed on a really democratic basis. On the other hand, St. Just, notwithstanding the reconciliation he had sought with Robespierre, which seems to have given him control of the northern armies,<sup>3</sup> continued to suspect his powerful colleague of a design to make peace with the allies for his own advantage; and wavered between him and his antagonists until he found, on July 19, in the course of a conference with the Dantonist Committee formed to resist Robespierre, that they were determined to abolish the Revolutionary Tribunal. Starting up in fury at this announcement, he declared himself their mortal enemy, and joined Couthon and Robespierre to maintain the system of terror. At a meeting of the Committee of Public Safety on July 20, angry feelings, hitherto kept under restraint, exploded. Robespierre, supported by St. Just and Couthon, repeated in a menacing tone a demand recently evaded by the majority, that Fouché and other Dantonist deputies should be accused and tried. He wound up a long harangue by declaring that Fouché's head or his should fall. Billaud Varennes, an old friend of Fouché, replied fiercely that if either head fell it should be Robespierre's. He found a backer, furious as himself, in Collot d'Herbois. With this declaration of war the meeting broke up. Siéyès finding it impossible to avert an open rupture, vanished from the scene until the conflict had been decided. He appears to have extricated himself from the ruin of the Terrorists with his usual adroitness, baffling several attempts of Tallien to include him in the decree of accusation subsequently passed in the Convention against Billaud, Collot and Barrère. The writer states in his bulletin for August 1-9, that on July 25, Robespierre had all the means of success at his command, and that his want of nerve and decision on the following days gave the victory to the Convention. He also asserts that an examination of Robespierre's papers disclosed his secret negotiation for peace with Austrian agents, and a project to place Louis XVII. on the throne under his own guardianship.

Mr. Hammond's negotiations at Philadelphia for a settlement of claims and controversies in respect of various articles of the treaty concluded in 1794 had been interrupted by new causes of complaint, originating in the renewal of war between Great Britain and France. It appears from the bulletins that the American Government, in anticipation of hostilities with England, instructed, early in 1794, Robert Morris, its Minister in Paris, to apply to the Committee of Public Safety for money to equip a naval armament.<sup>1</sup> Later in the year, Mr. Secretary Randolph despatched Mr. Jay to London to discuss, and if possible conclude, a pacific arrangement with Lord Grenville. In anticipation of this mission, Lord Auckland, on June 22, sent Grenville a graphic sketch of Jay's character from the pen of Mr. Elliott, a former Lieutenant Governor of New York.<sup>1</sup> A letter from Grenville to Jay, dated October 7,<sup>2</sup> shows that they had already made considerable way in a negotiation, of which (1) an abstract of the various grievances alleged by both parties; (2) letters from Randolph and Jay in regard to high-handed proceedings of British officers on the Canadian frontier; (3) a letter from Grenville to the Duke of Portland suggesting a reorganisation of West India prize courts, with a view of checking their unjust practices; and (4) a letter from Buckingham to Grenville in reference to the impressment of American seamen by Admiral Jervis, and the Canadian projects of Governor Simcoe, clearly indicate the subject matter.<sup>3</sup> A letter from Jay to Grenville, dated November 22,<sup>4</sup> bears strong testimony to the conciliatory spirit which had enabled the negotiators to sign a new treaty. Grenville, at Jay's suggestion, recalled Hammond from Philadelphia in September 1794, but appointed him Under Secretary at the Foreign Office in November 1795. A friendly letter from Grenville to Jay, written in May 1795, after the latter had returned to America, deals with various impediments which prevented the treaty from coming into force until the following year.<sup>5</sup>

The circumstances of Lord FitzWilliam's appointment as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and sudden recall, assume a somewhat novel aspect in Lord Grenville's correspondence. Readers of Lord Buckingham's letters during his tenure of the same office in 1788-1789, published in Volume I, will remember the strong personal antagonism that embittered his conflict on the Regency question with Mr. Ponsonby, leader of the Irish Whigs and close ally of the Duke of Portland; and his deep mortification at what he considered the ingratitude of the Crown for services rendered during that political crisis. Constant disappointment of his hopes of royal favour, for which he held Pitt in some measure responsible, did not suffer those feelings to subside during the five following years. In this frame of mind he resented the appointment of the Duke of Portland as Home Secretary, with an intention, avowed soon afterwards, of restoring Ponsonby to office in Ireland under Lord FitzWilliam, as a repudiation of his own acts as Lord Lieutenant by Pitt and Grenville, who had been, parties to them ; and when, in spite of his remonstrances, the new arrangements had been completed, he gave free vent to his indignation in letters to both.<sup>1</sup> Grenville's replies betrayed deep pain on account of his brother's reproaches, and conveyed the most earnest assurances, which a letter from Pitt confirmed, that Buckingham's reputation had been particularly guarded by the rejection of every proposal which could be interpreted as casting a slur on his Irish administration. Buckingham however demanded as a public testimony of the approbation of the Crown, either the endowment of an Irish peerage for his second son, or a seat in the Cabinet for himself. On these terms being rejected, he broke off all relations with Grenville and Pitt until the recall of FitzWilliam afforded him the satisfaction he required. An attentive perusal of the following papers, Buckingham's letters to Grenville, dated September 20 and October 1, 1794 ; Grenville's Minute, dated March 1795, of the conditions imposed on FitzWilliam at a conference he'd in Pitt's house in November 1794 ; Buckingham's letter to Grenville, dated November 24, 1794, and the reply, dated December 5 ; Pitt's letter to Buckingham, dated December 20, 1794 ; Buckingham's letters to Thomas Grenville, dated December 30, 1794, and to Grenville, dated January 3 and 23, 1795 ; Grenville's letters to Buckingham, dated January 23, FitzWilliam, dated January 28 (answered on February 9), and Portland, January 31, 1795 ; and, finally, Buckingham's letter to Grenville, dated March 11, 1795,<sup>2</sup> leaves an impression that the personal sensibilities of the Marquis of Buckingham formed an important though hitherto unappreciated factor in the shaping and the ending of a political episode which has provoked much controversy. It would appear from the endorsement, dated February 15, 1799, that Lord Grenville's Minute, as printed in this volume, was a first draft, which Pitt afterwards corrected. On March 28, 1795, Grenville sent a copy of it, no doubt in its final shape, to Lord Camden; with a request that it might be shown to Mr. Pelham, who had already gone to Ireland as Chief Secretary.<sup>1</sup>

This is probably the document to which Mr. Lecky refers in his history of that time, as having been found by him among the Pelham Papers.

While this Irish question was still in debate, his strong objections to a project approved by Pitt and a majority of the Cabinet, of a new convention with the King of Prussia for the hire of 60,000 troops to expel the French from the Dutch Provinces, seems to have determined Grenville to retire from the Ministry. The reasons on which he based this resolution are fully set forth in an official minute; but, in deference apparently to Pitt's wishes, he postponed giving it effect until the close of the session.<sup>2</sup> The King at first concurred with Grenville, but northern Germany having been exposed to invasion by the march of General Clarfait's army to Mayence, to replace the Prussians withdrawn from the Rhine, he changed his mind. The treaty of Basle, signed on April 5, 1795, between France and Prussia, by putting an end to Pitt's project, appears to have restored harmony in the Cabinet.

A comparative statement of the conditions of two new conventions concluded by Great Britain with Russia and Austria, and constituting a triple alliance for defensive purposes, will be found at the end of the correspondence for May 1795.<sup>3</sup> The Empress Catherine despatched twelve ships of war to join the British naval squadron in the North Sea. Financial exhaustion, jealousy of Prussian designs, and a strong inclination to peace in the Imperial Diet, seem to have paralysed Austria. It appears from a letter of General Clarfait to Count Starhemberg, dated April 9,<sup>4</sup> that preparations absolutely necessary to enable the principal Austrian army to take the field, were still under consideration at Vienna. Starhemberg had proposed to Grenville on March 8, the adoption by Austria and Great Britain of a plan of combined operations in France, drawn up by General des Rosières, an eminent French strategist.<sup>5</sup> Lord Cornwallis, now a member of the Cabinet, thought that no better scheme could be framed, and recommended that it should be sent to Vienna for the Emperor's approval.<sup>1</sup> But apparently neither of the powers on which the execution of it devolved, could undertake to carry it out. In May, after protracted discussion, the terms of an Austrian loan to be raised in London on the guarantee of the British Government were finally settled. It was not however until the following July that the money was despatched in a man-of-war to the mouth of the Elbe, for transmission to Vienna.<sup>2</sup>

Against these discouraging circumstances might be set off the prospect, which British Ministers seem to have regarded as certain, of a sudden and complete collapse of the Jacobin Republic. An anonymous report in French gives a vivid picture of the miserable condition of France in the spring of 1795, under the combined pressure of famine, anarchy, and financial embarrassment; and of the rapid progress of a conservative movement for the restoration of religion, monarchy, and peace. The writer's statements are amply confirmed in an abstract, made by or for Lord Grenville, of speeches in the French Convention, and reports of British diplomatic agents.<sup>3</sup> The comments on these reports, as well as Grenville's minute, dated April 23, of a conference with Count Wedel,<sup>4</sup> Danish Minister in London, testify to his firm conviction that the provisional government dragging out a precarious existence in Paris, could not possibly continue the war. French and English accounts bear witness alike to the ascendancy of Siéyès in the French Convention.

Two of the circumstances which told fatally against the success of the unfortunate expedition to Quiberon Bay in June 1795, are clearly brought out in the correspondence; (1) a general disinclination of continental governments to allow facilities for the enrolling of regiments of French émigrés; and (2) the long detention of Count de Puisaye in London while the Ministry considered his proposals, a main cause of the submission of the Royalist Chiefs at La Jaunaye in February 1795. Notwithstanding an urgent request from the Cabinet, the King refused to set an example to other German Sovereigns by allowing a dépôt for French recruits to be formed in Hanover; and would only consent to Count d'Artois's sojourn there for a very limited time.<sup>1</sup> An abstract of numerous letters addressed by the Chouan chiefs to Puisaye during the winter of 1794-5, insisting on the need of immediate succours from England, and of his own return to Brittany, is included in the Addenda.<sup>2</sup> When accounts arrived early in July of the occupation of Quiberon peninsula by Puisaye's small force, and the good dispositions of the Chouans, Pitt determined to send nearly 20,000 British troops, under the command of Lord Moira, to support the French insurgents. A British ship of war brought Count d'Artois from the Elbe to Spithead to join the expedition.<sup>3</sup> Later news of Puisaye's defeat retarded the naval and military preparations; and the peace concluded at Basle between France and Spain caused the enterprise to be abandoned. Lord Buckingham was at this time quartered at Southsea with his regiment of militia. Several of his letters to Grenville during the month of August are almost exclusively concerned with the situation of the French prince, who, in order to avoid arrest for debt, lived on shipboard for several weeks in a painful state of suspense and discomfort, until the Cabinet despatched him and the French regiments which had escaped from Quiberon, to join Count de Charette in La Vendée.<sup>4</sup> General Doyle accompanied Artois with 4,000 British troops to protect his disembarkation on the coast of Poitou.

A long and interesting report by Baron de Nantiat, who was sent by Lord Grenville early in July on a mission to Charette and did not return until after Artois's departure from England, exposes frankly the wants, plans, and sentiments of the great royalist chief, at this critical period of his career.<sup>5</sup>

These expeditions, projected or actually undertaken, formed part of a general plan of operations, which also embraced the eastern provinces of France, under the superintendence of Mr. Wickham, British Minister in Switzerland. Wickham's efforts, involving a profuse expenditure of money, had a two-fold object; to raise the strength of the Prince of Condé's army on the upper Rhine by drawing into its ranks, from the interior of France, Republican soldiers who had disbanded for want of pay; and then to use this force and the Austrian army to which it was attached, for the encouragement and support of royalist insurrections, having their centre at Lyons. According to his own reports, the whole scheme failed; the second part mainly, as appears by his letters, dated August 4 and 12, and September 6 and 7, from want of co-operation by the Austrian generals. Sir Morton Eden's letters from Vienna, dated May 4 and August 26; Grenville's letters to the King, dated July 26 and September 9; and particularly Mr. Drake's "secret and confidential" report from Italy, dated August 28, throw additional light on the inaction of the Austrian armies during the whole summer of 1795.<sup>1</sup>

Lord Grenville's correspondence shows that the political state of the Dutch Republic also occupied much of the attention of the Ministry during the year 1795. A compact entered into with the Prince of Orange in February, soon after his flight to England, having for its object the rendering up of ships and fortresses still acknowledging his authority to British officers,<sup>2</sup> may not improbably have facilitated the acquisition by Great Britain of valuable Dutch colonies in South Africa and the Eastern seas. In the same month Lord Grenville sent Count Charles Bentinck on a secret mission to Holland, with instructions to keep alive a spirit of resistance in the Orange party by discreet assurances of help whenever it could be given with effect.<sup>3</sup> M. Fagel, who had been Greffier under the Orange Government, accompanied Bentinck to Hamburg. Finding there that they could not proceed to the Hague without personal danger, they retired to Varel, in Oldenburg, where they seem to have enjoyed ample opportunities of corresponding freely with their friends in the Dutch provinces. Their reports, especially those of Fagel, afford much information, no doubt of a partizan character, of the condition of the Dutch under the democratic institutions they had borrowed from France. A large part of the army and navy of the Republic had remained faithful to the House of Orange, and refused to serve new masters. In the course of the summer a plan was formed to assemble the disbanded troops at Osnaburg, in British pay, and hold them ready to march into the Provinces whenever the course of events proved favourable to a counter revolution. A letter of the Prince of Orange, dated July 22, asking the co-operation of the King of Prussia, and the King's reply condemning the project as a violation of the treaty of Basle, to which Hanover owed its present security, are included in the correspondence.<sup>1</sup> Under strong pressure from Berlin, George III., as sovereign of Hanover, engaged in September to remove all foreign troops from the Electorate, and conform strictly to the treaty of Basle.<sup>2</sup> Fagel retired to Switzerland in the spring of 1796. Bentinck remained at Varel, carrying on political intrigues, and sending reports of them to Grenville, until the treaty of Loeben in 1797 closed for a time all prospect of foreign intervention on behalf of the House of Orange.<sup>3</sup>

Most of the King's letters during the last months of 1794, and the first months of 1795, are concerned with preliminary arrangements for the marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Princess Caroline of Brunswick, whose journey to England under the care of Lord Malmesbury was much retarded by the French conquest of Holland. In November 1795, the Hereditary Prince of Wirtemberg became a suitor for one of the King's daughters, but, judging from George III's first letter on the subject, with little prospect of success.<sup>4</sup> The prince's perseverance, however, gradually surmounted all the obstacles raised by his Majesty's dislike of the alliance, and the marriage was celebrated in the spring of 1797. The King peremptorily rejected the addresses of the Duke of Ostrogothia, who aspired to the hand of another English princess.<sup>5</sup>

In September 1795, the correspondence begins for the first time to betray signs of discouragement in regard to the prosecution of the war, and a sense of the expediency of making peace if peace could be obtained on honourable and advantageous terms. Indications of this disposition may be found in the Duke of Portland's letter to Grenville, dated September 23; Windham's letter of October 11; Pitt's letters of October 16 and 18; and an undated letter of Mornington, in reference to the new French constitution.<sup>6</sup> Pitt's letters just cited conveyed to Grenville a decision come to by him self and Dundas, to recall from Isle Dieu the forces of General Doyle and Admiral Harvey, which had retired thither after an ineffectual attempt to land Artois on the French coast. They show that he had made up his mind on three points ; (1) not to allow the cause of the French monarchy to stand in the way of negotiation for peace ; (2) not to risk British troops in aiding French Royalists ; but, (3) in answer apparently to Windham's vigorous protest of October 11, to supply the royalist insurgents, so long as war lasted, with arms, clothing, ammunition and money. It appears, however, from a later letter of Pitt, dated January 3, 1796, that the supplies thus promised could not be conveyed during the winter months to Charette, then in extreme need of them.<sup>1</sup> It is also clear from Windham's letter, dated February 18, 1796, that the engagement was allowed to remain a dead letter in regard to all the other insurgent chiefs, until his spirited remonstrances, with which Grenville expressed full concurrence, produced some tardy attempts at performance.<sup>2</sup> Detailed accounts of British expenditure under this head of service may be found in Windham's letters to Pitt, dated September 2, and November 15, 1797.<sup>3</sup> The military efforts of Great Britain were now apparently concentrated upon conquests in the West Indies, particularly of St. Domingo, of which France had obtained entire possession by her treaty with Spain.

Lord Buckingham's letters in November refer, in a lighter vein than might be expected from an alarmist, to riots in London, and feeble opposition in the Legislature to repressive measures introduced by Government.<sup>4</sup>

In December, M. Regnier sent Grenville a report on French affairs, containing short accounts of the Directors and their principal Ministers, who formed the executive government of France under the constitution of the year III.<sup>5</sup>

George III. rejoiced in Marshal Clairfait's victories over the French Generals Pichégu and Jourdan in the autumn and winter of 1795, as fortifying his argument that Great Britain should not think of peace until France had been reduced to submission.<sup>6</sup> But, much against his will, the Cabinet at the end of January 1796, entered upon a series of negotiations extending over nearly two years, with the view of bringing the war to a close on favourable terms, or convincing the nation that such terms could only be won by persevering in it. Lord Grenville's scheme of pacification, submitted in outline to the King on February 9, seems to have embraced three main proposals: (1) to purchase the co-operation, or at least the armed mediation of the King of Prussia, by an agreement to hand over to him at the end of the war certain Westphalian bishoprics and the Austrian Netherlands; (2) to reconcile the Emperor to this aggrandizement of a dangerous rival by allowing him to add Bavaria to his hereditary dominions; (3) an overture to the Directory, through Wickham and Barthélemy, the English and French Ministers at Berne, for the holding of a Congress to discuss terms of peace. The King condemned the project as "immoral and unjustifiable," and only yielded reluctantly to the advice of his Cabinet.<sup>1</sup> But the preliminary hints of British diplomacy receiving little encouragement in either of the German capitals, and the proposal for a Congress being rejected at Paris in terms which George III. considered "insolent," the whole scheme was laid aside for a time.

Lord Elgin's confidential letters from Berlin as British Minister during the years 1796 and 1797 give us pictures of the governing influences and unstable policy of the Prussian Court not less curious and discreditable than those contributed by his predecessors, Lord Malmesbury and Sir Morton Eden.

The increasing difficulties Pitt had to encounter in providing money for carrying on the war, which formed no doubt the main motive for Grenville's negotiations, are brought clearly to view in the correspondence for 1796. It appears from a letter of Count Starhemberg, dated April 12, that the British Treasury could not arrange for a new loan, of which Austria stood in absolute need.<sup>2</sup> This failure was particularly unfortunate because, as Wickham's letters from Fribourg and Berne, dated April 30 and June 15, indicate, Bonaparte's astonishing victories in Italy had already begun to alter the whole military and political situation in favour of France.<sup>3</sup> Among other bad consequences they seem, by exciting suspicions, expressed in Grenville's letter to Sir Morton Eden of May 24 and Pitt's letter to Grenville of June 23,<sup>4</sup> that Austria would make a separate peace, sacrificing the Netherlands to save Lombardy, to have delayed the monthly advances from the British exchequer, in anticipation of an Austrian loan, on which the Emperor chiefly depended for the pay of his armies. It would also appear from Eden's reply that Baron Thugut was disposed to reciprocate Pitt's want of confidence in his intentions; and Wickham's letter of July 19 represented the French princes and their agents as actuated by deep distrust of the British Government.<sup>1</sup> Pitt, in his letter just cited, informed Grenville that, so far as he could see, "any idea of our enabling Austria to act with effect beyond the present year is out of the question. In this "situation" he continued "it would be inexcusable not to try "any chance that can be tried, honourably and safely, to set "on foot some decent plan of pacification." On July 29, Grenville, in the name of the Cabinet, again brought his scheme for dictating terms to the French Government before the King in a more definite and complete form, and asked authority to send Mr. Hammond, his Under Secretary, to Berlin and Vienna, in order to discuss it with the Prussian and Austrian Governments. The King repeated his objections with more method and detail, and equal emphasis. Pitt and Grenville replied that the safety of England required the expulsion of the French from the Netherlands, which could only be effected by the co-operation of Prussia and Austria; and that the union of these powers could only be procured by the inducements which the Cabinet proposed to offer. Having summoned the two Ministers to confer with him at Windsor, the King again gave way.<sup>2</sup> In adopting the "Italian politics" so distasteful to his sovereign, Grenville seems to have been more or less influenced by Robert or Gouverneur Morris, who figures prominently in the French bulletins of Volume II., as Minister of the United States of America in Paris. Morris, according to information which Count Woronzow and Bland Burges derived from conversations with him, and conveyed to Grenville in letters, dated June 21 and 28, 1795,<sup>3</sup> having been recalled from Paris at the request of the French Government, came to England with feelings of hatred for the French Revolution, and sympathy for Great Britain as the chief bulwark of civilization.

Through Burges, then Under Secretary at the Foreign Office, he sought an interview with Grenville, in order to give confidential information in regard to the situation of the French Government and the means of frustrating its designs.<sup>1</sup> In the summer of 1796 he went to Germany, apparently for the purpose of ventilating political ideas intended to promote the aims and interests of England, and combat those of France. And he communicated with Grenville from the various capitals where he sojourned in a series of anonymous letters. These letters are very curious and interesting, as well on account of the power of keen observation they display, as for reports of discussions with leading statesmen, and sweeping plans of territorial redistribution, evolved with all the freedom of irresponsibility, but often anticipating changes since accomplished or attempted.<sup>2</sup> In forwarding the first of them from Berlin, on July 28, Lord Elgin reported that Morris was listened to with deep attention and interest by Count Haugwitz and the foreign ministers at the Prussian Court; and expressed a hope that Morris "had authority to speak in behalf of England." Grenville writing on August 23 to Hammond, then on his way to Berlin, recommended him to show "attention and a proper degree of confidence" to Morris, whose ideas were "not wholly dissimilar to those on which we "are acting, though carried into a much wider field of speculation than I should like to see opened."<sup>3</sup> Morris, it may be noticed, in re-arranging the map of Europe, gave Hanover to Prussia, and the Austrian Netherlands to Great Britain.<sup>4</sup> Hammond's mission failed, though supported by the "indirect menaces" of Catherine II. Count Haugwitz having, as afterwards appeared, come to a secret arrangement with the French Directory, treated the British envoy with rudeness, and the latter left Berlin abruptly without awaiting further orders from home.<sup>5</sup>

On September 2, Lord Grenville, with the King's consent, applied to the French Directory through the Danish Minister in London, for a passport authorising a British diplomatist to go to Paris, in order to discuss terms of peace.<sup>6</sup> The instructions by which the envoy was to regulate his proceedings form part of the correspondence. The King considered the answer returned from Paris too discourteous to admit of further parley; but the Cabinet, in order to prevent mis-representation, as Grenville explained, repeated the application by the bearer of a flag of truce.<sup>1</sup> The demand thus made being complied with, Lord Malmesbury went to Paris as British Plenipotentiary in the middle of October, accompanied by Mr. George Ellis as his confidential adviser.<sup>2</sup>

In the meantime a confidential despatch from Baron Thugut to Count Starhemberg, dated September 10, announced that the Empress of Russia had consented to place 60,000 troops in the field against France, on condition of receiving a subsidy from Great Britain about equal in amount to that paid to Prussia in 1794.<sup>3</sup> In this state paper the Imperial Chancellor marshalled with great skill the arguments calculated to bring the British Government into an arrangement on which he felt that all hope of an advantageous peace depended. But he insisted that it should not entail any diminution of the monthly advances which alone enabled the Emperor to keep his armies on foot. Pitt could not undertake to provide more than three millions sterling altogether for Austria and Russia, in the coming year. The Cabinet, however, with the King's consent, offered to transfer to the Empress Catherine the sovereignty of Corsica, and thus give her what she had long coveted, a naval station in the Mediterranean.<sup>4</sup> Her sudden death in November put an end to warlike projects which found no favour with her successor.

The brilliant successes of the Archduke Charles in Germany during the autumn, and a temporary check suffered by Bonaparte in Italy, raised the spirits of the allies. But Pitt's announcement, through Sir Morton Eden, of a diminution of the pecuniary help he had been affording to the Austrian Government was received with the utmost consternation at Vienna. In November, Thugut instructed Starhemberg to insist on monthly payments of 200,000*l.* from December 1, 1796, with an additional 400,000*l.* for the month of January 1797, in anticipation of an Austrian loan of 4,500,000*l.* as absolutely required to enable the Emperor to open and support another campaign.<sup>1</sup> Pitt appears from the subsequent correspondence to have been desirous of supplying Austrian needs; but the embarrassments of the Bank of England tied his hands; and although the Loyalty Loan enabled him to send 300,000*l.* to Vienna in January,<sup>2</sup> it was not till April 4, 1797, that Grenville found himself in a position to give Baron Thugut anything like positive assurance of further aid.<sup>3</sup>

The slow course of Lord Malmesbury's negotiation at Paris, clearly foreshadowed in the terms of Lord Grenville's instructions, may be traced in the correspondence for the last quarter of 1796. Writing to Pitt and Grenville on November 28, Malmesbury brought the business to a point.<sup>4</sup> It had become necessary, he stated, to send him the project of a treaty, and to specify the articles on which he must insist. If the allies allowed France to retain Belgium, he anticipated little difficulty in coming to an agreement. The project returned by Grenville denying this concession, the French Government sent Malmesbury his passports in the middle of December. Grenville seems to have hoped that the Loyalty Loan would cow the Directors.<sup>5</sup> But they appear to have been much more influenced by the death of Catherine II., and a declaration of war by Spain against Great Britain, announced to Parliament by a royal message on December 12. Letters from the King and Pitt at the end of that month compliment Grenville very highly on his able defence of the conduct of the Government in an official manifesto, and a speech in the House of Lords.<sup>6</sup>

In January 1797 the tortuous policy of Count Haugwitz seems to have revived hopes that Prussia might be lured back into a coalition against France. Every expectation of this kind, however, vanished in March, when Lord Elgin transmitted from Berlin a copy of the secret treaty concluded between the French and Prussian Governments in August 1796.<sup>7</sup>

Bonaparte's victories in the Tyrol and descent into Carinthia, having reduced Austria to extremity, the King authorised Lord Grenville on April 10 to despatch Mr. Hammond on another mission to Vienna. Hammond was instructed to propose a joint appeal to the Emperor of Russia, to intervene for the restoration of peace; and also to take part as colleague of Sir Morton Eden in any negotiation which the approach of the French army to the Austrian capital might compel the Emperor Francis II. to open.<sup>1</sup> Before Hammond landed at Cuxhaven, Bonaparte had signed the preliminary treaty of Loeben with Count Meerfeldt and M. de Gallo. An interesting letter from Count Razoumoukoi, Russian Minister at Vienna, to Count Woronzow in London, gives some curious particulars relating to this event.<sup>2</sup> The reticence of Baron Thugut in regard to the terms of the treaty, and his subsequent postponement of any arrangement for repaying the Austrian debt to Great Britain, ruptured for a time the close and more or less cordial relations that had existed for four years between the British and Austrian Governments.

Final discussion in regard to the conditions of a general peace had been relegated by the treaty of Loeben to a conference at Berne, open to the allies of the contracting powers. The British Government, however, being now released from obligations to Austria which had hampered negotiation in the autumn of 1796, preferred making another direct and separate overture for peace to the French Directory. In a letter dated June 1, the King expressed in confidence to Grenville his painful sense of the national humiliation involved in this step.<sup>3</sup> The answer returned by De la Croix, French Minister for Foreign Affairs, had a highly provocative tone. On June 16, Grenville informed the King that he found himself unable to concur in a second communication to the Directory approved by his colleagues, considering it deficient in spirit; but that his obligations to the Crown did not permit him to quit office in the dangerous crisis through which the kingdom was passing.<sup>4</sup> He referred more particularly to the mutiny of the Nore. The correspondence shows that in June Admiral Duncan had only two ships of war left to watch a powerful Dutch armament in the Texel, until, at Lord Grenville's request, Count Woronzow assumed the responsibility of ordering the admiral in command of a Russian squadron in the North Sea, which had been recalled to the Baltic, to defer his departure, and rejoin Duncan.<sup>5</sup> A sympathetic note from the King enjoined Grenville to remain at his post to direct the negotiation with France<sup>1</sup>; and explanations of a conciliatory character having been received from Paris, Lord Malmesbury repaired early in July to Lille, to confer with M.M. Letourneur, Pleville, and Maret, representing the French Republic. Confidential documents relating to the negotiations at Lille, now published for the first time, are of extraordinary interest, revealing clearly the strange conditions and the various channels, one public and two secret, through which those negotiations were carried on.<sup>2</sup> Two members of the Directory, Carnot and Barthélemy, supported by a large majority of the Legislative Councils, and the ardent wishes of France, desired peace. The three remaining Directors, Barras, Rewbell, and Lepaux, forming an ultra-Jacobin and ruling majority, and De la Croix, Minister for Foreign Affairs, only sought for a plausible pretext, which they hoped to find in the British demands, to continue the war. France having been aggrandised by the acquisition of the Austrian Netherlands and other territory in Germany and Italy, the British Government, taking its stand on the ground of compensations, demanded that Great Britain should be indemnified by the cession of Ceylon, the Cape of Good Hope, Cochin, and Trinidad, her conquests from the Dutch and Spaniards. De la Croix replied that the Directory had pledged itself not to surrender Dutch Colonies without the consent of the Dutch Government; and consent being refused, the public conferences at Lille came to a dead-lock. In this emergency, Maret, acting in concert with Carnot and Barthélemy, and as he thought with Talleyrand, who now replaced De la Croix at the French Foreign Office, arrived at a private understanding with Malmesbury that they should work together in concert to make peace on terms which France and England could honourably accept.<sup>3</sup> Maret promised on behalf of his political friends that pressure should be used at the Hague to bring the Dutch to a more compliant mood. In order to guide their action in this respect, he sought to learn in confidence from Malmesbury how far the British Government would relax its demands. At the same time he avowed that the strength and efficiency of French pressure at the Hague would depend on the issue of the conflict then waging between the Jacobin Directors and the majority of the Legislative Councils. In these circumstances, all the parties concerned seem to have come to a tacit agreement to mark time at Lille, until the struggle in Paris was decided. Full particulars of these secret transactions are contained in minutes of intelligence brought from Lille by Mr. Wesley and Lord Granville Leveson, members of Lord Malmesbury's embassy; and in letters of Malmesbury, Grenville, and Canning, Parliamentary Under Secretary at the Foreign Office. The confidential communications from Lille, in which the Frenchmen concerned are designated by false names, were, with the King's sanction, read only by Pitt and Grenville<sup>1</sup>—of the leading Ministers; despatches merely recording the formal proceedings of the plenipotentiaries being circulated by Canning among the other members of the Cabinet. The coup d'état by which Barras and his friends re-established a Revolutionary government early in September while retaining the forms of the French constitution, brought this second stage of the negotiations to an end. The Directory recalled Maret and his colleagues from Lille; and, through two new representatives, MM. Treilhard and Bonnier, repudiated the basis of compensations hitherto accepted, and required Lord Malmesbury to return to London for authority to agree to a full and unconditional restitution of British conquests. Malmesbury's reply, drafted by Lord Grenville, refused to resume negotiations with a power which did not observe the usages of civilised nations.<sup>2</sup> Talleyrand, who adhered to Barras, appears to have played a double part in the proceedings at Lille.

But the high-handed action of the French executive seems to have been partly intended to screen a corrupt overture to Pitt. An American gentleman named Melville arrived at Lille in August, and proceeded thence to Holwood, as bearer of an offer from the Director Barras to sign a treaty satisfactory to Great Britain, in consideration of a secret payment of 450,000*l.*, to be made after ratifications had been exchanged. Lord Malmesbury at first gave no credit to Melville, but Pitt saw grounds for considering the proposal authentic; and having consulted Dundas and Grenville, he wrote to the King on September 6 for permission to entertain it. His letter suggested that the money required might be taken, without danger of publicity, from the revenues of India and the Secret Service Fund, and that the business of concluding and carrying through the bargain on the terms stipulated should be committed to Lord Malmesbury.<sup>1</sup> These secret communications seem to have been interrupted by Malmesbury's return to London in September, and Melville's return to Paris, later in the same month. But they were resumed on a somewhat different basis in October, by means of a letter from Boyd, a well-known banker, to Dundas. Grenville appears to have avoided taking any active part in them, and his letter to Pitt, dated October 8, shows that he concurred in them with great reluctance and misgiving. The affair fell through, as may be gathered from Pitt's letter to Grenville of October 18, in consequence of failure on the part of the French agents concerned in it to satisfy the requirements of the British Government; namely, clear proof of the authenticity of the proposal, and such a public declaration by the Directory as would enable Lord Malmesbury to return without discredit to Lille, where M.M. Treilhard and Bonnier still awaited him.<sup>2</sup>

A financial minute of Pitt, dated October 25, estimates prospectively the annual supply and expenditure for four years more of war; and shows strong faith in the efficacy of his Sinking Fund to prevent the growth of the National Debt.<sup>3</sup>

Letters from Mr. Pelham and Lord Camden, dated November 2 and 3, appear to have been written in anticipation of hostile motions in the British Parliament on the subject of military outrage in Ireland.<sup>4</sup>

On being fully apprized of the victory of the war party in Paris, the Austrian Government hastened to terminate its differences with the Directory by the treaty of Udine or Campo Formio. Interesting observations on this pacification, the relations of Austria and Great Britain, and the prospects of the Triple Alliance, may be found in a letter from Count Razoumousskoi to Count Woronzow, dated November 1.<sup>5</sup> In the same month Frederick William II., King of Prussia, died. A letter from Lord Elgin, dated December 10, and letters from George III., dated December 23 and 24, give views of the interior of the Prussian Court under the altered conditions of a new and virtuous reign.<sup>1</sup> But sanguine expectations of the British Government that the reputed influence of the Duke of Brunswick with the young King might be used effectually to restore the alliance of England and Prussia proved groundless. The language of Frederick William III. was patriotic and high-minded; but the direction of Prussian policy remained in the hands of Count Haugwitz.

The report upon these papers has been prepared, and the introduction has been written, by Mr. Walter FitzPatrick, who also edited the first volume on the Grenville collection issued by the Commissioners.

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 1, London.—“The time for preparation is slipping away very fast; and after some examples that we have seen, we have no reason to hope that the opportunities of repairing what may now be lost will be numerous or long continued. If we wait for the conclusion of these necessarily tedious negotiations with the Court of Vienna, on a subject too where they are not pressed to decision by any very strong wish or necessity, we shall lose the season for raising any considerable force under the Prince of Condé on that side of France.

“My idea is that we should directly send a M. D'Artez, who is here and has been long marked out for the station we are speaking of both by the Duc D'Harcourt and others, with a commission to the Prince de Condé empowering him immediately to raise a regiment, naming the officers himself, and giving to M. D'Artez, who is already known to him, such commission as he may think fit, and as his former rank in the army may entitle him to. I would then send M. Lambertye, whom his Majesty has been graciously pleased to favour us with, to concert with Wyndham at Florence about raising a regiment in those parts; and if any place besides the dominions of the King of Sardinia can be found as a dépôt for that regiment, would send the Marquis de Miran to Turin to open there a rendezvous for all the well affected who either are already out of the country, or may be drawn from the provinces in that neighbourhood. There is every reason to hasten these measures, not only because the time now remaining to us is barely sufficient for the purpose, but because the effects of the present milder system will be to call back many into France who might be well contented still to remain out if they were furnished with the means of subsistence. My reason for proposing the Marquis de Miran is that he commanded in Provence for 15 years ending with the Revolution, and gave, in the last crisis, the most distinguished proofs of zeal and good conduct. This consideration is sufficient for giving him a preference over others that may have been on the Duc D'Harcourt's list, and for departing from a rule hitherto not uniformly observed, and certainly not necessary to be observed, of excluding from the command of regiments all above the rank of Maréchal de Camp. If there should be any objection to giving the corps to M. de Miran, he might be stationed at Turin as Lieutenant General to superintend the formation of M. Lambertye's corps, and any other corps that it might be found practicable and expedient to raise there. M. Lambertye too, who makes more difficulties than he ought to do considering his good fortune in getting a corps at all, may be sent with letters to the Prince de Condé, desiring the Prince either to keep M. Lambertye with him, and to send an officer of his own into Italy, or to let M. Lambertye go on as proposed, and keep his own officer for the quarter nearest him. Some measures of this sort are absolutely and immediately necessary. For besides that we must have the force, Italy is in the most immediate danger, being so completely defenceless that there is nothing, I apprehend, to prevent the merest handful of French that should once pass the frontier from marching to the further extremity. The emigrant French, now dispersed in Italy, are in perfect despair on that account, and are driven by that despair to join in a wish which nothing else could dictate, namely a wish for peace. At the same time that that country may certainly, under proper management, be made to yield great means, not only for its own defence, but for that which may be very necessary for general success, offensive operations on that side of France. The first step is to begin raising there some force in our pay, and I know of no better way of doing so than those which I have pointed out. I reflect with great regret, and some shame, that steps for this purpose have not been taken sooner. One idea by the way occurs to me at this moment not unworthy of being considered, namely the landing there the Duke de FitzJames, with his officers, and possibly even another of the Franco-Irish regiments who have, I fear, but little prospect of speedy success in Ireland, and who would not find the same ill-dispositions towards them that may be apprehended in some parts of Italy against the emigrants. No objection would probably be made to them in the Pope's States; and we need have no jealousy of them, any more than the Corsicans would have if employed, where they will be sufficiently wanted, for the defence of Corsica.

"This is connected with the question of more direct communication with the Pope, which I cannot but wish to see effected, and speedily, though possibly not through the medium of the person who has so earnestly recommended it. Why should not Frederick North in his way to Corsica be directed to pass through Rome, with some letters of civility to the Pope? It will be a good opening of communication, and connected with the idea of it which you entertain.

"At all events I would send two of the Irish Colonels to fill up their regiments with French, Italians, and Corsicans, instead of attempting only to fill them up, as I fear will be the case, with Irish, whom they cannot get either without encroaching upon the success of other corps."

Postscript.—"I wish you would concert with Mr. Pitt a short letter to be sent to the coalition in Normandy by a person whom I have here ready to go, and who waits only for these credentials. A general assurance vouching for the person, and quieting them as to any views of conquest, is all that is wanted."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 3, [Stowe].—"I have purposely avoided of late correspondence with you upon political subjects, from the apprehension of any misconception which might make our situation even more painful than it has yet been; and your letter of yesterday has shewn me the necessity for that precaution; as nothing but the strongest misconception could have induced you to offer to me a picture so humiliating and so disgraceful as that which you have drawn for me, when you suppose me to have offered (by my last letter to my brother) to Mr. Pitt the alternative either to share his measures, and to become responsible for them with him, or, to take at the same moment a line directly hostile to them. I have not kept a copy of that letter; but upon revising it, you will see that the proposition is of two distinct parts; the first a wish to know whether there existed an inclination, or even a possibility of enabling me to co-operate in the King's service in the Cabinet; and the second, a declaration, which I think I can give from recollection nearly in the words of the letter, that if this proposition could be entertained, I am ready to come to town to receive from Mr. Pitt the communication of his measures of which I know nothing. If I have stated this fairly, you will judge of the feelings with which I read from you a statement so widely different from what I meant to convey. I will repeat it in a few words. I felt myself disavowed by Mr. Pitt's arrangements and yours respecting Ireland; I am assured no such thing was meant; I persisted in my opinion of the impression respecting this transaction; and, notwithstanding your assurances, I know that I am well founded in this opinion. Mr. Pitt's letter and yours rejected one part of an idea calculated to remove this impression, and leant to the other, which I have declined, considering it so insignificant that it could not answer that purpose. The arguments in these letters for rejecting the provision for my son did not apply to a proof of consideration, or of the King's countenance, not beneficial from pecuniary objects. Any proof of that sort is in itself a measure calculated to remove impressions, arising from the Irish measure of which I complain. I held myself bound by considerations of affection, of habits, and of the public situation of the country, to endeavour to meet any disposition to remove from my mind the load which has been thrown upon it; and, with this view, I opened in my letter to Mr. Grenville an idea which could give me no profit, no power, no patronage, but much of everything that I disliked; and, in case the general idea could be entertained, I offered to come to town in order to learn and consider the measures to which I should be supposed and bound to accede in accepting such a situation. It is possible that upon this part of the explanation I must have separated and relinquished the idea; but I knew that one step would be clearly gained that would facilitate my union with Government, I mean the countenance it would give to my government and conduct in Ireland. It was also possible that the measures both respecting the great external and internal difficulties of this kingdom, and respecting Ireland, might have been such as I could accede to; and, in that case, much of the impressions which have arisen of the unkindness and disavowal marked to me (for upon this I am as well informed as you can be) by Mr. Pitt and you would have been done away. Such have been my impressions, and such the motives which dictated that letter. I saw many reasons which might defeat it; but I did not foresee in any answer from you a statement so injurious and degrading to me. It is not probable that Mr. Pitt should see the political difficulties to this idea less strongly than you do; and I cannot expect him to think more favourably of my conduct and of my character; and I therefore perfectly agree with you in thinking it useless to open this idea to him. But as your letter refers me to the stand made by Mr. Pitt and you in the course of that Irish negotiation against a particular demand as a proof of his and your consideration for me, I must protest most explicitly against this being urged to me in that point of view. Had it been so stated to me at the time, I should have claimed it as a right that it should not be considered (singly and by itself) upon this ground. And I must remind you what must be my impressions from the proofs now lying before me that this compact for, what I term, the surrender of Ireland to the Duke of Portland, and for the measures which disavow so grossly my conduct and government, was made above twelve months since; from the recollection that the only communication which I have had either with Mr. Pitt or you upon this subject arose from a conversation which I forced upon him in the second week of October, and from a letter to Mr. Pitt of the 13th October, which remained unanswered for nine weeks, while he completed the whole of this measure.

"At some future time these reflections will, I am persuaded, severely pain you; but I sincerely hope you will not feel one half the misery which I feel of every description, from the cruel and unworthy treatment which I have received; but, till that time arrives, I feel that I have lost the affections of a brother whom I loved as myself."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 5.—"Mr. C. Bentinck proposes to take the first opportunity the thaw affords for going by the Elbe to his brother's estates in Germany, to learn from thence whether he can enter with safety the United Provinces and join his brother at the Hague, with the view of concerting such measures as may tend ultimately to rescue the United Provinces from their present state of subjection, and restore to them their antient and independent form of Government as re-established in 1787.

"That from his certain knowledge of the good dispositions of very many, and of the determination of his own family to avail themselves of every circumstance to re-establish the Government, he conceives that the arrival of such a person as himself, countenanced and avowed as he is known to have been by this Government, might be a great means of keeping all the friends and adherents of the House of Orange united; of even procuring them the additional support of the old aristocratic anti-Stadholderian party; of preventing any premature and inconsiderate attempts for their emancipation; his apprehensions being much greater on that side, than his opinion of their patience to wait for the proper occasion. He thinks it may be the means, at the same time, of transmitting correct and confidential information of the state of things and persons, as well French as Dutch, in that country.

"For the attainment of this object it seems desirable that he should have an authority in writing to assure the friends of the system meant to be supported of the readiness of this Government to co-operate in carrying into effect any well concerted plan of measures for that purpose. And should those operations be completely successful, and in that case only, he trusts he shall not be disavowed should their accomplishment have been purchased by engagements to the amount of from ten to twenty thousand pounds, or even any greater extent to secure that work.

"That the object of his journey is of so delicate a nature, and may involve so many of his friends in the greatest difficulties and personal danger if it is not kept a profound secret, that he wishes it not to be known to any, without exception whatever, but his Majesty and his Ministers that he has had any communication on the subject with those in power on this side the water; that he cannot insist too much and too strongly on this point, and on his journey passing off as an inconsiderate or ill-advised step, taken contrary to the wish of his friends; that secrecy is so much more necessary that it may be advisable for the execution of the plan for him to remain to all appearance quite inactive at the Hague, or perhaps even at his brother's house in the north of Germany, without perhaps being heard of for some months, and to all appearance seem entirely to have forgot that he has been in England; that, whilst he is absent, he will hear with more satisfaction, at least for the present, that he seems forgot here, than of any praises that may be given him for his zeal, as too many expressions of that sort might render him perfectly unable to be of any service under the present circumstances.

“Should his plan meet with support, upon his receiving the necessary authority he will take the earliest opportunity the breaking of the frost will admit of to set out on his journey. Mr. Bentinck cannot help repeating his wish that the secret might remain (unless the enterprise is attended with success) with Lord Grenville, Mr. Pitt, and the Duke of Portland; as his plan does not commit the ministers concerned, and binds them to no one point unless attended with complete success. This last point, however, Mr. Bentinck must leave to the wisdom and discretion of the three persons above mentioned, to whom he submits this project.”

LORD GRENVILLE to W. WINDHAM.

1795, January 5, Dover Street.—“You will see in the last letters from Sir Morton Eden that the state of the Austrian arrangements with the Prince of Condé seems to put his passing into the King’s service entirely out of the question, especially as in his letter to the Duke D’Harcourt he states the impossibility of his taking any such step except with the Emperor’s consent.

“I have some doubts whether, in the present state of Italy, either M. Miran or M. Lambertye could succeed in raising French corps there, and whether we ought to incur the expense of making levies there where we never could turn them to any account, so at least as to enable them to act with any British force. These, however, are only doubts, and if yourself and those of the King’s other servants to whom the consideration of this subject more immediately belongs, are of a different opinion, no exertions of mine shall be wanting to forward the measure.

“If it is found that the Irish Brigades cannot be raised in Ireland, it seems that it would certainly be an advisable measure to send one or more of them to Italy with a view to their being employed in Corsica, which would not be liable to the same objections as might arise against the employing there persons who were merely French emigrants.

“If there is no inconvenience in sending Frederick North through Rome I will write by him to Cardinal Zelada, and he may judge on the spot whether anything can be done there from which benefit can be derived.”

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 6, Windsor.—“I am fearful of giving any fresh directions to Lord Grenville as to the journey of the Princess Caroline of Brunswick lest they should occasion some difficulty, and think therefore, as by the arrangements taken by General Walmoden and Lieutenant General Harcourt some decisive step can soon be taken, it may be better not to give any positive directions for a change of route; but Lord Grenville may consult Lord St. Helens whether, if the enemy should succeed in keeping possession of the Waal, it would be possible at this season of the year for the Princess to go from Osnabruck to Embden, in which case he should send notice of it to Lord Malmesbury; and Commodore Payne should have notice to remove from the Texel to Embden.”

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1795, January 11, Dover Street.—“Lord Grenville has the honour to inform your Majesty that he has this morning seen the Greffier Fagel who received in the night advices from Holland up to the 9th instant.

“No particulars are stated of the affair of the 30th, but it appears that the attack made by your Majesty’s troops on that day had been successful; and the French do not seem to have made any subsequent attempt to cross the Waal. The thaw begun on the 5th.

“On the other hand the lines between Breda and Gertruydenburg had been forced, and the Dutch troops which were in them had surrendered on the same terms as had been granted to the garrisons. Grave had also capitulated on the 26th ultimo.

“By a letter from General Walmoden and the British general officers, the Prince of Orange had been apprized that in their opinion it was impossible much longer to defend the Waal, and that it would then be necessary to retire behind the Leck. Strong representations had been made by the Prince of Orange, stating the danger to which this measure would expose the Province of Holland.

“It appears from an extract which the Greffier read to Lord Grenville of a report in Dutch from Prince Frederic of Orange, that Leerdam and Asperen had actually been evacuated by the British on the 6th, but that those posts had been re-occupied on the 7th.”

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 11, Windsor.—“The Dutch at Breda and Gertruydenburg have kept up their shameful former conduct. I am therefore glad General Walmoden and Lieutenant General Harcourt think of giving up the defence of the Waal and of retiring behind the Leck, as the safety of the troops under their command must otherwise be very precarious by the shameful conduct of the Dutch.”

LORD ROBERT STEPHEN FITZGERALD to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 13, Berne.—“I never shall be able sufficiently to express my gratitude for the favour of your much obliging letter of the 9th December by the messenger Courvoisier, or to say how truly happy I am in the choice you have so judiciously made of Mr. Wickham to replace me in this country as Chargé d’Affaires.

“The offer which your Lordship proposes to make me, when I have the happiness of seeing you, of one of the two northern missions is truly flattering and pleasing to me, and I shall accept, with the most heartfelt acknowledgments, of any post you may think proper to appoint me to. I honestly confess that I shall quit this country with pleasure, for my situation had become extremely irksome and painful from a variety of circumstances, better explained in a quarter of an hour’s conversation than by volumes of paper; although the main one was my connection with Mounier, and the provoking consequences of that most inconsiderate man’s overbearing conceit and unaccountable imprudence. Mr. Wickham, although well disposed to keep the connection open in as far as it may be advantageous to the public service, is now, in consequence of what he has himself observed of that gentleman’s real character, fully on his guard against him, and will, I hope, do me the justice to assure your Lordship that my dislike to him proceeds from no personal motive or pique, but from the fullest conviction of his being a man in no manner to be trusted, full of pride and deceit, abominated by the Swiss in general, and a friend to England only in as far as he, like all his countrymen, considers that country as necessary to his personal advantage and secret views. I may add, par parenthèse, that if this Revolution has been attended with misery and wretchedness to nations and millions of individuals, that it has also been productive of some good in opening the eyes of men on the real character of Frenchmen, and of exhibiting to the world in its true colours that horrid mass of infamy, perfidy, and wickedness of every description, which had been so long concealed under the veil of politeness and urbanity, to the great misfortune, at all ages, of those who mistook the appearance for the reality. Sorry am I to say that I think there are but very few exceptions to be made amongst them, but how can it be otherwise with men who are become the agents of the Devil, and who, openly disavowing God and the truth, harden their hearts against every thing that has hitherto been held sacred among men. They are become like a second race on earth, and it may truly be said that the world is inhabited by two sets of human beings, by men and Frenchmen. And unfortunately these monsters are not confined to their own limits, for those who are expelled are as exceptionable as those who remain in France. But this digression is unpardonable, as your time must be more than fully engaged at this important crisis, and I therefore entreat your forgiveness for having thus given vent to those sentiments which experience and a long acquaintance with that shocking people have at length impressed invariably on my mind.

"If my return to England is not quite so expeditious as your Lordship, and indeed myself, could wish, I trust you may with your usual indulgence account for it in the extraordinary rigour of the season, a circumstance to be considered by a married man with two very young children, in the difficulties attending so long a journey at this time, and in the necessity of making certain arrangements in my private affairs which the hope your Lordship has given me of not returning to this country naturally calls for.

"The messenger has been detained thus long in consequence of the expectation Mr. Wickham has been in of being able to obtain some interesting intelligence from France; how far it has been realised I shall leave to him to explain to your Lordship in his private letter by the same conveyance. If anything is to be done however in that way, I make no doubt of his succeeding, for his zeal, activity, and intelligence are certainly very great. As I have nothing to mention in addition to what I have had the honour of saying in my official letter to your Lordship, I shall make no improper use of your time and patience, but conclude with the renewal of those assurances of lasting gratitude for your Lordship's goodness to me."

"Postscript.—That wig-block Stael openly announces himself in this country as a negotiator for the re-establishment of peace; and a journey which he is immediately about to take to Paris is much talked of here. Mr. Barthélemy is gone to Basle, and he has had several interviews with Monsieur de Stael as well as with Monsieur de Goltz, late Prussian Minister at Paris, who is likewise at Basle and lodged at the house of a distinguished magistrate of that town. Monsieur de Goltz, whom I knew at Paris, passed for a man in whom his Court had no sort of confidence, and as a person of very poor abilities. But perhaps his propensity to Jacobinism may, like Monsieur de Stael, have got him a similar employment upon the grounds of the old saying set a thief to catch a thief; for certainly no honest man can deal with the villains who rule France."

W. WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 13, Berne.—“In my public letters I have omitted to say anything upon the subject of the expenses that, under the authority given me, I may probably incur.

“I left London at so short a warning, and the nature and object of my journey were kept so secret, that I had no opportunity of obtaining any information or preparing myself in any way against such an emergency; and as I saw and consulted with nobody but your Lordship, I find myself now under the necessity of throwing myself entirely on your goodness.

“If your Lordship means that I should draw upon a banker in London, as Lord R. Fitzgerald tells me that he has always done, I will say very fairly that I have not that credit at any banker's in London that will allow me to do so. I must therefore leave it to your Lordship's goodness to make the necessary provision for my credit, in what quantity and in what manner you shall think most right.

“With respect to my own expenses, my journey cost me exactly 170*l.*, including the purchase of an English post-chaise on the road. I have received one hundred pounds from Lord R. FitzGerald, and have immediate occasion for another.

“Your Lordship may be well assured that I should be full as careful of the public money as of my own, particularly of what were to pass through your Lordship's hands. I should, however, esteem myself particularly happy if you would be pleased to limit me in my expense to a sum certain.

“I am sure your Lordship would wish to let me be here, to a certain degree, on a respectable footing, otherwise my situation would be a painful one. When I say respectable, I mean nothing more than that which would allow me to give small quiet parties to a few friends.

“I know it is liked here, and that without it you are quite without consideration; besides, I believe a truer thing was never said than this, que le petit souper est le tamis des secrets.

“But, in this respect, whatever may be best for the public service, or shall be thought right by your Lordship will be always most agreeable to me, and you may be assured that I shall conform myself most exactly to it.

“There is another point upon which I shall venture to speak to you confidentially, and, if I take too great a liberty in so doing, you must remember that I am encouraged to it by the kindness which your Lordship has been pleased to show me. I am a family man, passionately attached to my own home, who never knew what it was to be away from his wife and child before; and I have need of the most intimate persuasion that some real advantage must arise from the separation before I can submit to it.

“I can answer, however, boldly both for myself and Mrs. Wickham that, if there be any real advantage to be obtained by her staying, or any appearance to be saved by it, that not a murmur will be uttered by either the one or the other of us.

“I have written a number of arguments pro and con upon the subject; will your Lordship have the goodness to put an end to the difficulty at once, and say to Mr. John King whether there be any real objection, or no, and he will make the proper use of it.

“I will say very fairly that I find I shall want both a friend and a secretary, and I know not where else to take either the one or the other.

"Your Lordship has thrown a responsibility upon me that makes me tremble. God grant that I may do no discredit to the confidence you have been pleased to place in me.

"I cannot conclude this letter without repeating my obligations to Lord R. FitzGerald. Far from observing anything like jealousy or distrust, I have ever received from his Lordship the most kind and attentive politeness in private, and the most generous and manly confidence in all public business in which I have had occasion to communicate with him.

"I assure your Lordship his conduct has made a lasting impression upon me."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1791, January 15, Queen's House.—"The original intention of remaining at Osnabruck till the situation in Holland was more settled was a very proper intention, and I am sorry that too sanguine an advice from Lord St. Helens and Lieutenant-General Harcourt changed the plan of Lord Malmesbury. Now there seems to be no other mode to be followed but the Princess's remaining at Osnabruck till the yachts can have a fair wind and the Elbe be open for their getting to Stade. I desire Lord Grenville will send those directions tomorrow; might it not be right to send a duplicate by Hamburg, as the packets have now orders to go there."

EARL FITZ-WILLIAM to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

Private and Confidential.

1795, January 15, Dublin Castle.—Extract.—"I shall send over a recommendation of Ponsonby as Secretary of State. He wishes to set out with that title, that the world may not think a new place is established for him; but, in a few months, he will relinquish that title, and let it and its duties be turned over to the Lord Lieutenant's secretary.

"I have settled the removal of Beresford who, having served 25 years in a Revenue Office, may have a pension chargeable on the incidents, to the amount of his salary. With this he is satisfied, and himself and family promise support. I also feel the necessity of removing Cooke and Hamilton, who are in too confidential offices to remain, when, in truth, one cannot give them one's real confidence. A thousand reasons, which I cannot detail, have compelled me to make up my mind to this measure, to which I felt strong reluctance; but I am satisfied it is right. The Solicitor-General will be removed to the Bench, and, I believe, thinks himself well taken care of."

LORD GRENVILLE to C. BENTINCK.

1795, January 17, Whitehall.—"As you have been so good as to undertake to proceed to Zealand, I wish to state to you in this manner the general outlines of the ideas which have appeared the most advisable under the present circumstances.

"The apprehensions that the French may have over-run a part or the whole of the province of Holland, make it very desirable that the well-disposed party in the Republic should, if possible, be collected in the province of Zealand so as to make a stand there, with such assistance as could gradually be sent to them from hence. With this view it would be of the utmost importance that you should endeavour to communicate with the garrison of Bergen-op-Zoom, to induce them to hold out for some time longer in the hopes of such succour as it may be found practicable to afford them from hence. It would also be desirable that you should endeavour to ascertain how far the disposition of the different classes of the inhabitants of that province is such as would afford the prospect of their making such a stand as I have mentioned; and co-operating with such force as may be sent from hence in order to maintain that province against the French, and to retain the means of availing themselves of future circumstances which may arise to recover the other provinces.

"Your own discretion and knowledge of the country will enable you to supply many particulars which will arise out of these general ideas, but which I feel it unnecessary to detail to you. I will only add that we shall be extremely anxious to receive from you the earliest intelligence of the state of that country.

"The same considerations as are stated above apply also to the Brille [Brielle], the possession of which in the hands of the well-affected party would be of the utmost importance towards the recovery of the province of Holland."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 18, Queen's House.—"Whether the memorial that accompany's this from the Marquis del Campo is in the style the Spanish Court would in former days have thought consonant with its dignity, or whether it does not better suit the personal character of the Ambassador it is not my purpose at present to decide; but as I think a well understood concert between Austria, England, Spain, Portugal, Sardinia and the Italian States essential to the restoring that system of operations which can alone promise real success against the enemies of mankind, I am glad the present memorial has been delivered, as it will afford a proper occasion for Lord Grenville's giving a proper answer, and assuring the Spanish Court that, as soon as we can secure a real co-operation with the Court of Vienna, we will openly enter into the communication of such a plan of operations as, by every part of the allies acting at the same time with vigour, may throw the common enemy into the most probable state of distress."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 20, Queen's House.—"I very much approve of the idea intimated to me by Lord Grenville that Mr. Elliot shall be sent to Yarmouth to compliment the Princesses of Orange on their safe arrival, and to offer their being lodged at Hampton Court; Kensington is so totally unfurnished that it would be impossible to lodge them there.

"I will send the Marquis of Salisbury notice that he may make the best arrangement for them the present moment can permit."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794 [1795], January 21, Queen's House.—"As the States General have offered to surrender at discretion, I do not see any advantage in the Stadtholder's having remained there; I therefore rejoice at his and the two Princes his sons' safe arrival. I trust the necessary directions upon a second requisition from me to the Lord Chamberlain has been sent to prepare suitable apartments at Hampton Court. I have just given orders to the Lord Steward's Department for cooks to be sent there; and the Duke of York is gone this morning to the Princess of Orange. He will no doubt see the Prince at Colchester, and will advise their not hurrying up, that they may on their arrival be more suitably received."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1795, January 21, [Whitehall].—"The Duke of Bedford has this day stated the words of his intended motion for the information of the Lords. I enclose to you Cowper's note of them, which is, I believe, precisely the same with that which we had.

"Upon re-consideration, I cannot help thinking that any appearance of wishing to evade or alter so plain a proposition may have a bad effect in the country, and that nothing could answer so well as your taking those words and moving them as an amendment to Grey's motion, so as to mark the infinite difference between them. If the thing is possible to be done, the effect of doing this would be very good.

"I have been trying to incorporate these words into a form of resolutions according to our last night's idea, and my brother has been working with me. I really think we have succeeded, but of this you will judge.

"Return me Cowper's note, as it is an authentic document which may be useful if, on your taking these words, they should attempt to change them in the House of Lords.

"Nothing could be better than the ridicule which would attach upon them if this idea should turn out to be practicable; and, besides this, I really think the impression in the country which we desire to give, would be better given in this form than in any other."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 21, Deal.—"Since I had the honour of writing to you yesterday I have been on board, but finding it impossible even to get to sea, I went on shore again. From what I told the master of the cutter, I have no doubt he will go as soon as there is a chance. Your Lordship will easily believe how very much against my will I am detained here.

"I have met Captain Berkeley several times, and from his conversation and way of thinking, as far as I can judge upon so short an acquaintance, I have every reason to flatter myself we shall pull together very well; and that I shall derive every assistance I can wish from his support, as he is vested with such unlimited powers for the object we are going upon. I am happy to find I have been mentioned to him in such a manner that he is inclined to place confidence in me, independent of his being instructed to do so. Should I yet be so fortunate as to come in time, I cannot help flattering myself with success from the full powers of this officer, and the conciliatory language he is ordered, and seems of his own accord inclined, to hold. Under these circumstances, and with the chance of success that is given me, for which I am so much indebted to your Lordship, I am very impatient to sail."

1795, January 23 [Stowe].—"I passed some houses yesterday morning with my brother, in the very painful task of explaining to him my reasons for thinking that, in the present unfortunate state of our minds, our mutual affection could not be promoted by an intercourse of a nature so very different from that which it has been my constant and earnest wish to cultivate; and I endeavoured to prevail upon him to state this in the terms the least painful to you; but, in consequence of his declining to charge himself with this explanation, I am obliged to repeat to you that the only intercourse which I can have with a brother, is that of confidence, esteem, and affection. And the transactions of which I complain have most cruelly convinced me that you no longer retain those sentiments towards me."

LORD GRENVILLE to the MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM.

1795, January 23, Dover Street.—"I can only say, in answer to your note, that as there is on my part no alteration in those feelings which I have always borne towards you, nothing can prevent my taking every mode of marking them to you, but the knowledge of its being disagreeable to you. I am very confident that the time is not distant when you will feel that such has been my uniform conduct towards you. In the interval, as the obstacle, whatever it is, to the continuance of our former habits exists in your mind only, it must be for you to decide on the degree and nature of the intercourse which you may wish to maintain with a brother, who will never cease to bear towards you the sentiments of steady and zealous friendship, and of sincere and warm affection. But, be assured that whatever temporary distance may be interposed between us by the unfortunate impressions which you have conceived, it can make no diminution in the eagerness with which I shall embrace any appearance of returning confidence, or any opportunity of manifesting towards you those sentiments with which I shall ever be your most affectionate brother."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 25, Queen's House.—"Agreeable to what I mentioned in a former note to Lord Grenville of my intention of going to Kew this day to make such arrangements as might lodge the Princes and Princesses of Orange till Hampton Court should be ready for their reception; I have been there and can now acquaint him that every thing shall be ready for their arriving there to dinner on Wednesday. I find two carriages can be found for their journey which I shall order to be sent to bring them to Kew."

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

1759, January 26, Dover Street.—"I return your Grace the paper from Mr. Erskine. The Court of Rome has long been pressing us to send there some accredited Minister, but the doing this is liable to objection from old prejudices which are better allowed to die away gradually. The possession of Corsica, if it remains with us, naturally affords a channel for this, and I think it would certainly be advantageous if Mr. North should pass through Rome in his way there, in order to settle some means of intercourse. The impatience of the Court of Rome has, I think, been a little increased of late by the conduct of Mr. Hippesley, who, though he has certainly been active and useful in a sort of volunteer negotiation for supplies for our fleet and army, has, I think, proceeded a little further than was necessary. Mr. North's presence would set all this right.

LORD GRENVILLE to EARL FITZ-WILLIAM.

Private.

1795, January 28, Dover Street.—“I have received from Mr. Sackville Hamilton, for whom I have long entertained a sincere good will and favourable opinion, a letter mentioning his dismissal from his situation in Lord Milton’s Office. Feeling that in an arrangement of that nature I can have no right to interfere, however much I regret it, I have no other motive for troubling your Excellency with a copy of that letter and of my answer to it, except the desire of not maintaining any correspondence on such a subject without communicating it to you.

“The strong and natural interest which I feel in whatever affects the character of Lord Buckingham, and the reputation of his Government, to the measures of which Mr. Pitt and myself were parties, obliges me to mention to your Excellency the subject of the arrangements of the Revenue Boards, respecting which it is stated to me that a language is held in Dublin very contrary, I am sure, to your sentiments and intentions. I feel too entire a confidence in what you expressed on that subject when we met at Mr. Pitt’s, to have any other uneasiness respecting it than that which arises from the prevalence of these reports however ill-founded, and from the apprehension that they are countenanced by persons of weight and confidence. I am certain that, before any measure on that subject is decided upon, the fullest opportunity will be given to your colleagues in this country to consider its bearing, both on their own characters, and on the general interests of Government.

“I beg to assure you that there is no person who more sincerely wishes you every sort of success and satisfaction in the difficult task which you have undertaken than myself.”

SECRET REPORT ON THE STATE OF THE FRENCH NAVY.

1795, January 29, Brest.—“I wrote to you from Dunkirk and Havre de Grace, which I hope came safe to hand, respecting the cargo which is to come to Havre de Grace in the spring, which I hope will come in time. On my arrival here, where I was in hopes to have made some purchases of ships, but found all those ships that were good for anything in a state of requisition for the Republic, and those that are not, have not any stores on board. I do assure you I found a deal of difficulty in getting through the country for the want of horses and provisions, for the country is in a state of starvation for the want of bread and all the necessaries of life; and for fifty leagues I was obliged to have twelve dragoons to guard the carriage for fear of the brigands. They say the people of la Vendée are near 150,000 in arms. If I am well informed there is at this time a truce for one month, for the National Assembly and them to see if they can come to some terms; and I must say two-thirds of the people in all Brittany are of this way of thinking; and I cannot tell what will be the consequence in the spring. The weather has been very severe for these five weeks past, and not broke yet. Captain West from Boston tells me that there is likely to be a war between England and our country. Should it so happen, we may expect great help from this country. They have a fine fleet, they say thirty-five sail of the line and twenty-five frigates at sea; and the St. Aspre [St. Esprit] of one hundred and ten guns almost ready to come out of the dock after a thorough repair, and two of eighty guns and one of seventy-four now in the harbour fitting out. They will have forty sail of the line next cruise, with as many frigates and sloops of war, which I think is plenty to meet the British fleet. There are this day arrived seven sail of the line that parted from the fleet, with thirteen frigates and sloops of war. They have brought in four prizes, one called the Russia Merchant from Martinico; but I am sorry to say that they have not stores to fit the fleet out again, except they get a fresh supply. If you can bring any kind of naval stores, you may get any price for them. I am very sure there are not stores to fit out the ships that are in the harbour. There are some few Danes that have brought some small quantity of cordage, but nothing to speak of. They have several ships building, but not in a forward state. The other part of their fleet is expected every hour. I am sorry to say I cannot purchase a ship or two here, although since the commencement of the war to this day, there have been from two hundred and ninety to three hundred prizes brought in here, but that is the greatest number from the best information. I cannot get to L'Orient, but find there is nothing there that will answer. Therefore I shall go to St. Maloes and Cherbourg to make a finish. I shall write if possible from thence, but shall hope to see you at Havre de Grace in April. You will not let this letter be seen should you happen to be in England."

Endorsed by Lord Grenville.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, January 31, Queen's House.—"I return to Lord Grenville the letter he has received from Field Marshal Conway with its enclosures; I certainly shall most willingly stand at the head of the subscribers to the proposed publication.

"Lord Grenville may be curious to know my opinion of the Prince of Orange after our interview. He seems to me perfectly well intentioned and a thorough honest man, if possible carrying his candour too far, and most willing to confess his not having conducted himself so well as he might; but rather fond of stating how much he was called forth on all occasions; and I think it is clear that had he had more decision in his character that matters could never have been in the present unpleasant situation. As to the Princess, however I was inclined to think well of her, I own her conduct at present heightens it much, for, though much hurt, she has a dignity that seems to make her situation still more interesting."

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUCKE OF PORTLAND.

Private.

1795, January 31, Dover Street.—"I have the honour to return to your Grace the two letters from the Lord Lieutenant which you put into my hands yesterday. From the manner in which he speaks of the arrangement respecting Mr. Beresford, whom he seems to consider as perfectly satisfied with what has passed, it is impossible not to entertain a hope that the very embarrassing state in which that business now stands has arisen from some misunderstanding; and that, by the channel of communication which has been adopted, the respective sentiments and wishes of the Lord Lieutenant and of Mr. Beresford have not been correctly conveyed to each other ; and I still allow myself to hope that it cannot be the Lord Lieutenant's desire that the King's servants on this side the water should concur in the forcible dismissal of that gentleman. I stated with great sincerity to your Grace last night that I feel it to be very much the duty of all those who are engaged, at such a moment as this, in carrying on the public service, to soften and diminish whatever difficulties may arise, and to do everything for this object that duty and honour will permit. And it is without any diminution of that sentiment that I think I ought not, in returning these letters to your Grace, to omit expressing the concern with which I see in one of them the intention of the Lord Lieutenant on the subject of the office of Secretary of State, an intention of which I was unapprized till I read that letter. When I have the opportunity of conversing with your Grace on these different points, I will mention, without reserve, what occurs to me on this ; and I only advert to it now in order to beg that, if the recommendation shall arrive in the shape in which the Lord Lieutenant has proposed to send it, no definitive step may be taken respecting it till I can have the opportunity of submitting to your consideration what I think material upon it.

"I cannot sufficiently express the regret I feel at these unfortunate and untoward circumstances, which seem likely to produce to us all so much embarrassment and difficulty at a moment when, I am sure, we are all actuated by the same wish of giving all our attention and labour to the public duties which press upon us here.

SECRET INTELLIGENCE FROM BRITTANY.

1795, February 2, Falmouth.—"We have deferred offering any news derived from the prisoners who have made their escape from Quimper, until we could collect from the variety of reports such as are entitled to belief.

"The following circumstances have been communicated to us by a particular friend who left Brest on Thursday evening 29th, and arrived here the 31st ultimo. And as we can place an implicit reliance on his veracity, and know him to be well acquainted with the language and country of France, more than ordinary attention is due to his observations. He passed the last nine months at Quimper, and was in the habits of intimacy with many families.

"Charette is still at the head of a formidable force in la Vendée, and has refused in a late parley to accept the amnesty offered by the Convention on any other terms than his own, among which the restoration of royalty is the principal.

"The moderation of the present day is accompanied by a kind of apathy and indifference among the multitude, and, in very many instances with discontent. Although they suffer less from terror and apprehension, their natural wants have found no diminution ; poverty and famine advance upon them with rapid strides.

"The foregoing assertion has been often controverted, but can now be proved to a certainty ; and the subsequent has an equal claim to credit, that their fleetmen at sea contain disaffected officers. Many of the captains sought for and obtained letters of credit on England, and left Brest not so much with the fear as the expectation of being carried thither.

"Their ships, except six, had little provisions, were weakly manned, and so badly equipped that the Républicaine, a first-rate, went to sea with but one cable and anchor.

"Thus situated, it is not wonderful that their commanders should presage a woeful event, and certain it is that they embarked with this impression.

"Eight ships of the line and six frigates entered Brest harbour on Wednesday afternoon, but had the appearance of coming fresh from some other port more than from sea.

"They were the only ships of war in the harbour on Thursday evening.

"The French dread our fleet, and had it made its appearance before Brest during the last fortnight, a general consternation would have been the consequence."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, February 5. London.—"I understand from a person to be relied on, that there is a M. de Tuisaye here, a Chevalier de Malte, and one intended for a commission in the new corps, who has great interest with the Grand Maître, and is in all respects a very proper person to be consulted with respect to dispositions, prevalent at this time in that country, for entering into connection with Great Britain. He will be to be heard of at any time at Mr. Saladin's, No. —, St. James' Place; and by what I hear of his character, as well as of the dispositions of the Government of Malta, it may be well worth your while to see him before he goes."

C. BENTINCK to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

1795, February 5, Portugal Street.—"I enclose the minute of this morning with a copy. The trifling alterations you will, I hope, approve of, as they only make that more clear which was set down in some haste. I ask for a written authority to act upon this plan when I see the least hope of success. From the cordial and very flattering support given me at different times, if I had only verbal assurances of their concurrence, I should not doubt one moment the fulfilling of any engagement of this nature on the part of the persons concerned, or rather whom I wish to interest themselves in this plan. But I think it right, in point of form, I should have this written sanction from Administration which will serve as a justification of my views and motives to my friends on both sides the water, if it should ever be proper to disclose what passed on the occasion. Unless I see every appearance of success, I shall be very cautious how I even hint at the powers given me to any one abroad, that I may not endanger their safety, and that no one may be embarrassed by an unnecessary knowledge of my intentions; and I will certainly leave for the present my written instructions and authority for the undertaking the journey with your Grace, as it will be sufficient for my purpose that these exist, and I must take care they are not, under any circumstances, found upon me just at this period on the other side the water. I wish no person belonging to the United Provinces to be acquainted with this project, as far as I am concerned; but that I may be left at liberty to let them into as much of my design as the circumstances of the moment and the character and temper of different individuals may make it compatible with their safety to disclose the whole or any part of it; the least indiscretion might be attended with circumstances so fatal to my connections, and might make me lament for ever after, that I ever engaged in the business. I speak from experience in scenes similar in some respects, but that certainly required less caution. I am sure you will not blame me for my anxiety on this point."

A. W. C. DE NAGELL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, February 7, Portland Place.—"En rentrant hier-au-soir chez moi, j'ai trouvé les deux lettres dont votre excellence a bien voulu m'honorer, et que j'ai envoyé au Prince d'Orange. Son Altesse Sérénissime était d'intention d'expédier aujourd'hui des ordres aux vaisseaux de guerre de la République, qui se trouvent dans les ports de la Grande Bretagne, et je ne doute pas qu'elle mettra toute la célérité possible à préparer des ordres pour les Colonies.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795], February 8, London.—"I have no difficulty in mentioning the subject of your letter to the Duke of York, and there can be no doubt of executing your plan, if you can point out any solid reasons for doing so. How do you propose to get the regiment transported from Portugal to Switzerland. I had already, at the instigation of Wyndham, suggested to the Duke of York the propriety of suspending his resolution as to Baron Roll's regiment, but the objection which I found it difficult to obviate rested chiefly on the apparent impossibility of recruiting it."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, February, London].—"I wished to see you this evening, to tell you what passed with Grattan, which makes the business more desperate than ever. I think I must send to see Windham, and therefore shall be glad if you will call here, at any hour you please. I have nobody with me but the Bishop of Lincoln."

EARL FITZWILLIAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, February 9, Dublin Castle.—"Upon my arrival here, I found the connections of Mr. Hamilton so incompatible with those of the persons whom I wished to call into the aid of my Administration, that it was impossible to retain him in the very confidential situation I found him. Of his merits I really have no doubt, and, after stating the cause of his removal, it is hardly necessary to express it. With respect to his situation, I do not think he will be very ill off; for, upon his removal from office, he comes into a pension of 1,200*l.* a year, and, after the 25th March, I mean to add to it 500*l.* more, either to himself or to any of his family, according to his own pleasure. With respect then to net income, I think he will be a gainer rather than a loser; his loss is, a house in town and country.

"As to the alteration in the Revenue Board, it has been simply confined to the removal of Mr. Beresford, whose power and mine were certainly incompatible; and I mean to send over a recommendation for the appointment of a new Board with the omission of his name; but here the matter rests. Whatever may be the reports in London of the conversations in Dublin I know not; but what I can assure you is, that not one word upon the subject of a systematic change in those Boards has ever passed before me, nor have I heard of any such conversations, either in private or public, save only respecting the Treasury Board. As soon as we have gone through our ways and means, Sir John Parnell will bring forward his plan of improvement for that Board, the general outline of which has been settled between him and Mr. Pitt. It certainly is meant that the system of the management of the revenues should be considered, but nothing of the kind shall be carried into execution without a previous communication with your Cabinet."

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1795, February 12. Hanover.—"My letter on Office paper contains everything I know. I have marked it private because at this moment my official correspondence can properly only relate to the princess I am conducting slowly, but I hope surely to England; and indeed, at all times, I should not have felt it right or fair to enclose the Duke of Brunswick's letters in a public despatch. I have seen lately such remarkable proofs of his nervousness and irresolute mind that I really scarce can wish to see him at the head of an army. He was not a little so when we acted together in Holland, but it is grown upon him since to a great degree."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, February 13, Hill Street.—"I send you a letter of M. D'Artez containing a proposal of his which, upon discoursing it over with him, I cannot but think deserving of some attention. He means it only as an experiment; the continuance of which, if successful, should be left to the Austrians. It would certainly be their business to begin it, but, if they will not begin it, as is probably the case, is it not better that it should be begun by us? M. D'Artez is of opinion (and his opinions seem so temperate and well formed that I feel a great disposition always to agree with them) that in the present state of thinking in France, a large defection in their armies might be effected by the use of the means which he proposes. At all events the cost could be but inconsiderable; and as soon as any considerable body should be raised, as much as might amount to a regiment, it might be transferred to the army of the Prince de Condé.

"Upon the subject of this army I feel great uneasiness. I have no idea that the Austrians, if left to themselves, will ever put that army in a state, or employ it in a manner, to make it produce its proper effect. Would it be impossible, though now it is rather too late, to make some stipulation in its favour, so as to require that, as part of the Austrian contribution of force, the Prince of Condé's army should be put on a proper footing, and be kept up to a certain amount? The proper footing will be, besides that of regular pay and clothing, the changing that shocking and prodigal system of using officers as common soldiers, and stopping the dreadful consumption which that system has made, and continues to make, of the flower of French nobility. This would be done by enlarging that army to its proper dimensions, and filling up the vacant spaces by those whom there may be hopes of drawing from the enemy's army and from the interior. To part of this purpose indeed the Chevalier D'Artez present plan is in some degree adverse; inasmuch as by giving commissions to officers from the other side, he lessens the number that would remain for those now serving. The only question is whether you do not gain by the increase of the army, and consequent increase of commissions, more than you lose in that view in the increase of the number of persons to be provided for. There are, I confess, great difficulties. It would be a heart breaking thing to see a Republican officer, newly come over, confirmed in his commission, while hundreds of the old chevaliers were still serving as common soldiers, and liable to be commanded by him. It must be left to the judgment of the Prince of Condé; but, if he thinks the experiment may be made, I should be inclined to be at the expense of beginning it. The fatal adherence of Austria to her views of acquisition, which has hitherto ruined everything, and will but too probably do so in the end, it is in vain to say anything to. I suppose it is impossible to do anything even to mitigate that system. Our mouths are unfortunately stopped by our own proceedings in the West and East Indies. Is it impossible, however, to make them lay them aside for the time, and feel that even the purpose of acquisition will be better attained by not being pursued directly?"

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, February 13, Portugal Street.—“As Mr. Fagel means to sail from Yarmouth by next Wednesday's packet, and it is my wish to accompany him at least as far as Hamburgh, I shall be very anxious to be ready to set out for Yarmouth on Monday next in the afternoon; and to receive from your Lordship, before that time, the instructions and authority in writing which were the subject of our last conversation. I shall beg the favour to know when I may call for them in Dover Street, wishing to see you for a few minutes before I leave town.”

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, February 14, Queen's House.—“The arrangement now proposed by Lord Grenville in concert with Earl Spencer for the embarkation and safe landing of the Princess, as stated in the letter to Lord Malmesbury, meets with my fullest consent; I approve therefore that the further steps may be taken for putting this measure into execution; I have in consequence of it written a few lines to my sister.”

LORD GRENVILLE to C. BENTINCK.

1795, February 16.—

Memorandum for Mr. Charles Bentinck.

“1. In returning to the United States, it is wished that Mr. Bentinck should use his own discretion as to the time and manner of his reappearing at the Hague, so as to create the least possible suspicion of his having any political object or commission in view.

“2. When he is there, the first point seems to be to give to the friends of the old system such secret but confident assurances as would naturally result from Mr. Bentinck's perfect knowledge of the sentiments and views of His Majesty's Government with respect to Holland, so as to confirm our friends there in the opinion that the re-establishment of the lawful Government, and of the former system of alliance, is an object to which the British Government looks with much anxiety; and in the accomplishment of which we would readily co-operate, whenever any favourable occasion shall occur.

“3. It does not seem to be by any means desirable that the dispositions of the friends of the House of Orange, or even those discontents which may be created among persons of a different description by the conduct of the French in the United Provinces, should be called into action till the opportunity shall be sufficiently favourable to afford the hope of solid and permanent success. In the interval, Mr. Bentinck’s attention would best be directed to the object of keeping alive this spirit; but without holding out, even to the persons best affected, the appearance of his having any commission from hence for that purpose; as any such impression might be highly dangerous to himself and his friends, and would tend in some degree to defeat the object which is in view. It would also be very useful that Mr. Bentinck should endeavour to find the means of transmitting from time to time confidential information of the occurrences, and state of affairs in the Republic.

“4. Whatever communications Mr. Bentinck may have to transmit may be safely conveyed through the King’s Resident at Hamburg; or by the means of some of the commercial houses at Amsterdam, whose correspondencies with London must certainly soon be renewed either directly, or through the medium of Hamburg. Mr. Bentinck is furnished with a cipher for this purpose, which is of such a nature as to be easily destroyed in case of necessity. His letters need not be signed, but it would be useful that, soon after his arrival, he should if possible point out to Lord Grenville a safe method of communicating with him.

“5. Matters being thus kept as far as possible in a state of readiness, the most advantageous moment for more active exertion would be that when, from any circumstance, the French should be compelled either materially to weaken, or wholly to withdraw the force they now have within the Republic. This may arise either from internal dissensions in France, or from the success of the allies in any part of the war.

“6. If at any such period a well-concerted plan could be formed by which the well-affected persons in the Republic could be brought forward, and the people at large induced to shake off the yoke of the French, Mr. Bentinck might then, gradually and with discretion, communicate to such persons as would be fit to be trusted with such a secret the fact of his being authorised by this Government to promise to such a plan every degree of support which circumstances could permit; and any pecuniary engagements which he might contract in order to promote the success of such an enterprise, to the amount of ten, twenty, or even thirty thousand pounds, would, in the event of a successful issue to the business, be readily fulfilled. If the enterprise were to fail there would of course be difficulties in answering a demand for sums to so large an extent, nor could it probably be necessary, as the engagements which Mr. Bentinck himself would make would naturally be for the most part conditional, and dependent on success. But, even in the event of failure, any reasonable expence which should have been incurred by him within moderate limits, would be readily defrayed by his Majesty’s Government, the nature of this commission sufficiently showing the confidence they place in Mr. Bentinck.

“7. Nothing is said here of the particulars of any plan of action, this being a point which must of necessity be regulated by local and temporary circumstances; but the two Provinces of Holland and

Zealand are naturally those to which Mr. Bentinck would look for the beginning of any enterprise of this nature, both from their own importance, and from the greater facility of affording them support or assistance from hence. This facility would of course be much augmented by any means which Mr. Bentinck might devise of availing himself of that favourable disposition which has lately appeared in a part of the Dutch navy; and which nothing but the untoward circumstances of the season appears to have prevented from producing effects which might have been of material importance.

"8. Mr. Bentinck may rely upon the utmost secrecy being observed here with respect to the whole of this business; and it is hardly necessary to recommend to him the utmost caution in all his communications, so as to prevent all discovery and, if possible, to avoid all suspicion."

LORD GRENVILLE to WILLIAM WICKHAM.

1795, February 20, Dover Street.—"Published in the 'Correspondence of the Right Honourable William Wickham,' 1870, volume 1, page 21."

GEORGE, PRINCE OF WALES to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, February 21, Carlton House.—"I think if, instead of writing to Lord Malmesbury to write to Mrs. Harcourt, you were so good as to write a sort of official letter to her yourself desiring Lord Malmesbury to forward it, and acquainting him at the same time with the contents, it would have a better effect than leaving it to Lord Malmesbury entirely, whose letter might perhaps admit of the construction of an invitation, instead of carrying with it the authority which a letter in your Lordship's own hand cannot fail of doing."

Postscript.—"Pray call upon me for a few minutes tomorrow as soon after twelve as it may be convenient, should you not be going out of town."

GENERAL DE CLERFAIT to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1795, February 22, Mulheim.—"J'ignore si vous avez reçu toutes les lettres que je vous ai écrit relativement aux malheurs de la Hollande. La dernière était lorsque le Général de Walmoeden marchait et se retirait derrière l'Yssel que tous les chemins de la Hollande et d'Amsterdam étaient ouverts, et la communication coupée avec l'Angleterre, il devait envoyer un courrier, et il est chargé de ma lettre pour vous. Elle était du 17 de Janvier.

"Vous aurez appris aussi par Monsieur Pelier qui s'est retiré à Londres, que nous avons fait tout ce qui a été possible pour engager les Anglais et Hanoveriens à garder le Wahl. Le Comte de Walmoeden m'avait dit pouvoir le faire si j'augmentais les quatre bataillons qui étaient déjà à sa disposition, et qu'il avait placé à Wageningen, de quelques bataillons. Je le fis en envoyer d'abord quatre autres. On voulait attaquer l'ennemi et l'obliger à repasser le Wahl. Les dispositions furent faites, les troupes qui devaient attaquer là furent elles-mêmes dans l'endroit du rassemblement, le Général Alvinzi avait demandé qu'on employa de nos bataillons pour cette attaque, ils furent refusés. Depuis ce moment, on ne s'occupa que du passage du Lech. Mes prières et sollicitations ne furent rien, pendant qu'un adjutant du Général était chez moi pour m'assurer que, moyennant les secours que je donnais, détermineraient de garder la position de Seerdam et de Kuitenburg entre le Wahl et le Lech qui était fort bonne, on se retirait, et repassait le Lech. Je me rendis à Deventer où nos troupes étaient rassemblées pour garder Pandern et le Wahl. Nous étions dans Arnheim, et les troupes Anglaises abandonnaient le Lech et marchaient derrière l'Yssel. J'écrivis dès mon arrivée au Général Walmoeden pour tâcher de le persuader de faire retourner ses troupes, marcher en avant, et qu'avec tous les bataillons que j'avais rassemblés, que j'attaquerais l'ennemi. C'est alors qu'il m'écrivit que ses troupes étaient harassées, et hors d'état de rien entreprendre, et que les Généraux Anglais lui avaient déclaré qu'ils ne pouvaient plus être d'aucun concours dans nulle espèce d'opération. Nous avons gardé notre terre le long du Wahl sans en perdre un pouce, et n'avons dû nous retirer d'une batterie fort avancée au-delà de Pandern, le onze, qu'après avoir repoussé l'ennemi deux fois. Mais les Anglais s'étant retiré d'un poste à la droite de cette batterie sans m'en avertir, l'ennemi arrivait le long de la digue qui tournait cette batterie, tandis qu'il l'attaqua de front, ou de se retirer en bon ordre et sans perdre un seul canon. Cette batterie était peu importante ; par tout où l'ennemi attaqua, il fut repoussé ; et même après que les Anglais eurent passé l'Yssel nous gardâmes le Wahl jusqu'à Pandern.

« Quelque malheureuse et prompte qu'ait été la retraite de l'armée Anglaise et Hanoverienne, je ne peux dissimuler les difficultés que le Général Walmoeden avait à surmonter. L'armée était fatiguée par une continuité de service très pénible ; extrêmement diminuée par les pertes qu'elle avait fait, et plus encore par les maladies ; le soldat dégouté et ne gardant l'ancienne discipline ; les habitants excédés des pillages et des excès énormes, qui se commettaient tous les jours, et prêts à prendre les armes contre eux ; le pays, en partie mal disposé, désirant l'arrivée des Français, et prêt à les séconder ; enfin les inondations qui font la défense de ce pays, gélé, et tous les pays ne présentant qu'une plaine de glace. Si on ajoute à cela l'indiscipline et la confusion qui régnait entre eux, on verra qu'il n'était plus maître de faire exécuter ce qu'il aurait voulu. J'ai, cependant, lieu de croire que voyant l'impossibilité peut-être de défendre la Hollande, il était dès longtemps résolu de l'abandonner, et de faire sa retraite vers l'Allemagne, et non vers Amsterdam, sans qu'il ait voulu me le dire, malgré les demandes réitérées que j'ai fait à ce sujet, même au dernier concert tenu à Utrecht, le 12 je crois, où il a encore dit qu'il n'était pas décidé, tandis qu'il l'était très fort ; ainsi que Milord St. Helens, qui y a assisté, lorsque je lui ai demandé pourquoi il n'avait pas fait sa retraite sur la Hollande, il est convaincu que les règles de la guerre et les circonstances pouvaient exiger, mais qu'il avait eu des raisons de ne pas le faire. Ces raisons sont la certitude où il était, qu'aucune ville ne les auraient reçu ; et que le reste de son armée risquait d'être écrasée par les habitants, tant on les avait en horreur.

de l'armée, nommé Kâp, que j'avais envoyé au Général Alvinzi avec la commission d'aller en avant pour faire les quartiers et savoir si ces bataillons pouvaient passer, est allé jusqu'Amsterdam, et le Magistrat a déclaré qu'ils ne les recevraient pas ; qu'il lui conseillait de faire retourner ces troupes, parcequ'il ne pouvait répondre de ce qui arriverait, n'étant pas maître du peuple. C'est lorsqu'il est allé pour faire retourner ces bataillons qu'il a trouvé le chemin occupé par les ennemis, qu'il est allé vers Helvoetsluys ; et aucun bateau n'ayant pu sortir à cause des glaces, il a été fait prisonnier. Le Général Golofkin, qui commandait à Amsterdam, lui en a donné des certificats qu'il n'a fait parvenir. Avec lui a été pris ce Prince de Salme qui a été longtemps à Londres, et était également en Hollande. On ignorait où il existait. Il m'a envoyé par le même Kâp la lettre dont vous l'aviez chargé pour moi. Le refus d'envoyer ce secours demandé pour Amsterdam, et l'impossibilité de le faire, est le prétexte que pourront trouver ceux qui voudront nous blamer. Mais outre qu'on n'a pas eu le temps de la faire, il est également certain que aussi peu de troupes auraient été forcées par les habitants mêmes de se rendre. Il n'en eut pas été de même si l'armée Anglaise et Hanovrienne s'y était retirée, et que nous eussions occupés l'Yssel.

“Plus de confiance en nous de la part des Hollandais, plus de droiture dans leurs procédés les ont sauvé. Mais avec quelle peine ne nous ont-ils pas donné les subsistances aux troupes qui étaient réellement en Hollande. Nous n'étions jamais assuré de huit jours. Ils étaient convaincus que leur Députés concluraient au moins une suspension d'armes. Ils attendaient ce moment pour nous faire sortir de leur territoire ou nous y affamer. Leur confiance aveugle les a perdu. Ils ont été attaqués et renversés sans se défendre. L'ennemi était à Utrecht qu'ils attendaient encore le courier qui devait apporter la paix. Les Anglais n'en étaient guère moins persuadés. Si le Stadhouder m'avait dit son état, avait voulu un corps qui se serait avancé à la droite des Anglais, et avait fourni ce corps des choses dont il avait besoin, je l'aurais donné ; et les postes qui n'ont pas été défendus, n'auraient pas été si facilement forcés. Jamais révolution n'a été aussi prompte. Six jours ont suffi pour que l'ennemi soit en possession de toutes les Provinces ; et toutes les places fortes ont ouvert leurs portes.

lorsqu' ils devaient arriver, de prendre d'abord possession du Deventer et d'abord après de Zival et de Campen. Mais le Général Walmoeden m'écrivait en date du 30 de Janvier, que les Anglais avaient abandonnés sans ordre Zival et Campen ; qu'il avait envoyé des bataillons Hanovriens pour reprendre ces places. Si on les y laissait rentrer, ce qu'il avait prévu se vérifiait, et cela était tout simple. On trouva les portes fermées. Les bourgeois conseillèrent aux Hanovriens de se retirer, et ils s'en retournèrent. Ces villes avaient déjà appelé l'ennemi. Ces postes essentielles perdus, la droite des Hanovriens n'avait plus d'appui. Le Général Walmoeden quitta Deventer le 31 Janvier, et marcha derrière l'Ems. Nous avions autre chose à faire que de nous retirer également, et après avoir retiré tout le magasin de Doerburg, et celui de Zutphen, que j'ai oublié de dire que nous avions occupés aussi, en relevant les Hanovriens qui y étaient. Après y être resté quatre jours après leur retraite de Deventer, nous sommes marchés partie à Caufeld et Munster, et à la Lippe, où nous sommes. Mes efforts ont arrêté les Anglais et Hanovriens depuis le 17 jour de Janvier que nous avons quitté Arnheim pour venir à Doerburg, jusqu'au 31 de Mars qu'ils se sont retiré de Deventer et marché derrière l'Ems. Si le dégel était arrivé plutôt, je serais parvenu à le soutenir. Si les alliés avaient eu encore un peu de persévérance, je l'aurais également soutenu. Ils sont moins en sûreté, qu'ils ne l'étaient derrière l'Yssel, et ils en sont convaincu. Déjà les Anglais ont abandonné Cowerderd qui couvraient leur avant poste, sans en avoir reçu l'ordre. Si les chemins, qui sont dans très mauvais état, ou l'occupation de l'ennemi en Hollande, ne les empêche d'arriver, il est à craindre que les Anglais à leur approche ne se retirent, et n'aillent derrière le Wesel, et que les Français ne s'emparent de Bremen, et ne coupent, ou rendent bien difficile la communication avec l'Angleterre. Il ne m'est cependant pas possible de défendre l'Ems jusqu'à Embden, mais j'ai laissé beaucoup de troupes dans cette partie, et un corps assez considérable aux environs de Munster, destiné à s'avancer au cas de besoin jusqu'à Meppen pour soutenir l'armée Anglaise et Hanovrienne, qui se rassemblerait, j'espère, et aura la gauche à Meppen, ainsi que j'en ai prié le Comte Walmoeden. Et au cas qu'ils soient attaqués, ce corps près de Munster, lequel s'avancera à Bheren, arrivera facilement à Meppen, et y attaquera l'ennemi. Il faut pour cela que le Comte de Walmoeden concentre les troupes. J'espère qu'il le fera. Nous ferons tous nos efforts jusqu'à l'arrivée de l'armée Prussienne qui s'est mise en marche hier pour se rendre en Westphalie. Mais comme elle ne peut dans cette saison marcher que par des parties, et que sa marche sera une peu lente, la tête ne pourra arriver à Hamme que vers le 10 du mois prochain ; et jusqu'à ce temps l'ennemi pourrait faire des progrès. J'entre dans tous ces détails pour que vous ayez une idée de ce que nous avons fait, et de ce que nous faisons encore, afin que vous puissiez l'expliquer à qui l'appartient, puisque je ne doute pas que j'aurai des ennemis qui tacheront de faire sur moi une partie de cette affreuse catastrophe. Les lettres du Comte de Walmoeden suffisent pour me légitimer si on m'oblige ; mais je voudrais qu'on m'épargne de donner cette publicité. D'ailleurs je le crois trop honnête pour craindre qu'il ne m'ait pas rendu la justice que je crois avoir mérité.

“Je joins ici une lettre pour Son Altesse Royale le Duc d'York, où je n'entre dans aucun détail sur la Hollande et l'Yssel, où je lui dis, en général, j'espère que le Général Walmoeden aura bien voulu me rendre justice ; mais je lui donne plus de détail sur notre position actuelle, et sur ce que j'ai proposé à Walmoeden pour concourir à la défense de la Westphalie, et, par conséquent, de l'Electorat d'Hanovre. Je vous prie de plaider ma cause envers ceux qui m'accuseront. Le court abrégé que je vous ai fait est sincère et véritable. J'en ai les preuves. Je les rendrai publiques s'il le faut, et si vous me le conseillez. Je vous enverrai des copies de tout ce qui a été fait et proposé, et certainement ma bonne volonté peut être démontrée. Ecrivez-moi donc ce qu'on dit; et faites usage de ce que je vous ai écrit vis-à-vis de ceux dont l'opinion m'intéresse beaucoup. J'attends de vos lettres avec bien de l'impatience; elles seront fort intéressantes pour moi. Sollicitez qu'on nous paye exactement ce qui est promis pour le mois de Janvier. On n'a voulu donner que cinquante mille livres sterlings au lieu de cent.

"Lorsque les Prussiens seront arrivés en Westphalie, nous nous rapprocherons de l'armée du Haut Rhin. On disait ces jours passés que le Duc de Brunswick commanderait l'armée en Westphalie, mais cela n'est pas encore décidé. Je sais bien ce que je désire, moi. Si je décidais ceux qui doivent commander, ce serait assurément de n'être pas du nombre.

"Je ne vous ai envoyé qu'une lettre du Comte Walmoeden. S'il était nécessaire de donner plus de conviction, je vous en enverrai d'avantage, et pour ne laisser aucune doute.

"J'ai déferé d'écrire au Duc d'York, avant de savoir l'impression que cet événement a fait à Londres.

"Si vous pouviez là, faire persuader de faire écrire à M. Brook Watson pour qu'il paye régulièrement. Il dit toujours ne pas savoir les intentions du Duc."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795 [February 20-28].—"You will recollect that Tintinnac [Tintinniae] and De la Robrie [Roberie] are both to go to-night, and will have the goodness, therefore, to direct that the two letters, of which you were making out the drafts this morning, should be prepared and sent to me, if you like it, either in Hill Street or in the House of Commons.

"What you do think of sending Monsieur de Miran with a small salary to Turin, to be in the way of procuring intelligence, and improving any advantages that may offer in the southern parts of France?

"You will not forget letters to Trevor, Wyndham, and the Consul at Leghorn, to assist in the formation and transport of the corps of Baron de Roll, Dillon, and any other corps that we may raise in that quarter. I propose to send by D'Artez a copy of the capitulation with Baron Roll, and Mr. Wycombe, I think, should have instructions to close with any proposal of the same form made by persons who can be relied upon for fulfilling it. A regiment so raised, and passed over company by company, seems to afford the only hope of having a sufficient force in Corsica before an attack shall be made upon it."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, February 20-28, Downing Street].—"I have been trying to put together what, according to my ideas, should be the instruction on this unfortunate subject of Prussia, and have desired a Cabinet to be fixed for twelve tomorrow. I should wish much to see you first, and will be at leisure whenever you please at eleven. The more I think on the business the more uneasiness I feel at what you seemed likely to determine, and I want much to talk it over with you at large. I cannot help thinking that the real point of honour and duty in such difficulties as the present lies the other way; and, at all events, I am sure you will not wonder at my anxiety to tell you all that on reflection strikes me."

OFFICIAL NOTE.

1795 [February].—"Sa Majesté Britannique ayant fait à son Altesse Sérénissime le Prince Stadhoudre la proposition de donner aux commandants des forteresses, des troupes et des vaisseaux appartenants à la République des Provinces-Unies l'ordre de se mettre sous la protection de sa Majesté, vu les circonstances dans laquelle la République se trouve par l'occupation de la Province de Hollande par une force ennemie, sa Majesté s'engage, de la manière la plus formelle, qu'elle tiendra qu'en dépôt tout vaisseau, forteresse, ou place quelconque, qui se mettra sous sa protection en conséquence du dit ordre, et qu'elle les restituera à la République des Provinces-Unies dès que sa Majesté et la République se trouveront en paix avec la France, et que l'indépendance de la République et sa Constitution légitime, garantie par sa Majesté en 1788, seront assurées.

MINUTE of LORD GRENVILLE on the PROJECT of a NEW CONVENTION between GREAT BRITAIN and PRUSSIA.

1795, January-March.--"The three points proposed are—

1. "To supply bread and forage for 60,000 men* during their continuance on the left bank of the Ems.

2. "To pay a given sum† after the Prussians have crossed the Yssel, and a further sum‡ when the French are compelled to recross the Waal.

3. "To guaranty the payment of a still further sum§ when the Government of the Stadtholder is restored in the North Provinces.

"The King of Prussia is to be required to break off the negotiations at Basle, to engage not to make peace without our consent, unless France restores all she has conquered from the different belligerent Powers, or at least from Great Britain or the North Provinces.

"In examining this question, it may be taken as a point on which there is no doubt that the sincere and active co-operation of the Prussian army in the next campaign, if it could be secured, would be fully worth the pecuniary compensation proposed to be paid for it.

"The points to be considered are these—

1. "Is there any probability of obtaining such a co-operation at the price now proposed, or indeed by any pecuniary sacrifice whatever?

2. "If not, then will the advantage of a doubtful and precarious support from Prussia be a sufficient compensation for the expense to be incurred, and the inconveniences to be encountered in making this proposal, and in carrying it into effect if it should be accepted?

"With respect to the first point, it depends wholly on a view of the present state and system of the Cabinet of Berlin. Some reliance seems to be placed on the supposed opinions of the King in favour of the war, and on his desire for military glory. But both these arguments were still more strongly and confidently urged last year, and the event showed that no solid conclusion could be drawn from them. He is either so unsteady in his own principles, or so much under the guidance of unprincipled men, or both, that all considerations of the nature above-mentioned, joined to the most solemn engagements of treaty were insufficient to prevent his withholding his military assistance during the summer, and opening a negotiation with France in the winter.

"With respect, therefore, to the King's personal character, and to the inferences to be drawn from any supposed opinions and views of his, these points stand precisely on the same ground now as they did last year, when the Prussian treaty was made and broken.

"With respect to the state of his Court, it is not pretended that any fresh ground of confidence can be derived from the character or views of any man about the King of Prussia. Prince Henry has at present the appearance of greater influence than he has ever had under this reign. But this, if it exists, will be used against us. Lord Malmesbury last year relied much upon the character and supposed interest of Count Haugwitz, but the event showed the insecurity of this ground of hope; since Haugwitz was the very man who, in subsequent stages of the business, was employed to vindicate the breach of the treaty he had made. Till Möllendorf had been tried, his integrity and favourable dispositions to the cause were much relied on. Since his appointment to the command every step he has taken has contradicted both those opinions. The Duke of Brunswick appears for the moment to be eager in the restoration of the former concert, and in the prosecution of the war. But till within these few weeks he has been so completely in disgrace at Berlin that, as Lord Malmesbury tells us, he hardly received civil answers to his letters, not only from the King, but even from General Bishopswerder. The best that can be hoped for from his influence is the momentary prevalence of one party or set of opinions over another. But to the maintenance of a permanent weight with the King of Prussia he is evidently unequal, since he has always failed in the attempt. Even to make the attempt he must be always with the King; and yet the best or indeed the only use to be made of him is to put him at the head of the army, keeping the King at a distance from it. Lucchesini's character and views need not be stated, since all agree that, in order to give any hopes of success to the present plan, he must be kept at a distance from the King.

"Under these circumstances there seems little ground of belief that the present dispositions of the Court of Berlin are favourable to our cause; and still less that they could be kept steady to any line we might wish them to pursue, and which should not exactly accord with their own views of their interest at the moment.

"Can we then make it so clearly and unquestionably the interest of Prussia to push the war against France, in conjunction with us, as to give any just ground of confidence on that head?

"The supposed inducements are those which arise from their pecuniary interest, from their situation as with respect to Holland, from the fear of Russia, and from the general apprehension of the prevalence of French principles.

"To examine these separately. First as to the pecuniary interest; it does not seem to be apprehended that even the whole amount to be received in the event of the most successful campaign would do more than to put into the King of Prussia's treasury, after defraying all expenses, a sum of from 500,000 to 1,000,000, and, in the event of failing in the ultimate object, the expense* would probably more than balance the receipt.

* Last year 1,800,000*l.* was stated as necessary to pay bread and forage for 60,000 men, and other expenses for 30,000. This sum is therefore insufficient for the whole expense of 60,000. But 1,200,000*l.* plus 400,000*l.*, is only 1,600,000*l.*, so that at the end of nine months he would have received, even after passing the Yssel, 200,000*l.* less than he bargained for last year. If it is said that the calculation of 1,800,000*l.* took in 12 months, we must then add to the 1,600,000*l.*, 200,000*l.*, and the result will still give only 200,000*l.* to pay all the expenses of 30,000 men except the bread and forage.

"He is then to act for a speculation, more or less doubtful according to different opinions of the chance of success, but the best issue of which cannot give him more than about a million, while the worst event may leave him considerably poorer than at present. But it surely cannot be doubted that he might easily obtain from France, as the price of peace on their terms, at least as much money as he could, in the best event of the proposed bargain, obtain from us. And if you suppose him to conclude the bargain with us not meaning to keep it, he might get from us 600,000*l.*, or the value of three months' magazines, and the rest from France.

"His interest as to the state of Holland is indisputably very considerable. But may he not justly reason that he can have a connection with Holland only through the medium of one of the two great Powers, England or France; and that if he is to look to a political system with France, it is of great consequence to him to maintain instead of weakening the French interest in Holland.

"In the same manner, his fears of Russia may operate to produce either of the two effects of peace or war, according as he thinks he shall be stronger as with respect to Russia, by having France no longer an enemy, or by having Great Britain again in some degree a friend. And of the two the former seems the most reasonable supposition, and the most likely to operate as a motive for his conduct. It being evidently impracticable for us to obviate in his mind the effects of the steps we have already taken to form connections with the two Imperial Courts.

"On the subject of the danger of the prevalence of French opinions, it is evident that, whatever the personal sentiments of the King may be, his Government acts on no such persuasion; his whole conduct from the beginning of 1793 up to this time, and most of all at the present moment, being in direct contradiction to any such opinion.

"If, in addition to motives of personal intrigues, and of corruption in some of the individuals who surround the King, we are to look for any general or systematic principle prevalent in the councils of the Court of Berlin, it is unquestionably a rooted jealousy and hatred of Austria.

"Under this impression what object of interest can be supposed to be equally important to that Government with the preventing Austria from recovering the Netherlands? and what other clue will so naturally explain the whole political conduct of the King of Prussia since the commencement of the war, as a determination to prevent the acquisition of a barrier to Austria on that side, while that object was in question; and afterwards a determination to hinder the recovery of those Provinces.

"If this be, as I believe, the real principle of action at Berlin, it is evident that we cannot have from that quarter a cordial co-operation in our views; because they are directed precisely to the attainment of that which Prussia most desires to obstruct. And in that case not only the engagements now proposed will be found insufficient for the purpose of obtaining that co-operation, but it is unattainable by any pecuniary sacrifice which we can make.

"If then we cannot reckon with any reasonable ground of confidence on cordial and zealous co-operation from Prussia, either from a view of the present disposition of that Court, or of the system of policy which it is pursuing, shall we negotiate in the hopes of purchasing by money a doubtful and precarious support, depending only on the degree of precision with which we can limit the conditions and proportion the course of payment to that of the services rendered? It is urged in favour of this measure that, by the assignment of local positions for the Prussian army on the maintenance of which our payments are to depend, we shall at least secure some support, though possibly less than we might claim; that we shall certainly prevent the immediate conclusion of peace, and probably delay if not prevent the invasion of Westphalia, and the interruption of our communications of every sort with the Continent. And it is said that these objects will be cheaply purchased at the expense which will thus be paid for them, or even at some additional charge, supposing our expense prolonged some time beyond the period when the assistance of Prussia ceases.

“To these considerations I oppose—

1. “The uncertainty of an assistance depending not on any mutual opinion of common interest in the same cause, but on stipulations which, while on the one hand they carry the open appearance of mutual distrust, must on the other hand be always inadequate to operate as a real check against ill faith.

“It seems to me to be beyond all doubt that, even while the King of Prussia were to keep his army in either of the two first positions specified in the proposals, he might, by collusion with the French, render its presence there of very little benefit to us, while it continued to act apparently in our cause; and, at the same time, keep us in a state of constant jealousy and alarm lest he should withdraw his force, or even turn it against us.

2. “The danger that by negotiating at all with Prussia under the present circumstances we alienate the Austrian and Russian Governments, with whom it should be our policy to endeavour to form the closest union; which can never happen while they are persuaded that we are ready at any moment to resume our former connections and intimacy with Berlin.

“The hope of uniting those three Courts in one common system is one which neither our past experience nor any view of their present situation and disposition towards each other seem to justify. If this cannot be done, the option must be made, and being made, must be adhered to.

3. “The danger that these proposals will be used by Prussia only as a means of obtaining better terms from France, and of maintaining a better countenance at Petersburg and Vienna on the subject of Poland. I differ from those who think that it is for our advantage to enable the King of Prussia to get better terms of peace from France. Because it is at least possible that without the operation and effect which the knowledge of your proposals may produce at Paris, the Committee of Public Safety either may not be disposed, or may not be able, to give him such terms of peace as he can accept without losing all weight in the Empire and in Europe. And because, it being evidently his object to follow up his own separate peace with measures for dictating a general pacification to the other belligerent Powers, whatever gives him weight and consideration assists this plan, the execution of which is evidently contrary to our interests. And even with a view to public impression here a pacification between France and Prussia, on just and reasonable terms, would be more injurious in its effects than one by which the Convention should manifest more plainly the views of ambition and aggrandizement by which it is actuated.

4. “The great danger of our contributing to support in Westphalia, at the expense of this country, an army which, even if it were to act in the first instance agreeably to our wishes by defending that part of Germany, would, on the very first appearance of success on our part in any other quarter, be infallibly so employed as to weaken and distress our operations, and might probably in the end be turned against us, in order to prevent Austria from recovering the Netherlands.

5. "The unfavourable impression which this treaty must produce in Parliament when it comes to be discussed; because with the exception of the case which is hardly to be hoped, of the Prussian army driving the French beyond the Waal, the operations of that force would, in any other event, be infallibly considered as inadequate to the expense incurred. And if the case should happen, which I think the most likely, of our being again deserted in the middle of the campaign after such a treaty, the discredit it would throw upon Government must be such as to weaken if not destroy any hope of obtaining the support of Parliament for another campaign, supposing it should be found necessary to continue the war.

"Of these objections the greater part apply with at least equal force to the opening of such a negotiation as to the conclusion of the treaty. The overture cannot be concealed from the knowledge of Austria and Russia. The King of Prussia has in all cases an interest in making it known at Paris. And if disclosed there it cannot be expected to remain a secret here. Whatever impression therefore is to be feared from the effect of the treaty upon the conduct of the Courts of Petersburg or Vienna will equally be produced by a knowledge of the offer. The objection respecting the facilitating a peace between Prussia and France supposes the failure of the negotiation. And the difficulty here would (if not equally great) be very considerable, if we had to defend the making to the King of Prussia an humiliating and fruitless offer of fresh pecuniary assistance, after having broken off the treaty last year on the ground of his ill faith."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, March 2, Downing Street].—"I send you the draft I have made of the minute according to what I conceived to be the idea adopted yesterday. If it does not find you at home, I have desired it to be carried on. It would be useless to tell you on how many accounts I am miserable at what appears to be your determination. I am not at all sure, however, that the decision will not be different tomorrow, and if it is, tho' I shall feel comfort in one respect, I am not sure, that with my view of the question, I shall not be at least as ill satisfied as now.

"Whatever happens, I am sure your mind will go before any suggestions of mine in avoiding éclat, or any suspicion at this moment of the particular point in question, the premature knowledge of which would in every view be fatal. If the opinion of yesterday is confirmed, I see no way of attaining this end but your letting the dispatch be signed by Dundas or the Duke of Portland, and deferring the execution of your intentions till after the conclusion of the treaty, which must be also near the conclusion of the Session. It is impossible that such a thing as your quitting can take place at the same time with the change in Ireland, or while any material business is to be done here, without increased mischief."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1795, March, Dover Street.—"Feeling every hour more confirmed in my opinion of the effect which the decision of yesterday must necessarily have upon my personal situation, I rather think it would be better that the King should hear it from me by letter, before I see him on Wednesday. But as I perfectly share in Lord Mansfield's dislike to manifestoes and protests, when people are acting in friendship and confidence towards each other, my idea would be merely to state the fact of the difference of opinion, and my sense of the impropriety of my undertaking to execute what I fear will be so detrimental to the great cause in which we are all embarked, and then to add only, in a few words, that I trust this change of situation will still leave me the means of being in some degree useful by contributing, at least as far as my abilities will enable me, to the support of his government, and manifesting on every occasion my unalterable sentiments of gratitude and duty to him.

"If you see no objection to this way of doing it, do not give yourself the trouble of writing. If you do, let me know it. I have as yet said nothing to any of our colleagues, nor will I till after Tuesday, unless you think it better I should."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. WINDHAM.

1795, March 3, Dover Street.—"I enclose the letter which you sent me from M. de Miran. I have considered the subject, and I confess I cannot see how he can in any manner be usefully employed under the Foreign Department at a time when there seems so little prospect of our being concerned in any operations in the South of France, or indeed of anything useful being done in that quarter. This reason alone has prevented my seeing him, as I felt that I would have no proposal to make to him. How far his ideas of being put at the head of any French corps can be made practicable you are a better judge than myself, but I own I fear nothing of that kind can be of much service in that quarter of Europe."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, March 2-7, Downing Street].—"Our Meeting on the Bill is twelve to-day here. I have written to the Duke of Portland to propose a Cabinet at Burlington House at  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 8 this evening. I send you a letter from the King which I have just received. In the first moment he seems to me to have suggested a line which may in some degree unite opinions.

"Be so good to return the King's letter or bring it with you."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 8, London.—"Comme je crains de ne pas réussir à avoir l'honneur de vous voir aujourd'hui, et que la nature des objets dont je désirerais vous entretenir me paraît aussi urgente qu'importante, je vais prendre la liberté de vous transmettre mes idées par écrit. Ce n'est point le Ministre de l'Empereur qui parle officiellement au Secrétaire d'Etat, c'est un honnête homme, et un homme d'honneur plein de confiance dans l'amitié de Milord Grenville, et pénétré de considération pour son caractère et ses talens personnels, qui ose lui parler avec franchise sur les circonstances du moment.

"Je suis trop intimement convaincu, Milord, que cette lettre ne vous passera pas, et que vous voudrez bien me garder le plus profond secret sur ce que je pourrai vous confier, pour me permettre la moindre réticence envers vous. Soit que nous nous accordions à la fin (comme j'aime à n'en pas douter) ou que nous ne nous entendions pas sur l'affaire de l'emprunt que nos sublimes financiers n'ont pas même compris jusqu'à présent, je crois pouvoir vous assurer avec une connaissance certaine que l'Empereur est déterminé à continuer la guerre, et à y employer une armée de 200 mille hommes. Malgré les conseils et les demandes de paix dont on l'accable, Sa Majesté Impériale est fermement résolue à n'y jamais entendre que du consentement et de l'aveu de l'Angleterre. M. le Baron de Thugut est le seul Ministre qui fortifie mon souverain dans cette résolution, et comme il est en même temps le seul Ministre en crédit, et qui soit exclusivement écouté, il est, par cette raison même, précieux à la bonne cause. C'est du moins le jugement qu'ose porter ici le Ministre de la Cour de Vienne, employé dans les Cours étrangères, que l'idée d'une paix honteuse révolte, et qui désire la continuation d'une guerre dont il croit entrevoir l'issue la plus favorable, pourvu qu'elle soit conduite avec vigueur et sagesse.

“Le plus ou le moins d'accord qui s'établira entre nos deux Cours en conséquence de la tournure que prendra l'affaire de l'emprunt influera donc moins sur le nombre des troupes à employer, que sur le mode et la localité de cet emploi.

“Je ne vous cacherai pas qu'avec la certitude de la pureté de nos vues, et de notre bonne volonté, je tremble pour la succès de la campagne que nous allons commencer, et qui me paraît indubitablement la dernière que nos finances et notre population puissent nous permettre.

“Nous sommes bientôt au milieu du mois de Mars, et nous n'avons aucune connaissance du plan de campagne, parceque, selon toute apparence, on n'en a arrêté aucun. On vit du jour au lendemain, et la conclusion en sera peut-être un système défensif tout aussi ruineux pour nous que la guerre la plus active, et beaucoup plus utile à l'ennemi, à qui il offrira des avantages sans lui présenter des dangers. La paresse, le dégoût, l'ignorance, et peut-être la mauvaise volonté des conseillers qui environnent la personne de mon maître, pourront finir, à force d'importunités et de raisonnemens aussi peu conséquens que ceux qu'on fait sur l'emprunt, par lui faire adopter cette méthode dangereuse de combattre un ennemi dont l'activité et l'audace entreprenante ne se démentent que lorsqu'on l'attaque de la même manière dont il cherche à nous entamer.

“M. des Rosières se contente du nombre de troupes que nous sommes certain de pouvoir mettre en campagne; la co-opération

Prussienne est absolument passée sous silence; il semble ne pas se flatter d'un grand secours à obtenir de l'armée de l'Empire; il donne des moyens de tirer un grand parti des diversions de l'intérieur, peut-être l'arme la plus utile contre l'anarchie Française. Il arrive au même but avec trois armées, par trois chemins différens, sans s'arrêter à des sièges dont il craint les longueurs, et qu'il sait éviter sans danger. Il s'occupe des vivres et des fourrages, et cette dernière considération, appuyée de beaucoup d'autres raisons du plus grands poids, le porte à déclarer qu'il ne faut entrer en campagne qu'au mois de Juin.

"Cette détermination nous donnerait le temps de soumettre ce plan à Vienne, et de parvenir, en la pressant, à faire décider ma Cour encore à temps, malgré toutes les lenteurs qui lui sont inhérentes.

"Il me semble donc qu'il serait à propos que le Ministère Britannique, après avoir donné l'ordre à M. des Rosières de lui présenter la rédaction de son plan, le fit examiner par quelques militaires Anglais de distinction, et, qu'en cas d'approbation, nous nous concertassions immédiatement ensemble pour l'envoyer à Vienne par un officier Anglais et un Autrichien que se trouve ici. Il serait d'une haute importance d'ouvrir les yeux à notre Cabinet sur son propre intérêt qu'il ne pourrait pas manquer de reconnaître. Les moyens d'obtenir une détermination prompte sont de présenter, d'une part, une grande fermeté, et de l'autre, l'appas d'un avantage que vous saurez deviner. Si vous voulez entrer plus en détail sur cet objet, vous daignerez me donner vos ordres. J'aurai l'honneur de me rendre chez vous, et de vous communiquer mes idées que mon zèle et mon désir du bien m'ont suggéré, et qu'il m'a semblé que le devoir ne me permettait pas de taire au point où nous en sommes. Pardonnez-moi cette longue épître. Votre amitié pour moi me saura gré de ma confiance illimitée, et votre bon esprit vous fera rendre justice au motif qui m'anime.

"Je ne me suis ouvert sur tout ceci qu'à M. Pitt que j'ai eu l'honneur de voir avant hier, et à qui j'ai dit que je me proposais de vous entretenir à fond sur cette matière, et dans l'étendue de la confiance la plus intime."

C. GODDARD to W. WICKHAM.

1795, March 10, Dover Street.—"I am directed by Lord Grenville to acquaint you that as, in consequence of the dispatch which you will receive by this messenger, you may have occasion for money immediately, and possibly to the amount of thirty thousand pounds for the objects stated in that dispatch, you are at liberty, at any time after the receipt of this letter, to draw bills upon the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs here for any sum within the above limits. But as, in the uncertainty which at present exists with respect to the necessity which you may find for availing yourself of this permission, no steps can be taken here towards providing for the payment of such bills as you may draw, it will be extremely material that you should, as soon as you are able to ascertain the sum for which you have occasion, apprise Lord Grenville of it by letter; mentioning at the same time the number of bills which you may have drawn or be on the point of drawing upon Lord Grenville, the respective value of each bill, and their total amount. You will further observe that the bills should be made payable at a certain number of days (thirty at least) after sight, in order that time may be afforded for preparing the money for their payment; and, if six weeks can be given by you without inconvenience to the service for which the money is granted, it would be still more advantageous with the same view."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

✓ 1795, March 11 [London].—"The nomination which has this day taken place of Lord Camden to the Lieutenancy of Ireland relieves my mind from recollections that have given me the severest pain. I have dismissed from it every part of those unpleasant impressions, and remember nothing that has passed for four months save the declarations of your affection to me. I had thoughts of employing your good little wife to explain this; but why do we want any mediation or any explanation? Who or what is to interfere between us upon such a subject? If these sentiments meet your's, let me know when I can call upon you, and assure you that I am, with very unabated and earnest cordiality, your very affectionate brother."

JOHN JAY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 15, Royal Hotel, Pall Mall.—"When the last vessel which arrived here from New York left that place, intelligence of the conclusion of the treaty had been received. No letters by that vessel have as yet to come to my hands. I therefore presume she did not bring any for me. I cannot find that the treaty had then arrived.

"All the vessels bound from hence to New York have sailed except one, which will be ready early in April; and I purpose to return in her, unless some unexpected circumstance should occur to prevent me. As that may possibly, though not probably be the case, I think it best to be silent on the subject for the present; but the attention due from me to your Lordship induces me to apprise you of it."

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 19, Lord Grosvenor Street.—"I received this afternoon your letter dated the 17th instant, with the inclosure from Count Starhemberg.

"The plan of M. de Rosières certainly holds out some convenient circumstances, and I should advise your seeing Count Starhemberg as soon as you can, and desiring him to prevail on M. de Rosière to give his ideas in writing immediately for the consideration of his Majesty's Ministers.

"I have always heard M. de Rosière very highly spoken of, especially by my friend the Marquis de Bouillé, and although I must confess that I do not at present entertain any very sanguine hopes either of a spirited conduct on the part of the Court of Vienna, or of their making a moderately successful campaign, I shall be glad to see what can be said by an able officer upon the subject, and will give the best opinion in my power on the practicability of his propositions.

"I see no good in shewing Starhemberg's letter to Mr. Pitt and Mr. Dundas, but think that no time should be lost in procuring the plan in writing, in which state it will be much easier to judge of it, than by a conversation with Monsieur de Rosière."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, March 19, Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to submit to your Majesty the minute of the opinion of your Majesty's confidential servants respecting the measures to be adopted on the subject of any ships of war which may be fitted out from the Dutch ports."

1795, March 19, Downing Street.—

Present :

The Lord Chancellor, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Duke of Portland, Earl Spencer, Lord Hawkesbury, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Windham, Lord Grenville.

"Upon consideration of the present state of Holland, and of the grounds which exist for believing that the French have taken possession of the Dutch fleets in the harbours of the Republic, and are taking measures for fitting out some of the Dutch ships of war to act against this country, his Majesty's servants agree humbly to represent to his Majesty that it may be proper that orders should be given in the most secret manner to the commanding officers of any of his Majesty's fleets or squadrons who may be likely to fall in with any such ships of war, to detain the same and bring them into the ports of Great Britain; and that the said officers should be authorized to use force, if it should be necessary for that purpose."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 20, Queen's House.—"The Minute of Cabinet which I have just received from Lord Grenville on the subject of the Dutch fleet meets with my fullest concurrence, and I approve of Lord Grenville's sending the necessary orders for that purpose to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty."

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

1795, March 21, Dover Street.—"I am ashamed of having so long delayed sending your Grace the enclosed. I have endeavoured as much as possible not only that the recital should be strictly and minutely accurate but also that it should be free from all colouring or aggravation of those points which we have so much reason to lament. I am anxious to know that your Grace thinks I have succeeded in this, and I hope that, if in any instance it strikes you that I have failed, you will point it out to me without difficulty."

MEMORANDUM OF LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March .—"When the union of the persons who are joined in the present Government was formed in July last, the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was destined to Lord Fitz-William, as soon as it should be found practicable to open a proper situation for Lord Westmorland in England. Before the means of making such an arrangement were found, the intention of appointing Lord Fitz-William as the successor of Lord Westmorland became known in Ireland.

The appointment was talked of as immediate, and it was reported that a complete change in the system of Irish Government, both as to men and measures, was intended. Some explanation having taken place here on these points in the course of the autumn, it appeared that Lord Fitz-William had, in fact, formed the intention of removing Lord Fitz-Gibbon from the office of Lord Chancellor, and a variety of other circumstances appeared to some of his colleagues to give too much countenance to the apprehensions of an intended change of system in Ireland. The removal of Lord Fitz-Gibbon was objected to on their part as being inconsistent with the principles on which the union had been formed here; and the same principle was stated by them as applying to the removal of the old servants of Government, and to any other measure which would have the appearance either of introducing a new system, or of casting imputations on the conduct of former Governments in Ireland.

"It appears that Lord Fitz-William conceives himself to have stated to Mr. Pitt, in one of their conversations during this period, his intention of removing Mr. Beresford, but not to have received any answer from him on this subject. Mr. Pitt has no recollection of any idea of Mr. Beresford's removal having been ever mentioned, or even hinted.

"After much discussion on the subject of Lord Fitz-Gibbon's removal, that idea was renounced, and the most explicit assurances were given by Lord Fitz-William that he had not in view the establishment of any new system in Ireland, but that he was desirous of strengthening his Government by the accession of Mr. Ponsonby and his friends, and the support of Mr. Grattan. A mode was, about the same time, found for carrying into effect a proper arrangement respecting Lord Westmorland, and these two points of difficulty being thus removed, it was agreed that a meeting should be held at Mr. Pitt's, at which all the other points that had occurred respecting Ireland should be discussed, in order that it should be considered whether they could be satisfactorily arranged, so that no further delay might arise to the appointment of Lord Fitz-William.

"This meeting was accordingly held at Mr. Pitt's on the ———.

"There were present, the Duke of Portland, Lord Fitz-William, Lord Spencer, Lord Grenville, Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Windham. The points which were discussed at this meeting, and the conclusions adopted respecting them were as follows:—

1. "The appointment of a Provost; with respect to which it was agreed that the choice should be made from among the fellows of the College, although Lord Westmorland had already made a different recommendation. A doubt was started whether the person named by Lord Fitz-William was the fittest of that description; but the decision of this point was left to him.

2. "Mr. W. Ponsonby was proposed by Lord Fitz-William for Secretary of State. It was objected that this office ought to be annexed to that of Chief Secretary. The advantage of such an arrangement was strongly pressed. The inconvenience of having an Irish Secretary of State in the House of Commons of Ireland was urged; and this inconvenience was stated as likely to be greater in the case of a person of the description of Mr. Ponsonby, who might so naturally look to give to that office a weight and efficacy incompatible with the present situation of the Chief Secretary, and with the strength of the English Government in Ireland. In answer to these objections, Lord Fitz-William strongly urged the necessity of his bringing forward Mr. W. Ponsonby, for which he said there was no other opening. It was then proposed to him that Mr. Ponsonby might be made Keeper of the Signet, and the office of Secretary of State be annexed to that of Chief Secretary. And this arrangement was, after much difficulty and discussion, agreed to by Lord Fitz-William.

3. "Lord Fitz-William proposed that Mr. G. Ponsonby should be made Attorney-General. To this the strongest objections were stated; the situation and merits of Mr. Wolfe; the natural claims of Mr. Toler the Solicitor-General; and the impropriety of bringing Mr. G. Ponsonby at once into the office of Attorney-General, a measure which, when coupled with the appointment of Mr. W. Ponsonby, would, it was said, countenance the opinion of a change of system in Ireland.

"It was admitted by Lord Fitz-William that Mr. Wolfe could not, with propriety, be removed except by such an arrangement as he should fully agree to, but an opinion was expressed that such an arrangement might, without difficulty, be effected by opening to Mr. Wolfe the first seat in one of the Courts of Law. But no idea was intimated by Lord Fitz-William of removing Mr. Wolfe from his present office against his inclination.

4. "Supposing that Mr. Wolfe were thus provided for, Lord Fitz-William stated that Mr. G. Ponsonby might properly be made Attorney-General; and urged his supposed unwillingness to serve as Solicitor-General under Mr. Toler. The propriety of this objection was not admitted, and, after further discussion, it was suggested that, supposing Mr. Wolfe removed to the Bench, an arrangement of a similar nature might be found which should be satisfactory to Mr. Toler. But it was still objected that, even in that case, the impropriety of bringing Mr. G. Ponsonby at once to the office of Attorney-General would not be removed, and it was at last agreed that Lord Fitz-William should endeavour, in the first instance, to make a satisfactory arrangement for Mr. Toler, in order that Mr. G. Ponsonby might be made Solicitor-General under Mr. Wolfe. There was some discussion respecting the nature of the arrangement to be proposed to Mr. Toler; and it was distinctly expressed, and agreed to by Lord Fitz-William, that the just claims of Mr. Toler were to be satisfied, taking them on the grounds of his situation such as it stood with Lord Westmorland, so that he should not be called upon to accede to any proposal to which there should not be just reason to believe that he would have acceded had Lord Westmorland continued to hold the Government.

"No mention was made at this conversation of Mr. Curran; nor was it known to some of the persons there present that Lord Fitz-William had ever thought of proposing that gentleman for Solicitor-General, till after Lord Fitz-William's arrival in Ireland, when that arrangement became the subject of public discussion there.

5. "In the reports which had reached this country of the language held by Lord Fitz-William's connections in Ireland, it had been mentioned that some additional offices which had been established by Lord Buckingham, particularly in the Revenue Boards, were to be abolished.

"This subject had once before been in discussion, and it had been explained by Lord Grenville and Mr. Pitt that they considered themselves as parties to the measures of Lord Buckingham in Ireland, and could not, on that account, independently of other considerations, concur in any measure which should appear to reflect on him. In consequence of this explanation, Lord Fitz-William had disavowed any intention of doing anything injurious to Lord Buckingham's character, but the measure which was in question had not been satisfactorily explained.

"At the conversation now spoken of, Lord Fitz-William mentioned this subject, stating that he conceived that such an arrangement might be made by the appointment of a Commission of Accounts as might diminish the number of the Commissioners of the Revenue Boards; but without injuring any of the persons who then sat there, or appearing to throw any reflection on those who had proposed or concurred in the present establishment. Lord Fitz-William entered a little into the detail of this plan, but it soon appeared that he was by no means acquainted with the subject, which was, on the other hand, not thoroughly understood in its details (even as to the present state of those Boards) by any of the other persons present.

"It was then suggested to Lord Fitz-William that, on a point of that nature, it was impossible then to settle any plan or arrangement in this country. That, till after his arrival in Ireland, he could not even decide on the general propriety and still less the particular details of any such measure. That, after his explicit disavowal of all intention to introduce a new system, or to countenance imputations on the former Government of Ireland, his colleagues would willingly leave it to him to consider the subject, on such information as he might receive respecting it in Ireland; desiring only that, before any such measure was adopted, they might have the opportunity of deliberating upon it.

6. "Nothing was intimated in this conversation of any idea of removing Mr. Beresford, nor was even his name mentioned by Lord Fitz-William; although the different means which might be adopted for lessening the number of the Commissioners of the Revenue Boards formed a part of what he stated on the subject of those Boards.

"The appointment of a Primate, respecting which there was no difference of opinion, and some other subjects of less importance, having been also mentioned, the question of further concession to the Catholics was discussed, though not much at length. The subject was considered as one of much delicacy, and no decided sentiment as to the line which it might ultimately be right to adopt upon it was expressed by any person present. The result of the discussion was an unanimous opinion that Lord Fitz-William should inform himself in Ireland as to the state and disposition of the country in this respect, and should transmit that information, with his opinion, to the King's servants here; that he should, as much as possible, endeavour to prevent the agitation of the question during the present session; and that, in all events, he should do nothing in it which might commit the King's Government here or in Ireland without fresh instructions from hence.

"With this subject the conversation finished. At the close of it, Lord Fitz-William, who had brought to the meeting a memorandum of matters to be talked of, was repeatedly asked whether there were any other points to be discussed, or any new measures to be proposed. The answer was that he knew of none.

"Lord Fitz-William went immediately into the country, and, in a very short time after his return, he set out for Ireland. What has passed since that period between him and the King's servants is to be found in the correspondence."

Endorsed by Lord Grenville. 1799, February 15. "This appears to be the first draft. The corrected copy is interlined with an addition in Mr. Pitt's hand, and a note is added to it by myself, stating its having been communicated to the different persons there mentioned."

JOHN JAY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 21, Royal Hotel, Pall Mall.—"On Tuesday next I am to dine with Mr. Vaughan at Hackney. Having hitherto availed myself of only one invitation from that gentleman, an apology would not be kindly received.

"On Thursday and Friday I am not engaged; but as the one may be more convenient to your Lordship than the other, I forbear naming either.

"It is very desirable that some measures to facilitate the business in question should be concerted; the parties interested would be gratified, and the United States obliged. If America was set right as to the affair of the Indians, and relieved from West India judges and privateers not better than Indians, ill humour, having nothing to feed upon, would die away.

"A discerning minister, true to your Lordship's conciliatory views, and possessed, if possible, of your prudence and self command, cannot be too early at Philadelphia. I am convinced that unless your vigilance and interposition extend to whatever may affect the relations between the two countries, all will not go and continue well."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 24, Hamburg.—"I have been here above a fortnight, and put off from day to day the execution of the first part of my project, going to my brother's estates in Germany (Oldenburg). One of my brothers, who is there with his family, has been under great apprehensions of a visit from the French, and upon the point of leaving the place several times. From what they write, I find they knew even less than we have hitherto heard here of the state of things in Holland, of which I must have more accurate and detailed accounts before I venture to go. The communication between this place and that country has been very uncertain and irregular as yet from the severity of the weather, and the position of the armies. All correspondence, particularly of persons known to have been attached to the ancient Government, is still, and will for a long while continue to be narrowly watched. Since we left England we have not had a line from any part of Holland; by we, I mean Mr. Fagel as well as myself.

"Dutch newspapers we have had in abundance. From these it appears that the Cabal, who act in concert with the French, have, in imitation of their associates, established an entirely new form of government, introduced by the delusive declaration of the Rights of Man, founded on the loose basis of Universal Representation, with a Convention for each Province, and Committees of General Welfare; that from these Conventions they have replaced the Deputies to the States-General, still sitting at the Hague under that name; that, in every other respect they have established new forms, new names, and placed new persons in every department of the State, having abolished the Stadholdership and all hereditary distinctions; and thus entirely subverted the Government hitherto considered as most adapted to the disposition, the customs, and prejudices of the inhabitants of the United Provinces. Peter Paulus, who has been continued President of the Convention in the Province of Holland from fortnight to fortnight, seems to be the leading man; and has, with great art and ability, endeavoured to reconcile the people to this system by the way he has modified it, by the strain of religious enthusiasm that runs throughout the work, calculated to make a strong impression on a religious people, and well adapted to their notions. He endeavours farther to recommend this system by the apparent moderation and humanity of every syllable that comes from his mouth or his pen. But after all we have seen, who will venture to answer for the stability of a system established under the auspices of the French Convention, and supported by their army, under whatever shape it may be introduced? Who will depend on a succession of French Generals as well-disposed as Pichégrou seems to have been? We know that Paulus is already taxed with aristocracy from his moderation, and that many of his supporters begin to be dissatisfied with his conduct. At any rate, however favourable these appearances of moderatism may seem, and though they have released several persons, as long as my eldest brother and the Pensionary are confined to a prison I think it would be madness to put myself in the power of these people, and I must suspend yet the execution of my plan. All the merchants' letters, some of them of as late a date as the 8th and 9th instant, agree in stating that they are much afraid of a famine in the Seven Provinces; the price of provisions is considerably higher, and their correspondents here have received orders to a great amount for a supply. Some of these accounts state that a part of the French army has marched to the frontiers, the rest having been dispersed in small detachments in different parts of the Provinces. But all the accounts I have seen or heard on this subject are too general to be of any great use.

"From the information I have, I do not think it advisable for me to proceed to the Hague just now. At the same time I hope to hear from England soon. If from better information it should be your Lordship's opinion that I may go, or if you can in any way remove the obstacles to my journey, or obtain my being admitted at the Hague, a line from you will make me waive any objections I might have; as I still see the chance of being of use if I could get there without being put in a prison. I hope to have a few lines on the subject from your Lordship through Mr. Frazer, as I shall stay here some time longer before I go to Varel, my brother's house in the Duchy of Oldenburgh. I shall stay at any rate till I hear from England. What I know of the man who has taken the lead, Paulus, makes me more desirous than ever of getting to the Hague. He is a man of great abilities and eloquence and, though very violent, not destitute of humanity and of principle. He has been soured by disappointment, and constant exclusion from office. Even in former times, he often in private expressed his sense of the necessity of a Stadholder in the Republic, when he was most violent against the Government and its abuses. He must become obnoxious sooner or later from jealousy of his elevation; or, when he refuses to give way to the folly or resentment of many of his supporters, they will endeavour to find a man more pliable. He will not like to resign his power. When he comes to try, he may see the impracticability of the new system. He may wish to clear the country of its invaders. And should the plans and the arms of the allies be attended with more success than lately, he may perhaps be induced to seek for support from our friends by re-establishing the Stadholder, if he finds a chance of being placed in a situation that may flatter his ambition, and which he may think more secure than what he occupies at present. As far as it is possible to judge without being on the spot, I think this may happen; and the more so as men of all sets and descriptions agree in their idea of the talents and disposition of this man in many points of view; and many of my particular friends have always entertained the opinion of him I have ventured to give. I must not take up any more of your Lordship's time for the present. I shall not lose sight of my project; and shall be glad if any means can be suggested to me that may hasten the execution of it, and hope to be favoured with a line in answer. Baron Kinkell is so good as to take this.

Postscript.—March 25. “We have had letters to-day from the Hague dated 19th instant. Mr. Fagel’s house has been searched (une visite domiciliaire) and all his papers seized, so that for the present he has no thoughts of returning to Holland; though I do not see how they can contrive to fasten any criminality upon him for any paper they may find, according to our ideas of justice. They certainly will if it suits their purpose.”

H. FAGELL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 28, Hamburg.—“Je ne pensais pas, lorsque j’ai quitté l’Angleterre, que je trouverais la communication entre la Hollande et Hambourg aussi complètement interrompue qu’elle l’a été pendant les premiers quinze jours que j’ai passés dans cette ville. Jusqu’au 24 de ce mois, les nouvelles les plus fraîches qu’on avait de la Hollande étaient du 20 Février, et à mon arrivée ici, je n’ai guères appris que ce que je savais déjà en partant de Yarmouth. C’est cette raison qui m’a empêché jusqu’à présent d’avoir l’honneur de vous écrire. Mais depuis deux ou trois jours, nous avons reçu, tant par la poste que par des voies extraordinaires, des lettres qui vont jusqu’au 20 de ce mois; et c’est pour vous rendre quelque compte de ces nouvelles que je prends aujourd’hui la plume.

“Les lettres particulières sont pour la plupart écrites avec beaucoup de circonspection, et il n’y est presque pas question d’affaires publiques. Mais il résulte en général de tout l’ensemble des nombreux détails contenus dans les Gazettes, que les principes sur lesquels le nouveau Gouvernement est établi, et d’après lesquels il agit, sont absolument semblables à ceux qui ont été adoptés en France. Les Assemblées provinciales d’Etats ont été changées en Assemblées de Représentants provisoires du peuple de chaque province. Et cette différence de dénomination est essentielle, parceque la composition de ces Assemblées est essentiellement différente de ce qu’elle était ci-devant. Les corps des nobles qui en faisaient partie ont été partout abolis; les Magistrats, qui formaient les Régences des villes, démis; de nouvelles Municipalités provisoires, dont les membres ont été élus par le peuple, mises à leur place; et dans la Province de Hollande, on a admis dans cette nouvelle Assemblée des Députés de plusieurs villes, bourgs, et villages, dont les Régences n’avaient pas le droit autrefois d’envoyer des Députés aux Etats. En un mot, l’Edifice Gothique et Monstrueux de l’ancienne constitution (pour me servir des expressions à la mode) a fait place à une construction nouvelle, dont les droits de l’homme font la base, et à laquelle les architectes Français ont fourni le modèle. Au reste, les Assemblées qui viennent de se former ne sont que provisoires, et la plupart ont été nommées pour deux mois. Il paraît que c’est dans le but de laisser l’administration entre leurs mains, jusqu’à l’époque où l’on aura pu organiser des Assemblées primaires. Celles-ci nommeront des Députés qui se réuniront en Convention représentant le peuple entier des Provinces Unies, et je suppose que cette Convention prendra aussitôt la place des Etats-Généraux. Effectivement jusqu’à présent, ceux-ci existent encore de nom, et c’est la seule des anciennes autorités constituées qui n’ait pas été formellement supprimée. Elle a cependant absolument changé de nature depuis que les Etats des Provinces qui y envoyaient leurs Députés, ont été abolis; mais on a senti que les relations de la République avec les Puissances Etrangères exigeaient que, pour le moment, le nom fut conservé.

ses richesses lui ont toujours assurée. L'homme qui jusqu'ici paraît y avoir le plus de crédit est le fameux Pieter Paulus. Il vient d'être nommé membre du Comité de Marine, qui a pris la place des cinq Amirautes ; et comme il a déjà été Ministre de ce Département avant la révolution de 1787, et qu'il y a montré de grands talents, il sera fort utile à ce Comité. Le Conseil d'Etat, qui avait la direction suprême de tout ce qui avait rapport aux finances et à l'armée de la République, et dont les membres étaient nommés par les différentes Provinces, a également été supprimé, et remplacé par un Comité. Ces deux nouveaux Départements, surtout celui de la Marine, paraissent composés de gens habiles et entendus. La Marine entière a été cassée, sauf à ceux qui voudraient servir de nouveau à s'adresser pour cet effet au Comité. Il est question d'une mesure semblable pour l'armée de terre. En attendant l'on assure que la plupart des officiers de Marine et des matelots préfèrent de ne plus être employés. Je me suis informé de plusieurs personnes venues en dernier lieu de la Hollande, si l'on y travaillait aux chantiers, particulièrement à la construction des vaisseaux, la réponse a été uniformément négative. Les deux objets qui excitent le plus de plaintes sont, 1, l'introduction forcée des assignats, quoique jusqu'à présent, elle se borne au paiement de ce que les soldats Français achètent dans les boutiques ; et 2, la cherté des denrées de première nécessité, surtout des subsistances, laquelle augmente tous les jours.

"Jusqu'ici on paraît procéder avec assez de modération contre les individus, si l'on peut donner le nom de modérés à des procédés que, dans tout autre temps que ceux où nous vivons, on aurait trouvés avec raison violents et arbitraires. La plupart des membres des anciennes Régences n'ont pas été formellement arrêtés, mais ils ne peuvent sortir du pays, ni même s'éloigner de la ville où ils demeurent. Messieurs de Roon et Van de Spiegel sont toujours détenus. On m'écrit qu'ils n'ont pas encore été interrogés ; dans d'autres lettres il est dit qu'ils ne sont pas encore relâchés. Mais dans les papiers publics il n'est fait aucune mention d'eux, et nous ignorons encore quels ont été les véritables motifs de leur arrestation. M. de Kinsberge, qui était aux arrêts à la Maison de Ville d'Amsterdam, a reçu la permission, pour cause de maladie, de les garder dans sa maison ; mais l'ancien Fiscal de l'Amirauté Van der Hoop, est toujours détenu dans cette partie de l'Hotel de Ville où l'on emprisonnait autrefois les débiteurs.

"Le plus ou moins de contentement ou de mécontentement produit par le nouvel ordre des choses se modifie d'après les opinions qui prévalaient dans les différentes villes. Dans celles où il y a toujours eu beaucoup de patriotes, comme à Amsterdam, Haarlem, Leyden, on dit qu'il y a beaucoup de démonstrations publiques de joie ; dans celles où le peuple était attaché à la Maison d'Orange, comme par exemple à la Haye, il règne une grande consternation et une tristesse générale. Ce sentiment est augmenté par la cherté qu'on attribue avec raison en grande partie aux troupes Françaises. D'ailleurs celles-ci observent la discipline la plus exacte, et l'on en est généralement très content. Tous les avis s'accordent à faire envisager leur présence comme la seule chose qui maintienne la tranquillité publique, et empêche l'animosité mutuelle des partis d'écarter. Il n'y a également qu'une voix sur les bonnes qualités du Général Pichégro, dont la modération et la simplicité contrastent, dit-on, avec l'insolence ridicule des Représentants du peuple.

"Dans toutes les Résolutions, Publications, et autres pièces qui émanent du Gouvernement actuel, et parmi lesquelles il y en a plusieurs très bien écrites, il règne une grande aigreur contre l'administration précédente. Je remarque surtout, dans plusieurs de leurs procédés, beaucoup d'animosité personnelle contre le Grand-Pensionnaire. C'est ainsi que l'assemblée actuelle des Etats Généraux a fait brûler l'original de l'acte par lequel les Sept Provinces se sont mutuellement garanti, en 1788, le maintien de Stadhoudérat Héritaire. Cet acte était l'ouvrage du Conseiller-Pensionnaire. Dans quelques-unes de ses publications le Gouvernement actuel réfute avec ironie les principes de l'administration précédente. Ils ont fait biffer des Regîtres de Leurs Hautes Puissances les Résolutions prises en 1792, en réponse aux mémoires remis par Lord Auckland et le Comte de Starhemberg, relativement aux auteurs de la mort de Louis XVI.

"Encore une chose qui est à remarquer, c'est que les nouvelles Municipalités ne sont pas toutes composées de même. Dans quelques villes on y a placé des gens tirés de la plus basse classe du peuple; dans d'autres, comme par exemple à Amsterdam, ce sont des hommes d'une classe moyenne, et parmi lesquels il y en a qui ont beaucoup de connaissances.

"Mon intention en me rendant ici était, comme j'ai eu l'honneur de vous le dire, de me rapprocher de mon pays, pour être mieux informé de ce qui s'y passait, et de voir si je pourrais y réjoindre ma famille, sans m'exposer inutilement à des dangers personnels. Tout ce que j'ai appris depuis mon arrivée ici, l'arrestation de Messieurs de Roon et Van de Spiegel, la démission qui m'a été donnée le 17 Février, la manière dont on a mis le scellé sur mes papiers le 23, et plusieurs autres circonstances trop longues à détailler ici, qui me prouvent qu'on en veut aussi à moi, tout cela m'oblige à renoncer pour le moment à mon projet de retourner en Hollande. Ce n'est que depuis quatre ou cinq jours que la nouvelle de ma démission m'est parvenue. Ignorant qu'on avait pris ce parti à mon égard, j'avais cru devoir en prendre un vis-à-vis de l'Assemblée qui continue à siéger à la Haye, sous le nom d'Etats Généraux, et en conséquence, je lui ai écrit le 10 de ce mois, une lettre dont j'ai l'honneur de vous faire parvenir ci-joint une traduction. Je suis trop jaloux de votre estime pour ne pas vous communiquer cette démarche. Je me flatte qu'elle aura votre approbation. Mon intention est de continuer encore quelque temps mon séjour dans cette ville, où je suis plus à portée qu'ailleurs d'avoir des nouvelles de la Hollande, et de me décider pour l'avenir d'après les événements, et surtout d'après la tournure que prendront les affaires dans ma malheureuse patrie."

LORD GRENVILLE to EARL CAMDEN.

1795, March 28, Downing Street.—"You will receive by this messenger the statement which I showed you the other day, and which has been communicated to all the persons present at the conversation there stated, who all perfectly concur in it. I have written a few lines to Mr. Pelham to apprise him that I have sent this statement to you, and that you will probably forward it to him. I think his letters give a favourable account of things on the whole. I earnestly hope that you will find the prospect improve upon you as you proceed."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 29, Queen's House.—"Agreeable to Lord Malmesbury's request of instructions for his conduct on the Princess Caroline's landing, he is certainly to continue to attend her on her journey to London till she arrives at St James's; this is so perfectly understood, that I am certain none of the Prince of Wales's attendants can be imprudent enough to cause him any difficulty; they can only wait on her with a compliment in the name of the Prince and make part of her suite; but she must be under the care of Lord Malmesbury till lodged at St. James's. Mrs. Harcourt must also remain with her till she arrives at the said place.

"As it has been settled that the Princess should land at the first safe place the frigates can put her on shore, it has been impossible to send carriages for her journey; she must therefore travel in the most eligible method Lord Malmesbury can devise. When it is known which route she will travel and the day she can arrive in London, my carriages will be sent to the nearest stage to town to receive her and conduct her to St. James's."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 29, Berne.—"I know not how to thank you sufficiently for your very kind letter of the 24th February. Believe me I feel all the force of the obligations I have to your Lordship, and I will do my utmost to correct myself in all the articles you are so kind as [to] point out, though I fear I shall have need of your indulgence on many occasions besides those you have mentioned to me. In that of my handwriting I fear I must remain incorrigible. I write now every day so much and so quick that I do not see how it will be possible for me to make any amendment; indeed if my business increases as you make me believe it will, I must beg you to let me have some assistance, or I don't see how I can possibly go through with what I have to do in the course of the day.

"When I wrote to your Lordship respecting my allowance I did not foresee the amount of two articles of expense that exceed very considerably my calculations, I mean those of travelling and of correspondence. My bill at the post-office, exclusive of letters from England, is always more than two pounds a week, and, if I shall be obliged to travel a great deal, the expense will be very considerable.

"I am much embarrassed by a note I have received from Mr. Goddard, in which he informs me that before I draw for any money to be employed on secret service I must send over a receipt for the sum required, with a statement of the particulars, and afterwards wait till your Lordship shall have informed me at what time I may draw. I should hope that this rule will in some measure be relaxed in my case, otherwise I really know not how the public service must go on, as my own circumstances will not allow me to make any advance myself, and the nature and variety of the services required of me make it impossible for me to foresee either the quantity of the sum I may require in a given time, or the specific articles to which it will be applied. I have already expended near three hundred pounds of my own besides all my own expenses, so that, having returned Lord Robert FitzGerald the 100*l.* which he had advanced, I am several hundred pounds in debt, and must be obliged to provide for the public service in the best way I can, till I receive your Lordship's answer.

"I have made an indirect overture to M. Mallet du Pan, but I find that he is actually engaged in the service of the Court of Vienna. He told a friend of mine that he corresponded directly with the Emperor, but I know that he sent a mémoire last week to M. Thugut; the general object of it was to recommend a continuation of the war.

"I believe his temper is soured by disappointment, as he was as violent in his declamations against the Emperor a few days since for the slowness of his preparations, as he has ever been against the Court of London."

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 31, Lower Grosvenor Street.—"At the desire of Mr. Pitt I yesterday sent him the projet de campagne of Monsieur de Rosier, which he promised to transmit to your Lordship after he had read it.

"Monsieur de Rosier supposes the Austrian army to consist of two hundred thousand men, that of Condé of thirty thousand, the army of the Empire of fifty thousand, and the Hanoverians and Hessians under Walmoden of thirty-six thousand, exclusive of British cavalry, Brunswickers, and other troops.

"From this statement much is to be deducted, and I confess I am not sanguine that any serious impression can be made, or that the German armies will be able to maintain even the appearance of an offensive campaign. But as this appearance is very essential for the encouragement of our allies, and of the French Royalists, and for giving us any prospect of a creditable termination of the war; and as I believe that a better plan cannot be framed than that which is proposed by Monsieur de Rosier, nor one that is more likely to interest the Court of Vienna from its involving the security of Luxemburgh in its earliest operations, I should recommend it's being transmitted without loss of time to the Emperor. But as it is impossible for us to answer at present for our part of the co-operation by sending a large force into Brittany, it might not be prudent to depute an English officer of rank with the plan to Vienna (as Monsieur de Rosier proposes) lest by making the plan apparently so much our own, the Imperial Ministers should insist on our entering into an absolute engagement to perform the part which Monsieur de Rosier has assigned to us, as a preliminary step to their preparing to take any active measures on the eastern frontier of France."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 31, London.—"J'apprends dans le moment que vous expédiez un courier à Vienne dans la soirée. Si vous désirez que j'y écrive quelque chose, daignez me dicter mon langage; vous connaissez mon zèle et mon dévouement. Si vous chargez M. le Chevalier Eden de quelque nouvelle communication, permettez que je vous prie de m'en dire deux mots. Vous savez comme on est chez nous. On me ferait un crime de mon ignorance, et d'après vos bontés ordinaires pour moi, vous ne voudriez pas m'exposer à un désagrément que je ne mérite pas."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1795, March 31, Dover Street.—"Je n'écris que pour renvoyer notre Ministre à des instructions précédentes en lui faisant sentir toutes les raisons qui doivent nous mettre dans l'impossibilité la plus absolue de changer un arrangement déjà pris, soumis à la délibération du Parlement, et adopté pour base de toutes nos opérations financières pour l'année.

“J’ose espérer que ma lettre du 24 Février, soutenue par ce que vous aurez dit sur le même point, aura déjà rendu l’expédition du courier d’aujourd’hui inutile, mais je veux éviter, jusqu’à la possibilité d’un délai, quelconque faute d’explications de notre part.”

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 31, Hamburg.—“La lettre que j’ai eu l’honneur de vous écrire par la dernière poste contenait un exposé général, quoiqu’imparfait, de la situation actuelle de la Hollande, pour autant qu’elle n’est connue. Le temps ne m’a pas permis alors d’y ajouter quelques circonstances qui me paraissent cependant mériter votre attention. Il est très possible que ces particularités soient déjà parvenues à votre connaissance ; mais comme il se pourrait aussi que cela ne fut pas, j’ai cru à tout hasard pouvoir vous les communiquer. Si vous ne trouvez donc rien dans cette lettre qui soit nouveau pour vous, vous y verrez au moins une preuve de mon empressement à vous faire part de ce que j’ai appris de plus essentiel sur une matière aussi intéressante.

“Les différentes Provinces donnent successivement connaissance aux Etats-Généraux des efforts qu’elles font pour satisfaire aux réquisitions des Français ; mais ces réquisitions ne se bornent pas aux objets qu’ils ont demandés en entrant dans le pays. Le Représentant Alquier a remis un mémoire pour obtenir du bois et du cuivre pour des pontons, pour la valeur de 400 à 450 mille livres de France. Il demande qu’on fournisse tout de suite cette somme, sauf à liquider ensuite. Les arrangements nécessaires ont été pris pour satisfaire à cette demande. En général la volonté des Représentants et des Généraux Français sert de loi ; et malgré l’indépendance que le Gouvernement actuel affecte, lui-même ne cache pas cette vérité. Les Représentants avaient donné, le deux ou trois Mars, un mémoire pour recommander de la manière la plus pressante, la prompte organisation de l’armée de terre et de mer. L’assemblée de Hollande ayant pris connaissance de ce mémoire, a fait convoquer, le même soir, celle des Etats-Généraux, et y a fait déclarer par ses Députés qu’elle ne désespérerait pas que Leurs Hautes Puissances n’eussent établi à la place du Conseil d’Etat, un Comité pour les affaires de la Confédération Générale, et n’en eussent nommé les membres. Cela s’est fait sur le champ, mais ce qu’il y a de remarquable c’est que dans le discours par lequel les Députés de Hollande allèguent les raisons qui rendent cette prompte organisation de l’armée indispensable, ils disent : ‘Nous espérons que vos Hautes Puissances ‘sentiront l’obligation qui leur est imposée, et ne manqueront pas de se ‘soumettre à la volonté de la nation Française et de nos commettants.’ C’est sur la demande du Représentant Alquier que les Etats-Généraux ont résolu de désapprouver et d’annuler comme contraires au droit des gens, leurs Résolutions du 25 Septembre 1792, et du 16 Avril 1793, prises sur les mémoires de Lord Auckland et du Comte de Starhemberg. Il a été résolu de les faire biffer des Registres comme déshonorantes pour ces actes, et incompatibles avec les sentiments d’amitié et de respect que Leurs Hautes Puissances ont pour une nation grande, libre, et magnanime, telle que la Française.

était Ministre de la République en Danemarck, a reçu des lettres de rappel, de même que M. Hartsinck qui était accrédité de la part de Leurs Hautes Puissances près du Cercle de Basse-Saxe.

“J’ai reçu des lettres fort intéressantes de M. de Reede, notre Ministre à Berlin, en date du 24 et du 28 de ce mois. Le résultat de ce qu’il me mande est que le Roi de Prusse est sur le point de conclure la paix avec la Convention ; que le projet, tel que le Comité de Salut Public le propose, est en neuf articles, qui sont, à ce qu’on assure, honorables pour le Roi de Prusse ; et que M. de Hardenberg, arrivé à Basle, vient de recevoir l’ordre d’accepter ce projet à quelques légères modifications près, en insistant que l’Electorat d’Hanovre et le Pays de Brunswick soient mis à l’abri d’une invasion. Depuis l’arrivée du dernier courrier de Basle, on regardait à Berlin les choses comme terminées, et l’on croyait que, du 20 au 25 Avril, on aurait la certitude de l’événement. Le Général Kalkreuth devait rester avec les régiments de Westphalie comme une espèce de corps d’observation, et dans quatre semaines, le gros de l’armée devait rentrer.”

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT PETER PAULUS (English version).

1795, March, Hague.—“The time is now come that puts an end to the Presidency, to which this Assembly appointed me for the third time fourteen days since ; and I may look upon myself as entirely discharged from that situation, after the positive assurances then given me that it would not now again be conferred upon me. I congratulate the Assembly and myself, that during this period so many important resolutions have been taken, which give us a well grounded hope, that we shall at last establish the welfare of the people of Holland, and of the United Provinces, and that posterity will look upon all those who have been concerned in these measures as instruments in the hands of God to fix this Republic upon lasting foundations. The direction of the military force, by sea and by land, is at last settled ; and simplicity and uniformity in this department substituted to the old monstrous system that has produced so much mischief to the country. The same change has partly taken place as to the administration of our colonies, and whenever it is completed, and all the different parts of the executive power have taken a regular course, the nation will find no obstacle that can prevent a similar change in the remaining part of the ancient and defective form of Government, I mean the legislative, in such a manner that, by bringing back the latter to the greatest simplicity, it may be consistent with the principles upon which it has been thought necessary to establish the former. By this method, when the executive power has attained some degree of firmness, the shock which the change of the legislature may bring about will be attended with much less danger of bad consequences ; and we may flatter ourselves with the hope that, by the assistance of heaven, this undertaking will be as successful. This at least has been the plan I have endeavoured to pursue during the time I was President of this Assembly. I was of opinion that the legislative part of the Constitution, in its ancient external shape, ought to be made subservient to the change of the executive part in every department ; and that we might afterwards, under the shelter and protection of the latter, proceed to establish the former, without any apprehension of seeing the whole fabric fall in at once ; and I was of opinion we should thus accomplish insensibly both the objects we had in view. I am, however, far from saying that the first object is attained, or that there is not a great deal left to do. But I know that a great deal has been done, and that foundations are laid, of which the wisdom of this Assembly will derive every advantage. I know by experience that there are men enough in this Assembly who can take my place to pursue this work, and who have proposed to themselves the same object, and that the whole Assembly will not want the resolution to complete this work. I am now on the point of leaving this place; and called upon to confine my activity more particularly to the navy of the State, which has long been my favourite occupation."

LORD ST. HELENS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 2, St. James's Place.—"Mr. Burges having informed me that you purpose sending notice to the Treasury that my appointments are to cease as on the 5th of this month, I am under the necessity of requesting, which I do most earnestly, that you will be so good as to see me for five minutes before this sentence be irrevocably pronounced."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 4, Kew.—"On arriving here Silvester has delivered to me Lord Grenville's letter enclosing the two he received from Lord Malmesbury. As the clearest method of sending directions for Lord Grenville [is] to answer the questions asked by Lord Malmesbury, I will state the orders I have given in consequence of the intelligence received from the Admiralty and Mr. Secretary Dundas.

"The Princess is to proceed as far as is thought right in the Jupiter and then embark in the yachts and be landed at Greenwich.

"Mr. Robert Greville is going with my equipage to Greenwich to bring the Princess from thence to St. James's; she will land about two this day.

"The Princess will come in my coach with Lady Jersey and Mrs. Harcourt; it is contrary to etiquette for gentlemen to go in the coach.

"In the leading coach Lord Malmesbury, Lord Claremont, Mrs. Aston, and Mr. Greville."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, March 8 [April 8], Queen's House.—"I can contrive to see Mr. Jay here at twelve tomorrow if Lord Grenville will bring him here exactly at that hour, as I am to visit the new married couple a little before one tomorrow and then go till Wednesday to Windsor, which will be the proper day for receiving the Address of the House of Lords, and half an hour latter that of the House of Commons; I desire Lord Grenville will settle this with Mr. Pitt.

"The compliment from the Lords must be made to the Queen on the Thursday before the Drawing Room, as also that from the House of Commons.

"As to those to the Prince and Princess I should suppose naturally Friday will be the day for that ceremony; but of course the principal messenger from each will enquire of the Earl of Cholmondeley the day most agreeable for their being received."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1795, April 8, Dover Street.—“As Lord Grenville will have the honour of paying his duty to your Majesty tomorrow morning in obedience to your Majesty’s commands, he forbears troubling your Majesty at all in detail on the subject of the minute which your Majesty will receive from Mr. Pitt, conveying the opinion of the Cabinet as to the making fresh overtures to the King of Prussia. Nothing could be more painful to Lord Grenville than the necessity of differing from the rest of your Majesty’s servants at such a time as the present ; but the importance of the subject itself, and its immediate relation to the whole business of that department of your Majesty’s Government in which your Majesty has been graciously pleased more particularly to require Lord Grenville’s service and advice make it his indispensable duty to act according to the best opinion which he has been able to form upon it, and to which, after repeated reconsideration, he finds it impossible for him not to adhere. He is at the same time very far from presuming to press that opinion upon your Majesty in opposition to the sentiments of those whose opinion ought on every account to have more weight than his. He trusts to that goodness of which he has had so many proofs, and which he will ever acknowledge with the deepest and most heartfelt gratitude, that your Majesty will put a favourable interpretation upon that line of conduct which under such circumstances a conscientious discharge of his duty seems to require from him.”

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 9, Queen’s House.—“Lord Grenville will easily conceive that I must ever look on a difference of opinion between my Ministers on a material question with sorrow ; but far be it from me to wish that any of them should ever for unanimity concur in appearance when not dictated by conviction. Lord Grenville may therefore rest assured that his dissent on the present occasion will not in the least diminish my opinion of him. But I think he ought, at the same time, to be informed that however satisfied I was with the minute that proposed stopping the subsidy that had been paid for some months to the King of Prussia on his having completely failed in fulfilling the intention of the treaty, and that I had thought some weeks ago when the idea of renewing a pecuniary engagement was proposed, that those who prevented that measure were right ; but now that the Austrians are retiring entirely to the Rhine, the west part of Germany cannot be prevented long from falling into the hands of the enemy, unless by keeping the Prussians to aid in driving them back, and if possible moving forward to regain the united Dutch Provinces.”

GENERAL DE CLAIRFAIT to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1795, April 9, Bockenbaim, Frankfurt.—“J’ai reçu aujourd’hui à trois heures après midi les dépêches que vous m’avez fait l’honneur de m’adresser en date du 24 du Mars. Les vents contraires ont empêché le courier de faire plus du diligence. J’ai expédié d’abord par courier le paquet au ministre, Baron de Thugut, et par la même occasion les incluses.

“Je crois que les Anglais ont fait une excellente affaire en se liant avec les Russes, qui peuvent encore, et seules, nous donner les moyens

de soutenir la guerre. Je crois l'accommodement des Prussiens avec les Français terminé, ou sur le point de l'être. Depuis plusieurs jours, toutes les lettres de Basle assurent que la chose est certaine. Le Major Mayring est arrivé aujourd'hui à midi, venant de Basle, allant à Berlin. Il s'est arrêté chez le Prince Héréditaire de Hohenlohe qui m'a dit avoir appris de lui qu'il y avait beaucoup d'émotion à Paris, et qu'on en était fort inquiet. Qu'on y avait appelé le Général Pichégru, qu'on croyait le plus propre par la considération dont il jouit à en imposer, et à donner de bons conseils. Le Prince de Hohenlohe a ajouté que ce Major Prussien Mayring était chargé de dépêches pour Berlin dont il ignorait le contenu. Il m'a, cependant, dit celle d'un ton à me faire croire qu'il soupçonnait ce qu'elles pouvaient contenir. Un négociant de Frankfort est venu me dire qu'il avait vu ce Major, et m'a assuré qu'il lui avait dit qu'il était porteur du traité conclu entre les Prussiens et les Français, et que ce traité était avantageux à l'Allemagne. Tout cela ne sont pas des preuves complètes, mais peu s'en faut ; et je crois qu'on ne peut plus douter que cet accord ne soit autant que terminé. Peut-être (et c'est le seul espoir qui peut rester) les circonstances actuelles s'opposeront à l'accomplissement de cette horrible déloyauté, si elle n'est pas consommée, ou l'annuleront si elle l'était, puisqu'il est certain qu'il y a beaucoup de disposition à une contre-révolution à Paris. Les nouvelles assurent que la Convention est au moment d'être renversée, et ne peut conserver plus longtemps son existence. Le manque de pain en est le motif ; et la faim n'écoute plus de loi, et ne se laisse pas arrêter par la crainte. Le mécontentement dans plusieurs provinces est connu, et se manifeste. On dit qu'il a gagné et fait des progrès à l'armée du Rhin. Si tout cela est assez avancé pour que l'explosion se fasse bientôt, les Prussiens pourraient porter toute la honte de leur infâme conduite, et on s'en tirerait avec honneur, et sans leur assistance. Puisse la fortune nous accorder et nous procurer tant de bien, sans lesquels notre position pourra être dans peu très critique et très désagréable. Les nouveaux arrangements nous mettent hors d'état d'agir dans ce moment. J'espère que vous aurez reçu mes lettres par lesquelles je vous instruisais de la marche de l'armée Prussienne en Westphalie, de l'ordre de l'Empereur à l'armée que je commandais de les remplacer. Enfin, d'après cet arrangement, les Hanovriens et Hessais sont vers Embden, les Prussiens en Westphalie jusqu'à Roer, l'armée de l'Empire avec les troupes Autrichiennes qui y sont depuis la Roer jusqu'au Main, et l'armée Impériale que je commande encore, près de Mayence, avec des gros détachements jusqu'à Basle. Le corps du Prince de Hohenlohe depuis Frankfort jusqu'à Gressen en seconde ligne, sans autre motif que celui de nous gêner, et ne voulant pas aller depuis la Roer jusqu'à la Lieg, qui lui était assigné. Voilà, non pas comme nous sommes encore, mais comme nous serons lorsque le mouvement sera achevé ; et il ne le sera que vers la fin de ce mois, parcequ'on a envoyé les ordres de Vienne trop tard, tandis qu'on pouvait, et qu'on aurait du les envoyer beaucoup plutôt ; puisque dans ce moment tout devrait être en place et prêt à agir. L'ennemi fait remonter toutes les troupes qu'il avait au Bas-Rhin, partie de celles qu'il avait en Hollande ; et toute se rassemble vers Mayence. Lorsque nous aurons nos troupes ensemble, nous aurons des forces considérables vis-à-vis de nous. Pourrons-nous délivrer Luxembourg ? Et cette forteresse aura-t-elle des vivres pour se soutenir aussi longtemps ? Je l'ignore ; et j'ai lieu d'en douter, et c'est ainsi qu'on se met dans l'impossibilité de rien faire de bon, par une apathie qui nous fait arriver trop tard partout. Il n'y a pas de ma faute. J'ai écrit et sollicité depuis plus de quatre mois pour qu'on fit un plan, qu'on en convint avec les Alliés, qu'on fit en conséquence la distribution des troupes, et qu'on les porte où elles devaient agir, qu'on assemble des magasins dans endroits convenables, et qu'on s'assure d'avoir de l'argent. Pas une de ces choses n'est faite. On y songe depuis quinze jours, et on me demande mon avis, que j'ai dit longtemps avant que j'eus été prié. Vous voyez d'après cela que je ne peux vous dire ce que nous ferons, ni quand nous ferons. D'ailleurs les circonstances où nous nous trouvons ne permettent pas de décider ce qu'on pourra. Il faut que les nuages se dissipent, et certainement, d'après les moyens que nous aurons, nous tacherons de les employer de notre mieux. Mais ces moyens ne sont pas tels qui pourraient l'être, et qui devraient être, parce qu'on s'en est occupé trop tard. L'armée, malgré ce qu'elle a souffert, est encore belle, et en bon état; mais le terrain que nous avons à couvrir est bien étendu. Il le sera d'avantage encore si nous restons seuls. Dans peu de jours, je pourrai vous en dire d'avantage, mais je ne veux pas arrêter votre courrier aussi longtemps, et je préfère vous écrire encore bientôt."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1795, April 9, Dover Street.—"Lord Grenville has just been informed by Mr. Burges that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales intends sending Major Hislop tomorrow night with letters to Brunswick. Lord Grenville not having received from your Majesty any directions for preparing any letters to the Duke or Duchess of Brunswick on the occasion of the marriage of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, he does not presume to trouble your Majesty with any drafts for that purpose, as he imagines from what your Majesty mentioned to day, that your Majesty will write those letters. But he thought it his duty to mention to your Majesty the circumstance of Mr. Hislop's going, as your Majesty might possibly not be apprized of it."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 10, Windsor.—"I was just getting on horseback when Sylvester arrived with Lord Grenville's note and box, but being more inclined to ride than to write, I delayed redischpatching him till now; I desire the two letters which accompany this may be given to Major Hislop."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 15, Hamburgh.—"Since I had the honour of writing to you by Baron Kinkell, we have had many accounts from Holland. Mr. Fagel's two letters gave your Lordship very circumstantial and accurate details of all the most material circumstances that came to our knowledge to the 20th of last month. We have had newspapers and printed accounts since down to the 4th instant, and there are letters here of as late a date as the 6th, though the regular communication is still very much interrupted and very unsafe, and most letters we receive come occasionally by Swedish and Danish messengers.

"Your Lordship will recollect, amongst the new arrangements, the establishing of the naval and of the military committee. I do not know yet what line the army has taken, or how far the officers of the army have accepted of the offers of service under the new Government, since the whole army was disbanded. The new plan for the army was not submitted to the States General till the 29th of last month, but I have not heard the particulars.

"The naval committee (of which Paulus is a member) has been more active, and I enclose a list (Number 1) of the ships that were commissioned by this committee on the 27th March, with the names of the commanders. This list appeared in all the newspapers we have received; and at the head of it de Winter, who came back into Holland with a command in the French army, but who was formerly an officer in the Dutch navy. This man they have named Adjutant General of their navy, and he seems intended to command this squadron. In addition to this, a decree has been passed, and measures taken to prevent the exportation of all the articles employed in the construction of ships. What success they meet with in manning these ships I know not; though, from the exhausted state of their finances, I have no great opinion of it. This penury (I may say) appears constantly as a check upon all their proceedings, in many of their resolutions and decrees. In one of these (of some parts of which I enclose a translation, Number 2) they acknowledge their inability, without an immediate supply, of paying the interest of the national debt in the Province of Holland. Under the present suspension of trade and circulation, and under the pressure of the late calamities, it appears very doubtful to me whether even a Government possessing the confidence of a united people would find the funds necessary for any extraordinary expences. How little they possess this confidence, and how far the usual resources of revenue are drained, the means they resort to in hopes of replenishing their coffers will show. The provisional Representatives of Holland have passed in their own Assembly, and proposed to the States General, a plan for a forced contribution, more extensive in its operation upon all classes of the community than any that occurs in the annals of the Republic. The former plans did not include those whose property did not exceed 2,000 guilders, about 200*l*. But the circumstances of the two last loans are known to your Lordship. By this decree every person possessed of property to the amount of 500 guilders clear capital, pays one per cent. This proportion increases in a regular scale with the capitals, so that the capital of 100,000 guilders pays 4 per 100. This proportion increases again when the capitals rise above 100,000 guilders, so that a person whose capital amounts to 1,000,000 guilders is taxed at 13 per 100 or 130,000 guilders. So much for the general outline of this plan, which is of course accompanied with a variety of restrictions and exceptions. But as the operation of it must, from its nature and extent, be slow and progressive, they have been under the necessity, in the mean time, of endeavouring to obtain an immediate supply to answer the pressing demands of the moment by another decree which the provisional Representatives of Holland have passed, and recommend to the other Provinces for their adoption. I have already alluded to this decree Number 2, and enclose a translation of part of the preamble. By this act all the inhabitants of the Province of Holland are called upon to pay into the hands of commissaries appointed for that purpose, and authorised to give receipts in the name of the Government, all the gold and silver plate, or not coined, in their possession. These receipts bear interest. This expedient is represented as an anticipation of the great forced contribution. And it is further provided in the decree, that, should any person, when the great plan comes to be enforced, have paid more by this anticipation than the proportion of his capital he is bound to by the plan of forced contribution, the difference will be returned in hard money when the whole contribution is paid. This law is, of course, likewise under a number of unavoidable restrictions from the nature of it. By what I have been stating, the Republic has no great reason to rejoice at the delusion which brought about the change of situation and of Government. These are not the only lamentable consequences of this event. In addition to the enormous demand they made at first for the use of their army, the shopkeepers are obliged by a decree to take assignats in payment from the French soldiers to a certain amount; and, by this decree of the provisional Representatives of Holland, offices have been opened in their name in several places where the shopkeepers are directed to exchange these assignats for receipts, forming a new forced paper-currency in the Province under the sanction of the provisional Representatives; and which become by this decree a legal tender in part of every payment, according to a proportion settled by the same decree. These receipts (of course) already lose 50 per 100. By this method the French have evaded their engagements, and are, in fact, levying heavy contributions in many parts of the country. All intercourse in the interior parts of the Provinces is still very difficult, as well as the communication with the neighbouring countries, from the fears and suspicions of the Government, and from other causes. There is a general stagnation of all kinds of trade. In many places the shops are shut up, at Utrecht for instance. By various letters it appears that the number of people thrown out of employment and without bread increases daily, and of course the general discontent. This has broke out in several places. By the last letters, four persons have been taken up at Amsterdam, and another at the Hague, and punished with whipping and imprisonment for riotous behaviour in opposition to the new Government. At Utrecht the Municipality removed a clergyman, but were obliged to replace him in consequence of a petition signed by a great number of persons of all parties. At Amsterdam and Leyden the Municipalities have written to the provisional Representatives of Holland, objecting to the new oaths. These letters have embarrassed the new Government considerably; and, in the letter of the Municipality of Leyden, it is expressly said that they applied to the Representatives on this point, because it had given great uneasiness to a considerable number of inhabitants in that place. I have given a few instances among many of the discontents that are said to prevail in almost all the letters I have seen here, or heard of, from persons of different and even opposite parties to some of their friends here. There are six or seven Dutch families here who have had letters to this purport; some of these were conspicuous against the Stadholderian Government in 1787. I have heard besides abstracts read of letters from Foreign Ministers at the Hague who have friends here. They all agree in representing the confusion and discontent to be very great and very general; and the embarrassment of the leading people as very considerable. Amongst these, Paulus is said in positive terms still to preserve great influence; which is looked upon as a fortunate circumstance, from his being supposed to be the great advocate of the system of moderantism and conciliation. At the same time it seems that to strengthen the Government, clubs and corresponding societies have been established in most places. The papers are full of advertisements to that effect.

“What the result of all this will be it is impossible for me to say, with the little information I can have as to the views of the Continental Powers. But, should a change take place in favour of the Allies, I am perfectly convinced that, at this moment, the discontent and disappointment are so great in Holland, that an army might march into that Province and drive the French out of it with the same facility with which they came in ; whilst from the time that passed before the new arrangements were completed in Zealand, and from all that passed there, we can have no reason to doubt the aversion of that Province to the change that has taken place. At the same time I had rather see the country somewhat longer in its present lamentable situation, than to see an attempt to rescue it by any of the Continental powers if they were not almost sure of success, and determined to keep their ground and support their friends. In 1787, the money and intrigues of France made a foreign interference absolutely necessary to rescue the United Provinces from a state of apparent independence, but of real subjection ; the present situation of that country is infinitely worse, and requires a similar but still more powerful remedy. I wish I could see a chance of this. A very wealthy individual who lives here and has great concerns in Holland, and was violent against the Stadholderian Government in 1787, told a friend of mine that, if the French marched out of Holland, the most fortunate circumstance that could happen would be the Prussians taking their place immediately, as the only means of preventing bloodshed and incalculable mischief, and restoring tranquillity. By the accounts we have, it seems that even since Pichégu's departure, who left Holland the 22nd March, for Paris they say, the French troops have observed an exact discipline, and been the chief means of preserving good order.

"My intention is to stay here some time longer. I have no wish to go to the Hague as long as M. de Rhoon is in a prison, as I am not certain I should be allowed to see him if I was there, as long as he is not at liberty. He has applied to know the reasons of his arrestation, which to this moment have not been alleged, and to complain of his not being allowed to see more of his friends ; at least so the papers say, for I have no letters from him, and very imperfect accounts of him. I had a letter of the 4th instant which gives me hopes of his being released, though I do not flatter myself much of this taking place soon. M. Fagel, as well as myself, has no intention of returning to the Hague at present under the circumstances of the moment. I hope I shall have a few lines from your Lordship that I may be certain you have received my letters."

II. FAGEL (Greffier) to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 15, Hamburg.—"J'espère que les lettres que j'ai eu l'honneur de vous adresser le 28 et 31 du mois passé, vous sont bien parvenues, et que le paquet-boat à bord duquel les malles de ces deux jours ont été expédiées ne sera pas tombé entre les mains de l'ennemi. J'ai écrit en Angleterre par celui qui a été pris il y a trois semaines, et ces lettres sont sûrement perdues. La communication par Hambourg étant la seule qui nous reste, il est bien à désirer qu'on puisse la rendre aussi sûre que possible. Nous éprouvons sensiblement combien elle est plus tardive que celle à laquelle nous étions accoutumés en Hollande. Depuis que je suis ici je n'ai encore eu aucunes nouvelles de Londres, et nous remarquons qu'il s'écoule à-peu-près quatre semaines entre la date d'une lettre et l'arrivée de la réponse.

"Un courrier Suedois nous a apporté ces jours-ci des nouvelles de Hollande qui vont jusqu'au 5 de ce mois, et qui nous présentent le tableau le plus affligeant de l'état désespéré dans lequel notre malheureux pays se trouve. J'ai vu plusieurs lettres particulières, et il résulte de leur contenu que le mécontentement de tous les partis et de toutes les classes d'habitans est dès à présent monté à un point qui doit effrayer les chefs du Gouvernement actuel. Aussi leur embarras et leur manque de moyens percent-ils visiblement dans les mesures qu'ils prennent. Ces mesures sont téméraires, et leur nouveauté seule suffirait pour les rendre désagréables à une nation qui tient aussi fortement que la notre à ses anciennes habitudes, à ses usages, et même à ses préjugés. Les changemens qui s'introduisent successivement dans la forme du Gouvernement sont tels qu'ils la rendront bientôt méconnaissable aux yeux du peuple. De là des murmures qui dès-à-présent sont universels. Les gens de tous les partis se demandent de quel droit des individus s'arrogent, sous le nom arbitraire de Représentans Provisoires du Peuple, le pouvoir de renverser toutes les anciennes institutions, et de tout modeler à neuf. Les patriotes modérés sont les premiers à clamer l'audace avec laquelle ces nouveaux Législateurs détruisent au lieu de reformer. L'excès et l'exagération des changemens qu'ils introduisent, inspirent naturellement de la défiance sur leur solidité et leur durée. Enfin des personnes, dont le témoignage n'est assurément pas suspect, et qui sont à même à tous égards de juger impartialement de ce qui se passe, affirment que cette Révolution porte en elle-même le germe de sa prochaine destruction. Comme je sais que Mr. Charles Bentinek vous écrit aujourd'hui en détail, je ne vous ennuyerais pas par des répétitions inutiles; mais vous trouverez dans les faits qu'il vous communique la confirmation de tout ce que je viens de vous exposer. Rien, par exemple, n'est plus oppressif et plus fait pour causer en Hollande un mécontentement général que la grande contribution qu'on va lever, et dont j'ai déjà vu le projet imprimé par ordre du Gouvernement. Ce sera une taxe proportionnée à la fortune de chaque particulier. Tous les habitans seront à cet effet divisés en classes, depuis ceux qui possèdent un capital de 500 florins, et qui payeront un pour cent de ce capital, jusqu'à ceux dont la fortune s'élève à un million et au-delà, et dont la contribution sera portée à  $13\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. Les classes intermédiaires sont toutes taxées à proportion, de manière par exemple que, pour un capital de 100,000 florins, ou 10,000 livres sterling, il devra être payé 5 per cent. Comme une mesure préalable, il a été décrété dès le 26 Mars que tout l'or et l'argent non-monnoyé, à l'exception de quelques articles peu essentiels, doit être fourni à l'État. Ce qui augmentera nécessairement le mécontentement, c'est la stagnation totale du commerce et de la navigation, et la circulation toujours croissante d'un papier monnoyé équivalent aux assignats. Quant à la stagnation du commerce, il suffit pour s'en convaincre de jeter les yeux sur les papiers publics Hollandais, où il est dit journellement à l'article du Texel et du port d'Amsterdam (autrefois remplis dans cette saison de vaisseaux entrans et sortans): aujourd'hui il ne s'est rien passé. Pour ce qui est des assignats, les petits marchands qui vendent en détail sont obligés de les recevoir en paiement de la part des soldats Français. Mais pour en prévenir la circulation, l'assemblée des Représentans de la Hollande a émis des récépissés que les Municipalités sont autorisées à délivrer aux vendeurs en échange des assignats qu'ils reçoivent. Or ces récépissés perdent déjà 50 pour cent. Les dispositions de la marine, et de l'armée de terre paraissent également peu favorables au nouveau Gouvernement. Les matelots murmurent de ce qu'on ne les paye pas. L'armée n'est pas encore organisée. On dit cependant que le plan de sa nouvelle organisation est déjà formé, et que les officiers de l'Etat-Major seront tous démis. Mais il ne suit pas de là que la Gouvernement actuel pourra compter sur le reste de l'armée, car la grande majorité des soldats qui la composaient a été de tout temps attachée à la Maison d'Orange. Un parti nombreux parmi ceux-mêmes qu'on appellait Patriotes, est mécontent du nouvel ordre de choses. Les chefs actuels n'ont point consulté ceux de 1787, et la scission entre ces deux partis se manifeste et augmente de jour en jour d'avantage. Enfin il est encore à remarquer que le mécontentement universel produit par la conduite des meneurs actuels est d'autant plus dangereux pour eux que la Révolution, dont ils sont les auteurs, est regardée avec raison comme l'ouvrage d'une force armée étrangère. C'est donc à l'intervention de cette force armée qu'on attribue les changemens opérés dans la forme du Gouvernement, et de là résulte l'opinion générale en Hollande que ces troupes ne seront pas plutôt retirées que tout l'édifice croulera de lui-même. Tel est le résumé de rapports les plus authentiques et les plus exacts que j'ai pu recueillir sur la situation présente des affaires en Hollande. Cette situation est telle que, malgré l'activité avec laquelle le Comité de Marine a mis huit grands vaisseaux et plusieurs petits en commission, je doute que les forces navales de la République puissent être mises promptement en activité, ou qu'elles soient de longtemps formidables. Le préambule du décret relatif au fournissement de l'or et de l'argent non-monnoyé, indique clairement le but de cet armement, qui se rapporte à une guerre prochaine avec l'Angleterre. Cette puissance y est représentée comme se préparant à attaquer et à envahir la Hollande; et les vaisseaux nouvellement équipés doivent servir à la défense des ports de mer, et à la protection du commerce de la Mer du Nord et de la Mer Baltique. Je n'ai pas appris si ces vaisseaux sont destinés à former une escadre, ou à agir séparément.

"Comme il ne m'est pas encore parvenu de réponse à la lettre que j'ai écrite à l'assemblée actuelle des États-Généraux, et que je n'ai pas reçu non plus la résolution par laquelle cette assemblée m'a donné ma démission dans ma qualité de Greffier, je suis toujours dans la même incertitude relativement à mes démarches ultérieures. Quand j'aurai pu prendre une détermination quelconque, je prendrai la liberté de vous en faire part.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1735, April 17, Queen's House.—"One cannot but be hurt that the King of Prussia can have been so ill-advised as to conclude a treaty of peace with the common enemy; but I should not be surprised if, on his hearing how very confused the state of Paris now is, he should decline ratifying this disgraceful measure."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 22, Queen's House.—"I shall very willingly receive the Earl of Bute this day as Ambassador to the Court of Spain. I cannot at the same time avoid expressing to Lord Grenville some uneasiness at the intelligence received from the Duc de Choiseul of Spain being in treaty with the National Convention."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, April 22], Hollwood.—"By a letter which I have just received from Dundas, I find the Cabinet is not to meet till Tuesday. I therefore conclude, in such weather as this, you will not be inclined to leave Dropmore, but as you must be in town on Tuesday, perhaps you will dine here that day. I have desired Dundas to send you the King's letter on the Prussian business, which is very moderate and rational. If the neutrality could be adopted for Hanover, without implying separate negotiation for peace, or giving jealousy to Austria, it might perhaps be the best step, with a view both of saving expense, avoiding unpopularity, and obtaining disposable force.

"How far it is practicable at all, and still more on decent grounds, depends upon knowing what has already passed with the Regency. This I hope to learn to-morrow; as I mean to go to town to assist at Dundas's German conference."

LORD GRENVILLE to C. BENTINCK.

1795, April 22, Dover Street.—"I entirely agree with you in the impossibility of your going to the Hague under the present circumstances, or indeed till your brother is released. My last accounts from Holland gave me some reason to imagine that this might soon happen, but I place little dependence upon them, and would by no means advise you to run any risk in that respect. The peace which the King of Prussia has concluded with the Convention, whatever may be its effects in other respects, seems to afford more security to your residence at Oldenburgh; and means may gradually open themselves of finding some communication with the Hague. There seems little reason to doubt that the effects of the French system are already producing that spirit in Holland to which they must necessarily lead. One must regret that this was not foreseen by those who might have prevented the mischief; but, as it is, the object must be to profit of the opportunities which the present state of things may offer; and I trust that, even in that point of view, the prospect is not unfavourable."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, April 23], Wimbledon.—"I send you a note I received from the King in answer to the one I wrote to him on the subject of the King of Prussia's conduct. I think it right, before the Cabinet meets, to see the two persons to whom the King refers; at the same time, I do not expect anything in addition to what we already know, except that perhaps we may learn with more precision than we have yet done what has been the exact line of conduct pursued by the Regency of Hanover, preparatory to the negotiation of Basle. I have appointed Baron Steenberg and Captain Berger tomorrow forenoon, and shall not therefore summon the Cabinet till Tuesday, at 12 o'clock. From the tenor of the King's answer to me, he is clearly prepared to receive any advice that may [be] given to him. It does not occur to me that we can possibly give him any other advice but to avail himself of the neutrality, unless we saw some means of affording more substantial succours than I am sure we can at present. We are more likely to diminish what he has than to add to the defence of Hanover and Osnabrug."

CONTROVERSY WITH DENMARK.

Minute of Conference with Count Wedel.

1795, April 23.—"Count Wedel began the conversation by expressing his hope that I could give him some satisfactory assurance on the subject of his letter to me. I then stated to him at large the present situation of France; the evident distress arising from the want of provisions; the total impossibility of the Convention continuing to support the war under this difficulty, and the report of Boissy d'Anglas, which stated both that the importation of corn into France from the North last year had all been produced by purchases actually made in the North by the Government itself, and also that their great hope of relieving their present distress arose from similar supplies, of which they were in immediate expectation. That, under these circumstances, I was sure the Danish Government was too just to wish that the King should see those supplies passing by his ports, without taking the necessary measures to interrupt a commerce which, by the avowal of the Convention itself, had been carried on in a manner contrary to the treaties between England and Denmark, namely, by covering enemies' property under neutral colours, and which was of such importance in the present moment that it might be said to afford to the Convention the only possible means of continuing the war. But that while measures for this purpose were adopted, this Government was very desirous to render them as little as possible vexatious or inconvenient to the commerce of Denmark. That, in the course of the last year, I had received from him many complaints of delays and other inconveniences to which the Danish vessels had been subjected. That I had always endeavoured to remove them, but that many of them depended on circumstances which could not be remedied by this intervention. That the King's Government was now endeavouring to establish such general regulations as might remove the possibility of similar inconveniences in future, and that I had every reason to hope that our endeavours in this respect would be in a great degree successful. But that if, in the course of these transactions, any idea for the same purpose suggested itself to him, I wished him to state it to me, and he might be assured it should meet with the most attentive consideration.

"This communication was received by him with great apparent cordiality and satisfaction; and, in the course of what passed between us, he told me expressly that he was satisfied that if Count Bernstorff saw that appearances were saved he would desire no more.

"The points which he particularly mentioned in the course of the conversation were these.

"First, that the Order should not be general to take all ships laden with provisions and bound to France, but only such whose papers afforded some ground of suspicion.

"I forbore entering into this, because I foresaw it might renew discussion we had formerly had respecting the incompetence of the proof which he has frequently maintained as arising from the papers of a vessel being in due form and without any irregularity.

"Secondly, that no distinction would be observed to the advantage of America or Sweden in this respect. On this point I told him that if any distinction was made with respect to Sweden it would be one unfavourable to that Power, who was by the express words of a treaty, restrained from carrying corn to the enemy. And that, with respect to America, although I could not formally communicate to him our treaty with that Power previous to its ratification, I could tell him, in confidence, that the stipulation on that subject obliged us only to pay for the corn which we should stop; and that I could give him the most positive assurances that no distinction should be made unfavourable to Denmark as to the mode of treating their ships.

"Thirdly, as to the amount of the percentage to be added to the invoice, which he strongly urged should be increased; because, he said,

France had given 15 per cent. in such cases, and that the hope of a large profit in France made the merchant dissatisfied with a compulsory sale here.

"This point I took entirely ad referendum.

"Fourthly, as to the means of avoiding delays of every kind; in the unloading of the cargo; in the valuation of the sum to be allowed; in the release of the ship; and in the payment of the money awarded.

"On all these we entered into some discussion of the measures now in contemplation, which, in general, seemed to be satisfactory to him. But I desired him to consider whether he could propose any other ideas for the same purpose, and if he could, to let me know them.

"In the course of the conversation I expressed that my anxiety to prevent any disagreeable discussion between the two Courts from arising in the course of these measures was increased by the prospect which the present situation seemed to afford of bringing the two countries nearer. That difficulties had formerly arisen in this respect from our situation towards Russia; whereas, in the present moment, that consideration afforded an additional facility, circumstanced as we now were with respect to the Court at Petersburg. That the system which Sweden was so evidently pursuing, and which I was well assured could not be that of Denmark, was another circumstance which seemed to lead to the same conclusion. These hints seemed to produce their effect, and he entered with much earnestness into the subject of Sweden; mentioning M. de Stahl's negotiation at Paris for a subsidy, and the determination of his Court not to be led into a system so directly opposite to all its views.

"Our conference ended in the most amicable manner, and he promised to represent the whole subject at Copenhagen in the light in which I had stated it, hoping that I would co-operate with him here in preventing all grounds of uneasiness.

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 25, Hamburg.—"I sent the Duke of Portland by last post some details we had from a Comte de Gimel, an émigré officer in the Dutch service, who left the Hague the 9th and Amsterdam the 11th instant, and came by sea to this place. Not knowing M. de Gimel personally, I did not write to your Lordship; and left it to the Duke of Portland to send you the letter, if he thought it deserved any attention. I mentioned that this officer was very well known at Hampton Court.

"We have since seen here General de Geuzau, who likewise left the Hague the 9th, and came by Wezel, having obtained passes from the new Government and from the French Generals, and leave from the former for four months. M. de Geuzau's character stands so high in every respect that I have no doubt your Lordship will be glad to hear his account of the state of things in the Republic, when he came away. It is remarkable enough it should correspond nearly in every respect with what we had from M. de Gimel, but it is much more circumstantial.

"Soon after the surrender of Breda (the 24th January, I think) where M. de Geuzau was Governor, he came to the Hague, and there he was obliged to see Pichégu, having some points to settle with him relative to the troops that were at Breda. Upon his mentioning that he had left there two Commissaries of the Convention, who were just arrived, Pichégu said, encore des Commissaires, nous en avons déjà bien assez, or something to that purpose. He received many marks of attention and regard from this officer, and attributes chiefly to him, and to some of the French commanders, that the army did not meet with a great deal of ill-treatment from the new Government. Having often seen Pichégru, he represents him as a humane well-disposed man, very unassuming, and talking very little because he sees he is observed; though he does not always conceal his dislike to the system he acts under. I have just mentioned an instance of this. M. de Geuzau was present another time when, a party of Dutch and French dining at the Danish Minister's, the conversation fell upon the late changes; some one in company said they were modelling their Government entirely on the French, Pichégru replied, they might have found a better model.

"M. de Geuzau confirms very strongly the details we have sent to England of the unpopularity of the new Government, of their divisions amongst themselves, and of the general aversion of the patriots of 1787 to the system of the day. He said the supporters of this system were already divided into three parties; that they were very much embarrassed by the French not having hitherto shown any disposition to treat with them as with an independent Government, and even refused lately their proposals of alliance, a circumstance which had given them great alarm. That they met with great obstacles in the execution of their plan. The Provinces had refused to meet in a National Convention of the Seven, insisting upon the ancient distinction of territory, and upon a federal constitution. That they were in no place more refractory than in Friesland. He even added expressly that they nowhere showed so much impatience for the restoration of the old Government, as in this Province.

"What seemed most to take up the attention of the Cabal when he came away, is the organisation of their army. It is to consist of 38,000 men, and to be divided and subdivided in the manner of the French army, with the same distinctions of rank for the officers. But they go on slowly, as there is a general reluctance to accept of the offers of service, of which General Geuzau mentioned instances, such as the officers of two regiments having all declined. He is afraid, however, this zeal will only last for a time. The habits, prejudices, and attachments of the army no doubt make all impatient of a change at this moment, and a great many will persevere in not accepting of situations. But many of the officers have only their pay to subsist upon; and so many tempting offers are held out to the soldiers and subalterns, that it is not probable they will hold out for ever. At the same time, he said, they (the new Government) could place little dependence on the army at this moment. How the Swiss cantons would dispose of their regiments was uncertain; they were in Friesland and Groningen. He confirmed the accounts of tumults in different parts of the country in opposition to the new system, at the beginning of April. They broke out the same day, on the rumour of the approach of the Prussians. I should not forget to say that M. de Gimel computes the troops of the French Convention within the Provinces at about thirty thousand.

"The friends of the old Government (the General said) were absolutely destitute of any intelligence from without, and in a state of painful anxiety as to the views of the Powers they suppose desirous of giving them assistance, and rescuing them from their oppressors. Their situation becomes more afflicting every day.

"Since I wrote this, I have seen a Dutch newspaper of the 18th instant stating the conditions upon which the Committee of Public Safety at Paris are willing to withdraw their army from a great part of the Seven Provinces. They (the Seven Provinces) are to pay the whole expence of the war the French decared against them, as far as the Dutch were concerned. The French are provisionally to keep the keys of the Seven Provinces towards the Netherlands, and the best part of Zealand in their hands ; and the Seven Provinces are to pay twenty millions of florins immediately. On these conditions the French are willing to conclude an alliance offensive and defensive. God grant a concurrence of more fortunate circumstances than have lately attended the efforts of Great Britain on the Continent may rescue those unhappy Provinces from a situation so lamentable and ignominious ; and bring upon the authors of it, who have so basely sacrificed their country to its natural enemy, the punishment due to their treachery and their crimes.

“M. de Geuzau gave us great hopes of my brother being soon released, and did not think the Pensionary in danger of his life ; but he advised us strongly against going to Holland for the present, as he had no doubt we should be immediately apprehended on our arrival, and detained in prison for some time.”

GEORGE III to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, April 26, Windsor.—“I have received Lord Grenville’s note accompanying the two letters he has got from Lord Malmesbury on the sums he has disbursed in his late mission to Brunswick, and think Lord Grenville must take the usual method of attesting his disbursements to the Lords of the Treasury, as is practiced in other foreign missions where the expenses have been occurred [incurred] by directions through the Secretary of State.”

REPORT ON FRENCH AFFAIRS.

1795, April. Situation de Paris.—“J’ai quitté Paris le 13 d’Avril ; la ville et les faubourgs étaient ce qu’on appelle tranquilles, c’est à dire, pas en révolte ouverte ; car depuis le 17 Mars, la fermentation était, à la vérité, plus ou moins générale, mais continuelle.

“Le Gouvernement tout en assurant qu’il n’a pas peur, cache assez mal ses inquiétudes, qui sont d’autant mieux fondées qu’il a bien appris dans la journée du 12, de ne point compter sur ses canoniers et les gens-d’armes, la plus part parents ou amis de la sansculotterie, et de se défier extrêmement de la force armée des plusieurs sections.

“Il eut environ 40 personnes tués ou blessés les jours du 12 et 13 Germinal ; on se fusilla en cinq endroits, et tira du canon en deux. Cent-soixante et quelques individus ont été arrêtés comme chefs ou complices actives, de la conjuration. L’indécision du Député Duhem, le hasard, et une heureuse confusion surtout, contribuèrent plus que les mesures du Gouvernement, à sauver la Convention.

puissent absolument pas se passer, le pain et la Comédie. Depuis près de quatre mois, on ne permet plus de chanter dans aucun spectacle la célèbre Marseillaise, ni la Carmagnole ; mais à leur place un cantique, appelé le Réveil du Peuple, qu'on demande et applaudit avec une sorte de fureur.

Subsistances.—“L'égalité n'est pas tant une chimère en France, mais elle existe réellement dans une commune et affreuse misère. Depuis sept mois, les villes les plus considérables étaient réduits à une demie livre, les autres à un quart de livre, et souvent, à quelques onces de pain. Des milliers des pétitions, ou plutôt mille cris de famine, poussés de tous les coins de ce malheureux pays, étaient étouffés par un arrêté secret du Comité de Salut Public, qui ordonna de n'admettre aucun pétitionnaire de cette espèce à la barre, mais de les lui renvoyer pour ne pas donner des inquiétudes au peuple, et l'éveil aux ennemis de la patrie. Toute la sollicitude du Gouvernement était réservée pour l'approvisionnement de Paris, et toute autre considération lui fut sacrifiée. Cependant, malgré les efforts constants, et les sacrifices immenses de ce Gouvernement, malgré la multitude, les gains et les violences de ses Commissaires, dont tous les districts fourmillent, il lui a été impossible, depuis trois mois, de faire fournir seulement un quart de livre de pain à chaque citoyen par jour.

Muscadins.—“La fameuse jeunesse de Paris n'est réellement qu'un ramas des polissons élégants, et d'assez méchants garnements, dont cette ville eut toujours une heureuse abondance. Ceux qui font, pour ainsi dire, corps, sont au nombre de cinq à six cents. Ils ont pour rendez-vous le Café de Chartre et le vestibule adjacent du Palais Royal, et pour costume, ce qu'ils appellent et croient même le costume Anglais, mais qui en est réellement une très ridicule caricature. Lorsqu'ils veulent faire quelqu'opération, ils vont recruter tant ce qu'ils peuvent trouver dans les rues, dans les cafés, et tout autre place de jeunes gens. Il se joint encore à eux une députation ou plutôt un détachement des forts de la Halle, et quelques milliers des déserteurs de la première réquisition dans les jours de crise. Le Gouvernement les a protégé et fait conduire en partie, par ses affidés. Entre un grand nombre des sottises, ils font ou disent par fois une bonne chose. Le Comité de Salut-Public crut d'avoir besoin de leur forces et de leur enfantillages pour renverser le hôtel de Marat ; et si cela était nécessaire, il a très bien réussi. Le buste de Marat fut pendu ou écrasé dans tons les spectacles, et jété par la fenêtre de toutes les maisons (car je ne crois pas qu'il avait à Paris cent maisons dépourvues de ce nouveau Palladium) avant que la Convention osa mettre son cadavre hors le Panthéon.

Esprit Publique.—« Lorsqu'on, entend à chaque instant, en tout lieu, et par toutes les classes du peuple, les propos les plus forts et les plus injurieux à la Convention ; ne parler de République, de Liberté, et d'Egalité qu'en faisant les grimaces les plus expressives ; des Représentants du peuple qu'avec le mépris le plus affecté ; comparer les douceurs de l'ancien régime avec les calamités du nouveau ; témoigner de la manière la plus énergique les regrets de tant des sacrifices faits pour la Révolution ; lorsqu'on voit fouler au pied les couleurs nationales, traîner dans la boue le tableau des droits de l'homme ; couper, en moins de trois semaines, plus de deux mille arbres de liberté dans le seul arrondissement de Paris ; effacer des maisons les inscriptions républicains, chanter sur tous les théâtres des cantiques contre—révolutionnaires ; on peut conclure sans doute que l'esprit publique a considérablement changé, ou qu'il est beaucoup moins travaillé et comprimé. Mais ce serait bien mal connaître la frivolité, l'inconséquence, et la lacheté des Parisiens, si l'on en attendait des plus grands et des plus sérieux résultats, à même d'un plan sagement conçu et exécuté pour donner à tant des passions et des besoins l'évervescence ou le degré nécessaire, et surtout la direction convenable.

Convention.—« La plupart des membres de la Convention sont si parfaitement convaincus de leur propre nullité en particulier, et de leur défauts de moyens en générale, qu'ils auraient consenti et consentiraient encore, sans beaucoup de répugnance, à remettre en des mains plus habiles, ou du moins plus hardies, des pouvoirs énormes, dont ils ne savent, et n'osent faire usage ; pourvu qu'ils puissent espérer leur sûreté personnelle pour prix de leur sacrifice et de leur modestie. Quoiqu'ils n'aiment ni estiment beaucoup l'Abbé Siéyès, persuadés cependant que c'est le seul d'entre eux qui possède une étincelle de génie, ils semblent attendre de lui seul, le salut de la patrie et le leur.

« Ce Siéyès est assez difficile à voir et à connaître. Il réunit les défauts d'un bel esprit aux vices d'un moine ; il est pereux et hypocrite ; il met beaucoup de mystère dans ses opinions et sa conduite, se pique, comme Robespierre, de la réputation d'un homme austère et incorruptible, et exerce, comme lui, une très grande influence dans la Convention ;

son opinion devenant celle des tous les figurants, qui n'ont jamais une à eux. Le Comité de Salut Public le consulte, quoiqu'il n'en soit plus membre; et le Comité de Sûreté Générale lui montre beaucoup de déférence, en incarcérant ou élargissant quiconque est demandé ou réclamé par lui.

“La grande majorité de la Convention est très persuadée que la Constitution de 1793 est absolument impracticable; que c'est une idole aussi honteuse et aussi méprisable que le fut le buste de Marat. Mais, ayant juré aussi souvent de soutenir l'une qu'ils ont été à la procession de l'autre, ces pauvres gens font mille singeries (je ne sais trop par peur, ou par un reste d'amour-propre) avant d'oser la renverser.

“Le parti des ci-devant incarcérés et mis hors de la loi, sans s'embarrasser beaucoup des dissensions, se rend toujours maître des décisions en forçant les décrets par leur grande majorité. Il n'y a cependant entre eux que Saladin, Louvet, Isnard et Mercier, qui aient beaucoup d'esprit et qui soient travailleurs.

Saladin est un Royaliste décidé et capable de tout entreprendre, s'il était encouragé d'une manière convenable. Il dit, et paraît réellement, aimer beaucoup la nation Anglaise, il est très lié avec un Mr. Kearny, ci-devant prêtre et régent du Collège des Ecossais à Paris, par lequel j'ai fait sa connaissance. Saladin est pauvre; je suis sûr que, moitié par inclination, moitié par intérêt, ce Député se résoudrait à tout.

“Je suis intimement convaincu qu'à l'époque du 28 Mars, les deux-tiers de la Convention en peut faits eux-mêmes la contre-révolution, s'ils avaient su comment la faire. Par une fatalité inconcevable, des puissances font la paix, d'autres reconnaissent la République au moment même que le Comité de Salut Public et la Convention avaient désespéré de la paix et de la République.

Décret contre les Terroristes.—“Après avoir traité dans le sein de la Convention même de canaille et de populace, ce qu'on appelait, il y a peu de temps, la portion la plus pure et la plus intéressante de peuple, le véritable souverain, on ne pourrait pas se refuser à la conviction que la Révolution marche à grands pas sur son retour, quand on ne connaîtrait pas le décret contre les partisans du Terrorisme ; c'est à dire, selon l'esprit du décret, et surtout selon l'esprit de parti, les instruments aveugles et les mains coupables des véritables Terroristes, et tous ceux qui, pour m'exprimer en terme technique, ont montré de l'énergie dans les grandes circonstances, ou se sont fortement prononcé pour les grands principes. Ce décret m'a fait le plus grand plaisir, et doit avoir les suites les plus heureuses ; mais, certes, s'il n'est pas intentionnellement contre-révolutionnaire, il est sous tous les rapports, morales ou politiques, un monument frappant d'une bêtise et d'une impudence atroce. De la bêtise, parceque ce n'est pas désarmer un homme que de lui prendre une méchante pique, que le plus maladroit peut remplacer en quelques minutes d'une autre, au même d'un instrument plus avantageux pour se défendre et plus meriteux [meurtrier ?] pour attaquer. De l'impudence, parceque ce n'est pas ce misérable sans-culotte, pas même les membres d'un Comité révolutionnaire, qui pouvaient ordonner ou empêcher un seul des milliers d'assassinats que la perfidie ou la lâcheté de ces fiers décréteurs a laissé commettre.

“Quoiqu'il en soit de l'intention du décret, il reste toujours vrai qu'il met à la disposition de tous les ennemis de la Convention, et par suite de la République, ces hommes pour lesquels et par lesquels seuls on sembla faire la Révolution ; les seuls qui aient réellement quelque bonne foi et du courage. Ces hommes auxquels on a si longtemps prodigué les promesses les plus extravagantes, et les flagorneries les plus absurdes, se voyent enfin trompés, trahis, et méprisés. Ils sont cruellement tourmentés par la faim, et la vengeance. Il ne leur faudrait peut-être qu'un chef, quelques écus, et quelques heures, pour renverser la Convention et la République.

Liberté des Cultes.—“Partout on a profité avec enthousiasme du décret sur la Liberté des Cultes. Un prêtre non-assermenté est censé une découverte précieuse, et grand nombre de ceux qui se tenaient cachés, se montrent sans crainte ; et les communes qui ont le bonheur de les posséder, les prennent sur leur protection spéciale. Nul part on ne permet à un prêtre-jureur d'exercer ses fonctions, à moins de réabjurer son serment ; ce qu'ils font ordinairement sans hésiter. Que ne jureraient-ils pas ?

Armée.—“La nouvelle organisation de l'armée ayant rendu les quartiers—maîtres—trésoriers susceptibles d'avancement comme les autres officiers, il en devait nécessairement résulter les plus grands inconvénients pour l'ordre et la comptabilité. L'ineptie des commissaires de guerre, la plupart jeunes gens sans la moindre expérience dans leur métier, ouvrit une autre partie aux abus et dilapidations de toute espèce. Aussi l'esprit de gaspillage et de rapine devint si générale, que d'après le relevé des sommes payées pendant l'an 1793 et 1794, sous titre de prêt des armées, il assert qu'elles auraient dû être au moins de 1,300,000 hommes, de tout grade ; tandis qu'il est prouvé par les pièces les plus authentiques, qu'elles n'ont jamais été à 900 mille hommes, ceux de réquisition en dépôt, non armés, et renvoyés dans leur domicile y compris. Il y a nombre des bataillons qui ont été entièrement renouvelés depuis leur formation, et qui n'ont encore jamais rendu aucune espèce de compte.

Armée du Comité du Salut Public.—“ Déjà au mois d'Octobre, le Comité de Salut Public fit placer à Versailles, St. Germain, et autres endroits voisins de Paris, environ huit mille hommes, tant infanterie que cavalerie, sous la dénomination de dépôt. Il vint d'en faire venir quatorze mille autres de l'armée du Nord et Sambre et Meuse, sous le prétexte de protéger l'arrivage des grains et farines ; aussi il se trouve dans l'arrondissement de Paris au moins une armée de vingt-deux mille hommes.

Marine.—“ Les rapports des Représentants du peuple dans les ports, et des Commandants des Escadres sont remplies des plaintes sur l'ignorance et l'insubordination des officiers, la mauvaise espèce et l'indiscipline des matelots. On m'a assuré qu'un nombre considérable d'officiers Suédois et Danois allaient être employés sur les flottes, et que le Comité de Salut Public allait faire exécuter un plan d'attaque en grande masse, semblable à celui des armées de terre. J'avoue que je ne conçois rien à ce plan.”

SIR MORTON EDEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1795, May 4, Vienna.—“ I avail myself of the return to England of the messenger to offer your Lordship my sincere thanks for your private letter of the 17th past, and to assure your Lordship that nothing shall be wanting on my part to promote celerity and vigour in the measures of this Government. I feel with your Lordship how necessary it is to urge them on. Their slowness and want of energy often render my situation very painful, but never more so than during the progress of the present business. For many weeks past a day has seldom gone by without my stating to M. de Thugut the utter impossibility of making any change in the conditions of the loan, and urging him to come to some decision; but to what little purpose the event unhappily shews. And yet that he is desirous to pursue the war with vigour I cannot doubt.

"I sincerely lament his want of confidence in Count Stahremberg. At this moment it must be highly prejudicial to the interests of the two Courts; but the disposition and language of his family with regard to M. de Thugut are such as to give me little hopes of any change.

"I have more than once stated that the principal nobility are very virulent against him, and as the chief employments are in their hands, they find means often to thwart him; but possessing as he undoubtedly does the confidence of the sovereign, he might establish such a responsibility both amongst the military and throughout the several departments as would ensure success to his measures.

"His language as to the necessity of making, at this moment, some vigorous effort is entirely conformable to that of your Lordship. He, equally with us, laments the inactivity of the armies; and in his own justification, alleges that M. de Vins has the most positive orders to act offensively and according to our desire, carte blanche as to the mode; and that Marshal Clairfait, as your Lordship has seen by my late letters, has such instructions and incitements as are best calculated to make him act with enterprise and vigour. Both these officers are able and brave, but the late campaigns have shewed that the latter has not that decision of mind which is so necessary at the present important crisis. This is generally said, and yet the public opinion does not point out any General more capable.

"Mr. Wickham wrote to me some time ago; by the return of the post I assured him that I should be happy in his further correspondence, and in co-operating with him for the good of His Majesty's service, but I have not again heard from him."

LORD GRENVILLE to WILLIAM WICKHAM.

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

1795, May 9, Dover Street.—"I enclose your Grace a letter from Charles Bentinck, which I received yesterday. The accounts continue very satisfactory from that quarter.

"It is a curious fact that, in consequence of the letter written by the Duke of Brunswick to the King of Prussia, the latter has sent for him to Berlin. What this will produce it is difficult to guess."

LORD GRENVILLE to JOHN JAY.

1795, May 11, Dover Street.—"I cannot resist the desire I feel of availing myself of the opportunity of the first packet since your departure, to express to you how happy you would make me by allowing me occasionally to recall to your recollection in this manner one who will always entertain for you the most sincere esteem and friendship. I am particularly anxious to hear of your safe arrival, and that you have found your family and friends well. These are points paramount to all other considerations, but I know your return to your country will not be fully satisfactory to you unless you have also found the state of public affairs such as to promise the continuance of good order and tranquillity. That it may be so, no one more sincerely wishes than myself, and it would be a great satisfaction to me to hear it from you.

"Since you left us, the news of the arrival of the treaty in America has reached us. We were singularly unfortunate in the loss of the Tankerville packet. By a strange negligence the November and December mails from hence were both put on board that ship without our having any notice of it from the Post Office; so that, while I thought we were sending duplicates by two different conveyances, we were in fact sending them by the same vessel. My letters to Governor Simcoe, which I have frequently mentioned to you, and my despatches to Mr. Hammond on the subject of the treaty, were on board the same ship; so that this accident has thrown us far back in the arrangement of many material points. I hope, however, that with attention, and a continuance on the part of the two Governments of the same disposition which actuated all our communications and negotiations here, the great work which we have begun will be carried to its full extent.

"I have not been inattentive to the points which remain to be settled here. One of the most material is, I flatter myself, at length in a train of being well arranged; I mean that which relates to the Admiralty Courts in the West Indies, which it is in contemplation immediately to diminish in point of number, so as to have them only at Jamaica, Barbadoes, Grenada, Antigua, and Martinico. Knowing, as I do, how much evil has been produced by the multiplication of these courts, I look to this reduction with very sanguine hopes. But I hope the regulation will not stop there, but that the effect of it may lead to render the practice of those which will remain more correct and cautious than I fear it has hitherto been.

"The impossibility of our receiving the ratification of the treaty till quite the end of July leaves us no chance of being able to propose to Parliament, during the present session, those matters connected with the treaty in which the interference of the Legislature is necessary. I know that the delay will be misconstrued on your side of the water, but it is unavoidable. I requested Mr. Pinckney, before he went to Spain, to write to America on this point, in order that the explanation of it might not rest merely on the communications of our minister there. You will be able to speak with still more knowledge and effect to the same point. Whatever does not depend on the repeal or alteration of existing laws will be immediately executed on the receipt of the ratification.

"The public papers and other communications will inform you fully of the state of affairs in Europe. The dispositions of the people in France are evidently turning very fast towards the establishment of some settled state of order, which may relieve them from the miseries of their present anarchy. In a similar situation in this country we experienced the advantage of a known and moderate form of Government, under which the nation had before been happy, and to which, therefore, it returned with enthusiasm, and almost with unanimity. The want of such a standard to resort to is now, as far as I can judge, the great obstacle to the restoration of order in France, and consequently of peace in Europe. Mild as their old Government was in its practice, it was attended with many circumstances, the renewal of which creates great apprehension and uneasiness; and there is no authority of sufficient weight to prescribe the form and limits of any change. Some of the belligerent Powers are, as you will have seen, too impatient to wait the result of this doubtful issue. To others, all idea of peace which shall not give better security than the signature of the Committee of Safety, or the ratification of the Convention, seems delusive and dangerous ; and to this sentiment I profess myself strongly inclined. You are happy in America if you can avoid, as I trust you will, the dangers both of the war and of the peace."

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1795, May 19, Dover Street.—"J'ai le plaisir de vous prévenir que notre courrier est enfin arrivé avec la convention pour l'affaire de l'emprunt, signée par M. Thugut, et ratifiée par Sa Majesté Impériale. J'espère que la ratification du Roi sera prête demain, ensorte que nous pourrons faire l'échange des deux instrumens Jeudi matin. Je serai au bureau sur les onze heures demain si vous avez, par hazard, quelque chose à me communiquer, ou à me demander."

WILLIAM WICKHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1795, May 25, Mulheim.—"Though I have not yet heard anything from the Duke of Portland, yet I feel that I ought not to delay a moment acknowledging your Lordship's very kind letter of the 5th instant.

"In the first place, laying aside all questions of personal obligation, I consider myself as so entirely committed to the Duke of Portland that, in point of honour, I could not give up even the place to which he first appointed me for any situation whatever in any other Department, or under any other person, without his full consent and approbation.

"In the second place, I will say very fairly to your Lordship that, as far as regards myself, I should prefer the place that his Grace seems disposed to offer me, or any other of credit or confidence at home, to any situation whatever out of my own country, even the most splendid and most honourable.

"On the other hand, having undertaken my present employment with the full consent and approbation of his Grace, and being sensible that the local knowledge and experience I have acquired here may be of real utility to his Majesty's service and the interests of my country, I do not hesitate to say that nothing less than his Grace's absolute commands should induce me to abandon my situation. It is not that I have the vanity to suppose that a much abler and a much fitter person for such a situation might not be found, but the advantages that seven months of hard labour and attentive observation have given me are not to be put into competition with any others in a moment like the present, when each day may bring about the most important alteration in the situation of public affairs, and may offer opportunities of which nothing but local knowledge and experience could enable any one to profit.

"I am perfectly aware, unless a speedy termination should be put to matters here, that in adopting this line of conduct I expose myself to lose all my best hopes. It is impossible either for me to wish, or for the Duke of Portland to gratify me in an expectation, that the place of Under Secretary could be kept much longer open. I will go further and say that, on his Grace's account, I ought not to desire it. I am aware also that my present situation is one of much personal responsibility and danger. But I feel that it is my duty to remain here, and I beg your Lordship to be persuaded that it is upon that single ground that I have founded my determination. It is indeed the only one that could enable me to reason and act as I am doing at this moment when I am about to abandon the object that, of all others, would have been the most agreeable to me.

“With respect to my future destination, though I am aware that I shall come to your Lordship with a very ill grace, and by no means in a manner that will enable me to ask any favour, yet I rely so entirely upon the kind expression at the close of your Lordship’s letter that I venture to say without difficulty that if I must stay abroad, I should most particularly wish that America might not be the place of my destination. I will give your Lordship my reasons at large by some other occasion.

“I cannot sufficiently thank your Lordship for having sent me Mr. Flint. It is a relief to me of which you can have no idea.”

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, May 27, Hambourg.—“Je continue à profiter de la permission que vous m’avez accordée de vous donner de temps en temps de mes nouvelles. Celles que nous recevons de notre malheureux pays prennent de jour en jour un caractère plus affligeant. Vous aurez, sans doute, déjà vu le traité d’alliance dernièrement conclu entre notre Gouvernement actuel et le République Française. J’emploie le mot de traité pour ne pas tomber dans des longueurs, car d’ailleurs une transaction aussi inouïe, et aussi monstrueuse ne mérite pas ce nom. Ce qui m’en frappe le plus c’est l’impossibilité où il me paraît que notre nouveau Gouvernement doit se trouver d’en remplir de son côté les conditions. Les 100 millions, par exemple, qu’il s’engage à payer à la France en espèces ou en lettres de change n’existent certainement pas dans le pays, et je ne conçois pas d’où on les tirera. On aura beau imposer de nouvelles contributions; aucun habitant n’a le moyen de les payer. Le numéraire a entièrement disparu; et comme les rentes dues par différentes Puissances étrangères ne se payent plus, et que le commerce est dans un état de stagnation absolue, les sources de la richesse du pays sont pour le moment complètement tariées. Cette même cause empêchera l’équipement des vaisseaux de ligne et des frégates qu’on promet de fournir à la France pour la campagne de cette année. Avec cela il est incroyable que, dans un moment où toutes ces circonstances ont lieu, on déclare la guerre à la moitié de l’Europe. C’est obliger les Puissances qui auraient pu rester spectatrices indifférentes de ce qui se passe en Hollande, à prendre parti; c’est, par exemple, mettre l’Espagne dans la nécessité de ne pas relâcher les vaisseaux Hollandais qu’elle a saisis; c’est forcer l’Empereur, la Russie, à ne pas payer, du moins en Hollande, les intérêts de leurs emprunts. Par cette même mesure on sacrifie, pour ainsi dire d’un trait de plume, l’immense propriété Hollandaise qui se trouve déjà dans les ports d’Angleterre, et, à coup sûr, une grande partie de celle qui est encore sur les mers. En considérant tout cela attentivement, je pense que cette déclaration de guerre, surtout contre l’Angleterre, est peut-être dans ce moment un événement heureux pour nous; et, qu’en permettant au Gouvernement Britannique de prendre des mesures plus décisives qu’il n’a pu faire jusqu’à présent, elle accélérera le retour d’un autre ordre de choses. C’est du moins un espoir auquel on aime à se laisser aller, quand il n’en reste pas d’autre.

“L’esprit de parti, poussé jusqu’à la fureur, qui a seul pu dicter un pareil engagement, se déchaîne en particulier contre moi d’une manière à laquelle, en d’autres temps, je n’aurais jamais pu m’attendre. La lettre que j’ai écrite à l’assemblée actuelle des Etats-Généraux a servi de prétexte pour se porter aux plus grandes violences. Le nouveau Gouvernement vient de faire séquestrer tous mes biens. On a fait l'inventaire de tout ce que je possède en biens fonds, et en meubles, et objets précieux de toute espèce, comme bibliothèque, tableaux, cabinets d'estampes et de desseins; et on y a mis le scellé en nommant deux notaires pour en prendre possession et administrer le tout. Cela s'est fait avec si peu de ménagemens que, dans le premier moment, on n'a pas même laissé à ma femme, et à une partie de ma famille qui demeure actuellement avec elle dans ma maison, l'usage des meubles les plus indispensables, ou qui lui appartenaient en propre. Cependant, sur sa réclamation, on a apporté quelque adoucissement à la rigueur du premier décret. Supposé même que je n'eus pas écrit la lettre qui a fourni le prétexte de ces procédés arbitraires, on n'en aurait pas moins commis ces violences; mais on en allégué maintenant pour raison le refus que je fais de rendre compte de ma conduite, et, en particulier, de la commission que j'ai remplie à Londres. La saisie de mes biens sera, selon toute apparence, suivie de leur confiscation, si je ne rentre pas en Hollande; mais, cependant, ma famille entière me déconseille toujours également d'y retourner. Je crois moi-même que ce serait une imprudence; et je suis déterminé à continuer encore mon séjour dans cette ville, ou dans les environs. Je crois que vous approuverez ce parti. Je dois, au reste, vous demander pardon de vous avoir entretenu si longtemps de ce qui me regarde personnellement; mais l'intérêt que vous avez bien voulu me témoigner dans toutes les occasions, et tout récemment encore dans la lettre que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'écrire le 21 Avril, me fait un devoir de ne pas vous laisser ignorer des circonstances aussi essentielles pour moi. Je suis persuadé d'avance de la part que votre amitié voudra bien y prendre."

BARON DE KUTZLEBEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, May 27, Muswell Hill.—"I have the honour to inform your Lordship that I have wrote to the Landgrave what you was pleased to desire of me, and I shall not fail to acquaint you immediately with the answer. I received on the 23rd instant a letter from the Landgrave, which contained one to his Majesty, in answer to the Prince of Wales's marriage. I gave it to Mr. Aust. He did not mention anything about the negotiation with the French; but I have seen a letter from Germany in town, which absolutely states that the Landgrave of Cassell, Darmstadt, and the Duke of Würtemberg, had taken the same measures with the King of Prussia.

"As it was impossible that any thing regularly could be settled about the pay for the Landgrave's troops, what pay to allow them according to the different countries where they had served, he always ordered me and Messrs. van Notten to demand large sums on account of pay. Those sums have been paid now and then. He lately ordered to demand 100,000*l.* sterling on account of the pay again, as likewise the subsidies due. I have reason to think that he wishes to get as much money as possible, and more than there might be due to him when the accounts are to be settled after the war, or when he thinks proper not to keep any longer his treaties with this country. I flatter myself your Lordship will pardon the liberty I take to advise you to take your measures accordingly, and as the circumstances may justify you, and to inform Mr. Pitt with it. I think the Landgrave might be tied down to keep his engagements with England, at least as long as you think proper he should.

"In a letter dated Cassell, March 26th, which I received April 11, he says he hoped I had received one of the 5th of January last, wherein he had informed me that the report of withdrawing his troops from the service of Great Britain was false, and that I had contradicted the same. I answered I had immediately informed your Lordship of it, and his Majesty as well as yourself never believed that there had nor could be the least foundation in such reports."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, May 30, Hambourg.—"Actuellement que la correspondance ordinaire entre la Hollande et Hambourg est rétablie et que les Gazettes Hollandaises arrivent régulièrement deux fois par semaine ici, les papiers publics de cette ville rendent un compte assez exact de tout ce qui parvient en Hollande à la connaissance du public. En conséquence, je ne doute pas que l'on n'en soit également informé en Angleterre, et, d'après cela, il serait superflu que je vous donnasse des informations que vous recevez sûrement d'ailleurs. C'est ainsi que vous aurez sans doute déjà vu le traité d'alliance conclu entre la France et la Hollande; mais je ne sais si l'article additionnel, relatif au port de Flessingue, est déjà parvenu à votre connaissance. Il porte, 1. que les deux nations auront un droit égal de faire usage du port, des chantiers, de Flessingue. 2. Que chacune des deux nations aura séparément ses arsenaux, chantiers. 3. Que, dès à présent, la République Batave cède à la France la maison des Indes Occidentales à Flessingue, avec ses appartenances, de même que l'usage provisoire d'un des chantiers pour la construction des vaisseaux. 4. L'achat de tout ce qui est nécessaire pour les magasins, maisons, places, reste à la charge des deux nations. 5. Les fraix de réparation du chantier, du rempart, seront à la charge des deux nations; mais la République des Provinces-Unies en conserve la direction; seulement elle aura soin de prévenir la République Française des ordres qu'elle voudra donner. 6. Il n'y aura point de vaisseau amiral, ou de garde, d'aucune des deux nations dans le port de Flessingue. 7. S'il s'élève des contestations sur ce règlement, elles seront décidées par des arbitres dont deux Français, deux Hollandais, et le cinquième à nommer par les deux nations, doit être choisi par le sort. 8. Ce règlement doit être mis en train immédiatement après la ratification du traité d'alliance. Cet article, de même que toutes les autres stipulations du traité, tendent évidemment à faire de la République une province ou un département Français; et quoique la France ait tâché d'éviter l'odieux d'une pareille réunion en reconnaissant pour la forme l'indépendance de la Hollande, elle n'en reste pas moins maîtresse aussi absolue des Provinces-Unies qu'elle l'était déjà auparavant des Pays-Bas Autrichiens. Je ne conçois pas comment les Puissances du Continent qui traitent, dit-on, de la paix avec la France, pourront voir d'un oeil tranquille un colosse aussi formidable s'élever à leurs côtés. Et cependant, jusqu'ici, ces Puissances ne paraissent pas faire difficulté de reconnaître le nouveau Gouvernement qui s'est établi chez nous. Voilà du moins ce que l'on doit conclure de leur conduite à l'égard de nos ministres auprès d'Elles. M. Van der Goes Envoyé Extraordinaire de la République à Madrid, et M. de Haeften notre Ministre à Vienne, paraissent être en correspondance réglée avec notre nouveau Gouvernement. Le premier mande en date d'Aranjuez, du 15 Avril, que l'Espagne négociait alors avec la France, et que la négociation était en bon train. M. de Haeften annonce officiellement dans une dépêche au nouveau Gouvernement, qu'une alliance conclue entre la Russie et l'Angleterre a été communiquée à la Cour de Vienne, et que celle-ci ne s'est pas encore expliquée sur la révolution qui a eu lieu en Hollande. Le Portugal a approuvé la conduite de son Ministre à la Haye, M. d'Aranjo, lequel y est resté après l'invasion des Français; alléguant pour motif de cette conduite que, comme l'Assemblée des Etats-Généraux continuait à siéger à la Haye, il avait cru ne pas devoir s'en éloigner. Au reste, la conduite de nos Ministres aux différentes Cours n'a pas été la même partout. Il y en a qui ont pris leur part d'une manière fort noble. M. d'Hogguer par exemple, qui était Ministre à Petersbourg, a envoyé de lui-même sa démission à l'Assemblée qui a conservé le nom d'Etats-Généraux. Il va, dit-on, établir une maison de commerce en Crimée, et l'Impératrice doit lui avoir accordé à cet effet plusieurs facilités.

"J'ai vu avec étonnement dans les nouvelles de Hollande arrivées hier que le Sieur Vitriarius est encore à Londres, d'où il mande que les cargaisons des vaisseaux Hollandais, détenus en Angleterre, seront vendues, et le produit de cette vente séquestré; qu'il se flatte de retourner bientôt avec les papiers de la Compagnie des Indes; qu'au reste, il y a beaucoup de mécontentement en Angleterre, et que la désertion parmi les matelots est fort grande.

"On m'a assuré hier que, suivant des lettres particulières de Hollande, le Commandant de nos vaisseaux de guerre stationés à Suriname, qui doit convoier en Europe les vaisseaux marchands de cette colonie, a écrit au Gouvernement qu'il avait appris l'invasion de la Hollande par les troupes Françaises; mais que, comme de pareils rapports se trouvaient souvent faux, il comptait relâcher en Angleterre avec son convoi, pour s'assurer de la vérité du fait."

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF THE CONDITIONS OF THE RUSSIAN AND AUSTRIAN ALLIANCES WITH GREAT BRITAIN, 1795.

TREATY OF PETERSBURGH,
February 18, 1795.

TREATY OF VIENNA,
May 20, 1795.

Guaranty.

Great Britain and Russia guaranty to each other all states and possessions which they now possess or may acquire by treaty.

The case of wars between Russia and the Asiatic Powers is excepted on the one hand; and on the other the case of wars between England and any non-European Power. But in both cases if European Powers take part in the dispute, the casus fœderis exists.

By the 2nd secret article, the assistance to be furnished to Russia, in the case of an attack on the part of the Porte, is restrained to the reception of their ships into our ports, and the affording them such assistance as they may require; and, further, the keeping other Powers in check by a firm language and vigorous demonstrations.

Great Britain and Austria guaranty to each other all territories, rights, possessions, such as they now possess them, or shall possess them after the conclusion of a peace made by common consent, in conformity to the Convention of 1793.

Nota Bene.—By that Convention all the possessions of the two parties, such as they then stood, were mutually guaranteed; and an engagement was taken not to make peace (except by common consent) without stipulating for the restitution of all conquests made by the common enemy on each other's dominions; the war being for that effect to be vigorously prosecuted by the two contracting parties.

Great Britain is to furnish to Russia in case of attack twelve sail of the line, from 74's to 50's.

Russia is to furnish to Great Britain in case of attack 12,000 men; namely, 10,000 infantry and 2,000 cavalry.

These succours may in either case be converted into money at the option of the party requiring, and the amount of such payment is fixed at 500,000 roubles per annum during the continuance of the war.

These succours may be recalled after two months notice, in case the party furnishing them should himself be attacked; and, in like manner, if the party required should be engaged in a war at the time when the requisition is made, he shall not be obliged to furnish the succours.

By the third secret article Great Britain is not obliged to send the succours stipulated except in order to be joined to a Russian fleet, which, together with the British squadron, shall be equal to the enemy's force in the Baltic.

The Russian troops are not to be sent out of Europe, nor to Spain, Portugal, or Italy.

If the stipulated succours are insufficient for the defence of the party attacked, the two High Contracting Parties are to concert on an augmentation of them.

The Russian treaty contains no engagement respecting the neutral navigation in time of war, but there is an engagement to proceed to the formation of a treaty of commerce.

Accessions.

The two parties will concert respecting the admission of any Power who may be desirous to accede.

Succours.

Great Britain and Austria are to furnish to each other reciprocally in case of attack 26,000 men, namely, 20,000 infantry and 6,000 cavalry, who are to be furnished within two months after requisition made for that purpose.

These succours may in either case be converted at the desire of the party requiring, into monthly payments at the rate of 4,560,000 Dutch florins per annum during the continuance of the war.

But by the separate article on this subject which it has been agreed to keep secret, it is agreed that if the Emperor makes the demand of succours in men, and Great Britain should be unable to furnish them so that the Emperor should be obliged to supply their place by other troops, the difference, if any, between the real cost of such troops and the sum above specified, shall be borne by Great Britain.

If the stipulated succours are insufficient for the defence of the party attacked, the other party shall augment them as the case may require, and shall even assist with all his forces if circumstances should render it necessary.

The Austrian treaty contains no engagement respecting commerce, but there are two articles by which the carrying provisions, or military, or naval stores to the enemy, and also the sheltering privateers or armed vessels, or suffering prizes to be brought in, are prohibited. But there is an exception for existing treaties.

Accessions.

The two parties will concert respecting the invitation to Prussia to accede.

Duration.

The treaty shall last eight years, before which time the parties shall concert for its renewal.

War with France.

By a secret article Russia admits the present war with France to be a casus fœderis in so far as to agree to furnish 12 sail of the line on the footing of an auxiliary squadron. And to concert respecting the conduct to be observed towards neutral powers to prevent their supplying France. Great Britain engaging to make common cause in all wars which may result from such measures, and not to make peace in that case but by common consent.

By a declaration mutually ratified and exchanged by Great Britain, Austria and Russia in 1795, the separate alliances subsisting between the different parties were consolidated into a triple alliance, preserving the engagements of the several parties to each other on the same footing on which they were placed by those treaties."

Duration.

No duration is fixed to this treaty.

The Convention of 1793 is confirmed, the stipulations of which as to the war are mentioned above.

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

1795, June 3, Dover Street.—"I have the honour to enclose to your Grace a letter which I have received from Mr. McTavish. He was brought to me last year by General Clarke as the person best able to give me information upon the fur trade, and the other points respecting the interests of the two Canadas which might come under discussion in the negotiation with Mr. Jay; and I had every reason to be satisfied both with the information he gave me, and with the disposition he manifested to facilitate the arrangement of that business. I thought that he was entitled to this testimony from me, but, with respect to the particular object which he solicits, your Grace is of course the best judge how far it may be proper to comply with his wishes; and whether, even in that case, it may not be necessary that the application should come recommended in the first instance by the Governor-General, which, I think, was the rule which has been observed as to the other colonies, though it may perhaps have been departed from in the particular case of the Canadas."

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

1795, June 4, Dover Street.—"I have this morning been informed that when the Attorney-General prepared his report for the Bodmin charter, some of the party adverse to Lord Camelford's interest applied to him to be heard in support of a list of names for the charter, which he of course declined. I am very strongly pressed to urge the business forward, and I really see no advantage that could in any point of view result to Sir I. Morshead from its being delayed to the period of Lord Camelford's arrival in England, which must still be uncertain, though we hope he may be expected by the first India ships. He is not of age yet, so that when he arrives he can take no formal step, if any were necessary on his part; and his friends are, as I understand, decided in the resolution not to enter into any compromise. I cannot therefore but wish that the business could be brought on without delay, as it is now before the Council and waits only to be approved there, and to have the names settled.

"I have received a list of all the inhabitants of the borough, and, as far as I can rely upon the fairness of that statement, the proposed selection is made with judgment and propriety. With respect to the question of property in the neighbourhood of the borough, there is, as I understand, no sort of comparison between Lord Camelford and Sir I. Morshead, that of the former being very greatly superior."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1795, June 7, Dropmore.—"Lord Grenville trusts that your Majesty will excuse his breaking in upon your Majesty to-day with the despatches just received from Petersburg, as the conclusion of the alliance between your Majesty and the Empress and the state of forwardness of the Russian squadron are likely to produce so very advantageous an effect in the present critical moment.

"Lord Grenville begs leave humbly to offer his congratulations to your Majesty on this occasion, and to express his sanguine hope that your Majesty's efforts in this great cause will at length, under the favour of Providence, be crowned with that success which is so important to the happiness not only of your Majesty's dominions but of every civilized country."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, June 7, Windsor.—"I am sensible of Lord Grenville's attention in not detaining from me even on this day the agreeable account of the final conclusion of the alliance with the Empress of Russia, and that the Russian squadron must by this time be sailed for the North Sea. I entirely agree with him that at the present critical moment the knowledge of this event may be peculiarly advantageous, as the unprincipled conduct of the Court of Prussia has certainly greatly unhinged the political system which had been established; but the great northern power now standing forth will, I trust, compensate for the former loss.

"I hope no encouragement to any relaxation in our conduct towards Denmark from the present plan of Russia to regain that feeble ally; it is by a direct conduct in stopping all provisions and naval stores that we can alone subdue France."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, June 12, Windsor.—"The inconvenience of the Count d'Artois remaining any longer in my German dominions is very great; but on Lord Grenville's representation I will allow him to remain one month longer. If by that time he is not sent to the Vendée, it will be too late for his being of any use there, and then there can be no objection to his joining his brother in Italy, for his being in my German dominions is not less improper than his being in England."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, June 15, Windsor.—"The last evening I received from the Duke of Portland the accounts of the death of the young King of France and the surrender of Luxembourg; the first must be an advantage to the cause, the Convention having lost the hostage in their hands that might have saved their persons. Now the lawful King is out of their power, and can head any rising in the country. I shall certainly stave off any proposal of sending Monsieur D'Ompèda to any congress at Frankfort, but doubt of Mull's being of sufficient rank to be employed in such a business."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, June 21, Harley Street.—"Monsieur Morice [Morris] qui a été ministre d'Amérique en France, détestant cette infame République des assassins, et également détesté par Elle qui enfin l'a fait rapeller de Paris, est arrivé ici de Hamburg.

"Il a passé chez moi aujourd'hui. Il n'est pas dans les principes de Pinkney, mais bien dans ceux de Monsieur Jay. Il est bien informé des affaires de France, tant intérieures qu'extérieures.

"Il ne reste à Londres que 8 à 10 jours, après quoi il compte de faire un voyage par toute l'Angleterre. Il demeure au Grand Hotel à Covent Garden, et ne me paraît pas disposé à se faire présenter nulle part dans ce peu de séjour qu'il fera à Londres. Mon attachement pour vous m'engage de vous informer de cela pour que, si vous voulez le voir et l'inviter à passer chez vous, vous puissiez savoir où le trouver; car je suis persuadé que vous pouvez avoir de lui des informations très utiles dans les circonstances présentes. Il y a une très importante que j'ai appris de lui, qui est que ceux gouvernant la France ont, depuis peu avant la mort du jeune Roi, fait des propositions secrètes au fils du Duc d'Orléans, tendentes à le faire Roi, et que ce jeune homme a rejeté cette offre.

"On m'a dit que le ministre de Suède nous a fait verbalement la communication que son Roi a accédé au traité de Basle entre la France et la Prusse. Je voulais vous le demander quand j'ai eu l'honneur de vous entretenir hier, mais je l'ai oublié. Faites moi la grace de me dire si cela est vrai, et dans quel terme cela nous a été communiqué par cet envoyé des Français du Nord."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, June 21, Varel.—"Not wishing unnecessarily to take up any of your Lordship's time, I have not given you a line since mine of the 15th and 24th April, both of which I enclosed to Mr. Goddard; and with the last a letter for Prince Frederick of Orange, which I hope Mr. Goddard received, as they went in Mr. Fraser's packet. Many events have, no doubt, taken place since that must affect materially the situation of the Republic. Many are of public notoriety; and those that are less so, and relate more particularly to that country, I knew to be in your Lordship's possession more fully even than I could have stated them. From all these, we have every reason to think the disposition of the people throughout the United Provinces to be much the same, if not even more averse to the new government than at the time I wrote; and that we have every proof that the Cabal never can maintain, or could have maintained, their ground without the French army; and that with a well-directed, well-supported co-operation from the Continental Powers, we might flatter ourselves to see that Cabal overthrown in a short time. We have to lament that, from the secession of the King of Prussia, the capture of Luxemburg, and other events, that support appears yet to be distant; and in the meantime, being in possession of the government, the present rulers will not neglect anything that can establish their power, or render idle any attempt to subvert it.

"Since my last, I have passed some time with M. Fagel at a friend's house in Holstein. I left Hamburg the 27th ultimo to come here, where we are in a state of seeming neutrality, and where it is my intention, if I do not hear from England to the contrary, to wait for a more favourable opportunity to pursue my object. For notwithstanding my long silence, though I received yours of the 22nd April, I believe I need scarcely add that the restoration of the House of Orange, of the connection with England, and the breaking of the chains the present rulers of the Republic vainly endeavour to conceal, I am too much concerned to see effected, not to wish to be of use to those who have the same object at heart; and that I shall, at all times, be thankful for any suggestion your Lordship thinks may lead to the attainment of it. I must acknowledge that, at this moment, the situation of my brother continues to be a check upon me; and any correspondence with him or his friends, scattered about and watched as they are, is so insecure and attended with so much personal risk for himself, that I have not ventured upon it. I have taken care, however, he should know I was willing to come to the Hague if he wished it, or thought my presence could be of any use to him. The person wrote to (my brother not being allowed to correspond with anyone) sent me word it was my brother's desire and advice I should not think of it. If I had I should not have been long at liberty as I heard since, particularly after the declaration of war against England. I was happy to see by your letter you agree with me upon this point. By the late accounts we have there is some reason to think M. de Rhoon's release is not so far distant. M. de Reede, Madame de Rhoon's father, the Republic's envoy at the Court of Berlin, has endeavoured by means of his friends at Berlin to obtain that release. His last letter, dated the 13th instant, speaks of it so very positively that, however little inclined I am to give credit to anything that comes from Berlin after the conduct of that Court, I cannot help flattering myself he may have leave to come here. I shall be glad to see him out of the hands of his enemies, but will not give up the hope of our recovering our ground some day. In the meantime a prison of six months, so close as it was in the beginning, has been very severe for a man of his active disposition. In consequence of various applications particularly from M. de Reede at Berlin, it has been much less so for the last six weeks or two months. It was high time it should be less so, as his health began to suffer from the confinement. I only hope no rash or ill-timed plan will retard the moment of his release, or uselessly endanger his situation, which I cannot help considering as very critical still, from the number of persons who have again been taken up lately. M. Fagel is here at present. It is impossible to advise him to return; the conduct of the present rulers having been so hostile to him from the beginning that it would have been a folly to trust himself in their hands, and expose himself to the indignities and the sort of inquisition he must have undergone when in their power. Your Lordship has seen the letter M. Fagel wrote, stating his intentions and the principles of his conduct. They have given him no answer, they have brought forward no accusation; and, after seizing all his papers previous to the receipt of his letter, without alleging any motives, they have now seized all his property; and he has been lately informed their intention is to proceed to confiscation, if he does not return directly to give an account of his conduct. Of these steps, and of the motives that led to them, they have given him no communication whatever. In the hands of men so evidently inimical, so violent and arbitrary in their proceedings, no one could advise M. Fagel to trust himself. His situation gives his friends the more concern that, having been absent at the time of the approach of the French, it was not in his power to take any precautions with respect to his property. Among other real objects of curiosity, the most valuable and complete collection of State Papers in the Republic, transmitted to him by his ancestors, a great many of which papers had no immediate connection with the present events, has thus fallen in unknown hands; and together with one of the most complete and considerable libraries, and collection of drawings and prints, to be met with in any part of Europe, formed in the course of above a century by a succession of men distinguished for their taste and their knowledge, as well as for their political talents and character, will most likely be dispersed or lost by the animosity of a few obscure individuals.

"I shall send this under cover to Baron de Frantz (Ministre de sa Majesté Impériale, et Directeur de ses Postes à Breme) and should your Lordship favour me with a line and think this a safe channel, I shall have the letter a great deal sooner than by Hamburgh.

"Postscript, June 23.—In consequence of some letters M. Fagel received from Hamburgh since I wrote the above, relating to his own affairs, he left us yesterday to go to that place, but we are in hopes of seeing him here again in a short time. A letter I had from that place mentions assignats being fallen there to a halfpenny for a livre."

MEMORANDUM ON THE STATE OF FRANCE, founded on the Reports of British Diplomatic Agents. May-June 1795.

"For the purpose of taking a distinct view of the distressed situation of France, it would be sufficient to recur to the debates of the National Convention, in which there are daily proofs that even the supporters of the Revolution, and those who are chiefly interested in endeavouring to alarm Europe with pompous descriptions of their internal resources, and of their still inexhausted means to carry on the present contest with at least a probability of success, are obliged to confess that the people are in misery and discontented, that assignats have almost totally lost their credit, that the manufactures are languishing, that it is with the utmost difficulty they can procure provisions, and that while their armies are gaining victories in the field, the interior presents nothing but discouragement and dismay.

"In the reports of their own committee we may see the approaching downfall of the Republic, we may hear them inculcating the necessity of giving France a regular and settled Government, of restoring order in their finances, and, what is still more material, of consolidating the Revolution by a general and immediate peace.

"Pelet in his speech to the Convention of the 8th of April, expresses himself in the words, 'No doubt but the Republic becomes exhausted by its bloody and expensive victories. The entrance of the French troops into Holland ought to have given peace to Europe. If we delay treating with Holland, that Republic will in three months time be a charge to us, and its fugitive rich will increase the treasures of our enemies.

“ ‘It is now our duty to put an end to the Revolution in the interior.

“ ‘For these five years past the people have been duped by words. The erroneous system of our political economy is the source of all our sufferings. The scarcity of provisions causes objections to be made against the form of our Government. Our manufactures languish. Our maritime trade is destroyed. The military is our main object, and the armies the only consumers. The disproportion of our paper money, and the very nature of it, cause the great scarcity and dearth of provisions.

“ ‘The laws you have enacted concerning the division of property, the redeeming of ground rents, and the equal partition of inherited estates, encroach upon the rights of property, destroy the pasture ground, and occasion an immense diminution of all necessary articles: the consequence of which is that the specie we have left must be exported into foreign countries, to draw from thence those commodities which our own soil is unable to afford. The rapid and enormous rise in the price of all merchandise and articles of consumption strikes the mind with amazement and baffles all calculation. In the course of a month, a day, an hour, we experience an increase in the price of commodities which in a very alarming manner evinces a real scarcity, the want of public credit, an uneasiness on account of our present situation, and a dread of futurity.

“ ‘Whilst by the valour of our troops we triumph abroad, weakness and want of energy have crept into the interior. What is it, then, that creates alarms for the fate of France? Our fears arise from a conviction that as long as we have no certain settled Government, all our measures cannot possibly extirpate that anarchy which is inseparable from a provisional state of things, and from laws dictated by circumstances; which ultimately must plunge us into all the horrors of a civil war.’

“The reports of all the persons who have been lately witnesses to the state of desolation to which France is now reduced, and to the change of opinion which has universally taken place, are equally satisfactory. It will appear from them that assignats are daily falling in their value, and that it seems impossible to re-establish any part of their former credit. That many districts are almost totally without provisions, that the turn which the public opinion has taken in favour both of religion and royalty is now very decided, and is making a very rapid progress.

Mr. W[ickham], February 18.—“On the subject of finance we may perceive from a plan which was proposed to the Convention for the reduction of assignats, the specie in the National Treasury did not, before the invasion of Holland, exceed forty millions of livres.

Mr. W[ickham], March 18.—“At Genoa they had the greatest difficulty early in the month of March in selling their assignats at 18 per cent. About the same period a Louis d'or sold at Paris for 160 livres. On the 4th March assignats at Basle were at 15 per cent. On the 7th March they were at  $13\frac{1}{2}$ ; but so totally was their credit gone that even at that price there were no purchasers.

Mr. W[ickham], March 28.—“From Berne we hear that assignats, notwithstanding some temporary fluctuations, gradually fall. Towards the latter end of March they were at that place as low as 12, and, notwithstanding the partisans of the Convention endeavoured to circulate the opinion that the Committee of Public Safety wished to diminish their value till they fell to nothing, the English minister in Switzerland is, from the best authority, satisfied of the contrary. He knows for certain that Johannot, a leading person in the Convention, soon after the invasion of Holland, wrote to his friends at Geneva to advise them by all means to purchase assignats, as there would be an immediate and rapid rise in their value. Those who followed his advice suffered most considerably.

Mr. W[ickham], April 1.—“From Basle we hear that at the beginning of April assignats had nearly lost all their value; and that in Alsace the bakers openly refused to take them.

Mr. W[ickham], April 6.—“The following fact will also tend to prove that, in addition to the depreciation in the value of assignats, the specie in the Treasury is almost exhausted.

“In the month of March a merchant of Hamborough arrived at Paris and demanded payment of two millions of livres, which were owing to him by the Republic. For several days they deferred the payment, under different pretexts; but the merchant becoming clamorous for his money, they entreated him to take the sum in assignats, offering at the same time to let him have them at the rate he choose. This he refused to do, and on his threatening to inform the commercial houses at Hamborough of the difficulty he was experiencing in procuring payment for articles which had been long delivered, they at last contrived to collect together the two millions in specie.

France, in Mr. W[ickham]’s, April 19.—“In the southern provinces the assignats had so totally lost their credit that the peace with the King of Prussia had no real effect upon their price. At Lyons a Louis d’or sold in April for 225 livres.

“The scarcity of provisions causes still greater distress.

Basle, 17th February, Mr. Trevor.—“The Inspector of the Magazines in Alsace declared openly that all the magazines were empty, and that others could not be formed, as there was no corn in the country.

“At Toulon the magazines were in February so nearly empty, that there were not provisions for the army and the fleet for more than a week. The people were buoyed up with the expectation of supplies from Holland, but in the mean time they were absolutely starving.

Mr. W[ickham], 12 March.—“In the beginning of March the scarcity of provisions was so great at Paris that they were under the necessity of drawing supplies from the magazines of the Northern army.

Mr. W[ickham], 28 March.—“Even in the armies, provisions are much more scarce than they were during the last campaign. The soldiers are worse fed and worse clothed. And as a proof of the scarcity of gunpowder, it is necessary to mention that, instead of sixty cartridges which the soldiers used to carry, they now have no more than ten.

Paris, April 1st.—“From the National Gazette we learn that at Paris on the 1st of April the allowance of bread was reduced from half a pound a day to a still smaller quantity. That the people assembled in groups crying in a mournful voice for bread. That the shops were shut; that despair appeared in every body’s countenance; and that all the horrors of a general famine seemed to be rapidly approaching.

Mr. W[ickham], April 6th.—“In the beginning of April the southern provinces had scarcely any bread; in the inns there was literally none.

“Towards the end of February the magazines at Strasbourg for the army of the Lower Rhine had grain in them for no longer time than three months. Of forage they had never more than what was sufficient for a week, seldom for so long.

The report of a person, sent into the southern provinces by Mr. W[ickham] April 19th.—“In Dauphiny, flour is so scarce that they are under the necessity of mixing it with beans to make bread. In the country between Marseilles and Lyons there is no bread in the inns, and travellers are obliged to get an order from the municipality, without which they could not procure the smallest portion.

Mr. W[ickham], 19 April.—“At Nantes there is scarcely any bread. A quarter of a pound is distributed every three days to the poor, and to the workmen. On the intermediate days a handful of rice and a small quantity of beans is distributed.

“In Franche Comté there is not a single magazine, nor the means of forming any.

“It is true that in that part of the country there are some provisions, but they cannot be bought for assignats.

“Nothing can be more satisfactory than the accounts which are received from all quarters of the change which is daily taking place in the minds of the generality of the people with regard to royalty and religion:

Mr. Trevor, 20th February.—“M. de Keppeler, a firm royalist, and who on account of his political principles, had passed eleven months in prison, is now appointed mayor of Strasbourg. The whole of the present municipality are likewise royalists.

Mr. Trevor, February 24th.—“In Alsace, all those who were suspected of republicanism were after the death of Robespierre, turned out of office, and were invariably replaced by men attached to royalty.

Mr. W[ickham], March 12th.—“At Rouen, at Orleans, and at many other towns, the people have at different times cried vive le Roi, and have cut down the Trees of Liberty.

Mr. W[ickham], March 28.—“With respect to the termination of the war in La Vendée, it is the general opinion even at Paris that the report of the national commissioners is by no means to be credited. All the letters agree in stating that the supposed peace is a mere suspension of arms. But it scarcely deserves even that appellation, as all persons wearing the national uniform are immediately put to death if they venture into that part of the country which is occupied by Charette's army.

Mr. W[ickham], March 28.—“In the districts bordering on the frontier of the Pays de Vaud the change of opinion is almost incredible. All Mr. Wickham's emissaries assure him that, provided any real force could be got together in their favour, there is nothing to which the people within may not now be led. The Jacobins are everywhere persecuted with a degree of violence which the people never showed against the aristocrates, except in their first moments of enthusiasm at the very beginning of the Revolution. The people complain very generally of their situation, and begin to compare it in many places with their state of existence in former times. In short, the public opinion is certainly going further than the Convention ever intended it should, and it is evident that it will soon be much too strong for them to manage.

“The Lyonnese royalists enter in greater numbers than ever, as well as many other emigrants of every description, and none of them are molested except at Marseilles and Toulon, where the Jacobins are still in force. One gentleman who went from Berne wrote to his friends at that place that he was received openly by his tenants in his chateau near Dijon, and carried in a sort of triumph along the avenue leading to the house.

"The news of M. de Pr  cy's escape caused a very strong sensation on the minds of the people at Lyons, and appeared to have entirely revived their ancient affection for him. In that city many avowed royalists have been received into the municipality, and an inclination is very generally manifested to get their arms into their hands again.

Mr. W[ickham], April 4.—"Without having been in France, or without seeing the persons who are daily coming out, it is impossible to form any idea of the rapid change of men's opinions. Those who in 1793 were the most violent Republicans, are now decided Royalists.

"At Nancy the national cockade is torn and trampled under foot.

Mr. W[ickham], April 8.—"A Frenchman who has travelled over the greatest part of France reports that the majority of the people are Royalists, but that no one is willing to endanger himself by stepping forward, though they are at no pains to conceal their principles.

The report of a person sent by Mr. W[ickham] into the southern provinces, April 19.—"The estates belonging to emigrants are seldom sold; it is universally allowed that they ought to be restored to such of them as have not carried arms against France.

"In the southern provinces there is not a single person to be met with, who supposes it possible that the Republican Government can exist. A universal desire is openly manifested for the restoration of Monarchy. Besides the wish that the Dauphin should be placed upon the throne, it is thought right that Monsieur should be appointed Regent. In general the people are inclined to the constitution of 1791, with an augmentation of prerogatives for the King.

"The Reporter says that if England would restore her conquests, the people would willingly agree that the restoration of Royalty should be the first condition.

Mr. W[ickham], April 19.—"At Lyons the National Guard, consisting of 4,000 men, is composed of persons who served under M. de Pr  cy during the siege, and of emigrants who are decided Royalists. They are commanded also by Royalists, and by men in whom M. de Pr  cy places the greatest confidence.

"It is the general opinion of those who have lately been in France that religion will be the grand medium through which the counter-revolution will be effected; and it will appear that all the accounts relative to that subject are extremely satisfactory.

"Immediately after the fall of Robespierre the priests who had emigrated were invited by their parishioners to return, and, provided they had not taken the oath, were everywhere received with the most marked attention and respect.

Mr. W[ickham], March 18.—"In the environs of Paris mass is celebrated, and Sunday is observed with the greatest decency.

The report of a person sent by Mr. W[ickham] into the southern provinces, April 19.—"In the neighbourhood of Lyons churches are building.

"Throughout the whole country between Geneva and the Ant  bes, Sunday is religiously observed, and the decades are turned into ridicule. A marked preference is shown to the priests who have not taken the oath. It is the universal wish that religion should again flourish, and it is the general opinion that the Church estates will be restored.

"It is necessary to remark that, from the observations of those who have lately been in France, it is evident that whoever has religion is a Royalist; and the power which the priests have gained over the minds of the people is now so great that they oblige their parishioners to make a declaration in writing, that they will restore the estates they have bought, if they belong either to the church or to emigrants. They return to France in tribes, and are daily converting the people to their former principles. It is not, however, the constitutional religion which is re-establishing. The priests who took the oath are hated and despised, and are not suffered to return to their former parishes, unless they can prove that they were driven to such a step through fear and menaces.

"Various other instances might be adduced of the enthusiasm with which the inhabitants of France are returning to their religion, and of the respect with which their ancient priests are everywhere received. It is not only in the distant provinces that this may be perceived; but even in Paris, under the eye of the Convention, religious ceremonies are celebrated with more zeal and decency than before the Revolution.

"We have also other grounds for supposing that the present order of things cannot last. The state of parties at Paris gives just reason to hope that the Convention is now tottering.

Mr. Trever, March 12.—"It is divided into four different factions; the remains of the Jacobins, the Independents, the Moderates, and the Federalists.

"In the beginning of March the Jacobins in the Convention were reduced to about hundred members. The Moderates consisted of nearly one hundred and fifty. The majority of them had been friends of Danton, and were implicated with him in the massacres of September 1792. They have no fixed plans; some of them wish to re-establish Royalty and others are inclined to a Republican constitution. They are, however, to a man, desirous of putting an end to the Revolution, but they differ as to the means of doing it.

"The Federalists are the remains of that faction of which Brissot was formerly the head. At the death of Robespierre there remained one hundred and sixty-four in the Convention, and they now consist of more than two hundred members, as those who had been thrown into prison have been again restored to their seats. The Moderates at first took them as allies, but they are daily gaining an evident preponderance in the Convention. The generality of them are inclined to a constitutional monarchy, but they have no fixed plan whatever.

"The Independents, consisting of two hundred or two hundred and twenty voices, are the refuse of the other factions. In this party there are men of all principles who are ready to avail themselves of the first favourable opportunity that may offer.

"In these different factions there does not appear to be a single man of superior genius. Among the Moderates Tallien is the most distinguished. In 1790 he was M. A. de Lameth's secretary, who parted with him for incapacity. He then became the compiler of a newspaper, and in 1792 was a member of the Commune of Paris. No one treated the King during his trial with more wanton and marked brutality. He was afterwards sent to Tours, where he was guilty of the most atrocious enormities, and on his return to Paris, having during his mission amassed great riches, he entered into the plot against Robespierre for the purpose of saving his mistress, Madame de Fontenay, who was then in prison. The other chiefs of the Moderates, such as Fréron, Courtois, Legendre, Gaffroy, Clauzel, and Barras, are not worthy to be mentioned.

"Some of the Independents are men of talents, but they have neither plans nor union. Carnot, one of the members of the old Committee of Public Safety, is a man of business and has genius; but he is an intriguer and systematically cruel.

"Merlin de Douay is likewise an Independent. He was attached to the Duke of Orleans, is universally detested, but has some weight on account of his experience in the Commission of Legislation.

"Bourdon de l'Oise has courage, but without talents, and is a blood-thirsty revolutionist.

"Among the Federalists we may find more genius; some of them have been guilty of no other fault than that of weakness, and others are as infamous characters as any that have appeared since the beginning of the Revolution.

"Boissy d'Anglas is one of the most distinguished. A bel esprit and an admirer of modern philosophy. He was a member of the first Constituent Assembly, where he was totally overlooked. Attached formerly to Brissot, he was in considerable danger till the death of Robespierre, after which he became a member of the Committee of Public Safety, and has now acquired some degree of weight.

"Alquier, another member of the first Assembly, has more talents than Boissy d'Anglas, not for the tribune, but for the management of a party. He was formerly extremely intimate with M. de Lameth, and might be useful to a party who would undertake to restore Royalty.

"Pelet de la Lozere is a man of business, of a sound understanding, and useful in the committees.

"Cambacères may also be of use if the restoration of monarchy should ever be attempted.

"Of all the Federalists Lanjuinais is the man from whom most good may be expected. Outlawed in 1793, he was concealed in Brittany until the death of Robespierre. No man showed more courage than he did in opposing the King's condemnation. He is likely to gain great influence in the present moment; and it is said he has declared publicly that Royalty ought to be restored.

"None of the former Jacobins was ever so dangerous to Europe as the Abbé Sièyès may possibly become. Because he was not noble he destroyed the nobility; because he was not at the head of the Church he destroyed the clergy; because he is not King he wishes to overturn all Kings, and all governments which are not founded on his system. He will probably be the leader of those who look forward to an organized republic without Jacobins. That party has the majority in the Convention, but out of doors they are very inferior to the Royalists.

"The continuation of anarchy is destruction to the Revolutionists. Two months ago no one dared to speak of Royalty, and at present it is said openly that it must be re-established.

"The want of provisions, the discredit of the assignats, and the unwillingness of the people to continue in a state of suffering, are more dangerous enemies to the Convention than the armies of the allies.

"Hunger, misery, and despair, may overturn a government, but are bad foundations for a Republic.

"In vain will the Convention promise to the people the most salutary laws. They are in want of peace, of bread, of specie, and without these can be obtained, the Revolution must soon be ended."

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1795, June 23, Admiralty.—“Orders have already been sent to release the ships laden with the articles you allude to, which should certainly not have been detained, and it might be right that the agent who is entrusted by the Treasury with the business of purchasing the cargoes of provisions should be authorised to release ships of such description immediately on their arrival. The reason for the detention and perhaps for the search of the vessels which were brought in by the Albion, I apprehend was its having been discovered that under the corn in those ships which were laden with that article, considerable quantities of saltpetre were concealed, and I suppose it was suspected that some articles either of provisions or naval stores might likewise be concealed under the bottles and other articles.

“We have lately had information from Riga of some ships about to sail from that port laden with deal planks of an unusual size and shape, calculated to be used in the construction of frigates, and I believe even line-of-battle ships, and consigned to the French, but probably with false clearances. I wish there were some means of getting rid of the exception in the Danish treaty in favour of deal planks, for on the present system of ship building in France, they are to the full as useful and necessary an article of naval stores as any oak timber can be.”

J. B. BURGESS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, June 28, Downing Street.—“Your Lordship may have heard that Mr. Gouverneur Morris is arrived in this country. I happened to meet him yesterday at Count Woronzow’s, where I dined, and I not only was much struck with his conversation at dinner, during which he gave us the most interesting account of the present state of France, but I had a long tête-à-tête with him afterwards, which was sought for on his part, evidently in the view of communicating through me to your Lordship and the other Ministers his present political sentiments, and his desire of imparting to you the result of the reflections he has made in the course of four years’ residence in France. He began with congratulating me on the signature of the treaty, which, he said, he had no doubt would be ratified, though by a small majority, especially as Mr. Jay must now be arrived, and would be able to do away the very unfavourable impressions which had been made, and were still making, by Pinckney and Deas. He observed that the latter was doing everything in his power to misrepresent the intentions of this country and to promote animosity in America, where there were already too many people disposed to enforce his representations and to provoke hostilities; and he conceived that these would have a great weight in the Carolinas, where there were many needy and desperate adventurers, remote from the seat of Government, and always ready to proceed to acts of violence. After enlarging on this subject, he told me that, whatever the impression on his mind might have been when he went to France in 1790, the experience he had gained there had entirely satisfied him that no connection could be so advantageous to America as one with this country; that he now considered the salvation and prosperity of England as the object which every well-disposed man, of whatever country, ought to regard as essential for the welfare both of Europe and America, and of civilized society itself; that all these interests were now at stake, and that their preservation would depend upon the manner in which the present controversy should be brought to a conclusion.

He said that he had learnt in the few days he had been here several points which had afforded him great satisfaction, the principal of which were the alliance which had been formed with the Emperor, and the assistance that had been sent to the Royalists in Brittany. Those, he observed, if they were followed up as he had no doubt they would, could not fail in the present state of France to be attended with success; for the resources of that country were drawing fast to an end, the majority of the people were tired of the experiment which they had made, and the Government was universally despised. There could be but one end of the Revolution, namely a return to monarchy; but everything depended on the direction which that return should make. Were a Prince of the House of Bourbon seated on the throne, the principles on which the Revolution has been conducted would no longer be capable of disturbing Europe; but if by any means a Republic of any sort should finally be established, or if the Crown should be disposed of by election to any new family, those principles would gain strength, and the fanatical spirit of propagating them would become the only practicable system of Government. For this reason he had heard with satisfaction of the death of the young King, whose captivity and the certainty of his mind having been debased and perverted, had depressed the spirits of the well-inclined, and had prevented many from taking any measures for the restoration of Monarchy. That now the new King had great advantages, on the proper use of which he conceived everything would depend. If he asserted his right to the throne, if he did so with temper and moderation, holding out to the people a return of order and good government, and avoiding everything which might convey an apprehension of retaliation and revenge, the people would flock to his standard, and he would be enabled to ascend the throne of his ancestors. But, he added, in this case the interests of the country of France alone should not be considered. They are connected with those of England and Austria; and these are bound, for their own sakes, to take care that they are properly attended to. As Louis 18th must depend on them for being acknowledged King of France, they have it in their power to determine on the terms of their assistance. These, as the English Government has always declared, must be indemnification for the past and security for the future; and fortunately both of these may be united as upon former occasions, by stipulating for the payment of the required sum, and by taking certain cautionary towns as the security for its payment. He insisted that the latter was a point of the utmost consequence, not only as it would enable this country and Austria to keep a check upon France, but with a view to prevent the designs of Prussia, who was evidently aiming at the most alarming plan of aggrandisement in Germany, which could become successful only by an union with France, and with France left in possession of a frontier including Flanders, and extending to the Rhine and the Ocean.

"As I did not wish to trespass too much on your Lordship's time, I have given you a very short sketch of the observations which Mr. Morris made in the course of our long conversation; but it was impossible for me to do justice to what he said, or to go into a detail of the proofs and arguments by which he supported it. He concluded by telling me that he believed, when he was here last, he had been looked upon with a degree of doubt and perhaps of suspicion. He would not say anything on that, but he observed that, to a thinking man, the scenes he had witnessed must have been very forcible; that he had quitted France with sentiments of horror and abhorrence, and that he should esteem himself happy in being able, in any manner, to contribute to the success of this country, on the security and prosperity of which, he again remarked, the interests of America so materially depended. He said that, though he had not had the honour of forming an acquaintance with your Lordship, he was ready to give you all the information in his power, and he believed he could, perhaps, give you more than any other individual could supply you with; that he would, if you thought proper, wait upon you whenever you pleased, and answer any questions you might ask; that he was also ready to tell you all he had learnt at Hamburgh respecting the conveyance of provisions to France, as well as the means which had occurred to him of rendering it ineffectual. He also said that though, when he was here before, he had abstained from appearing at Court, he now felt a great desire to be allowed to present himself to the King, as, from the signature of the late treaty, and from the sentiments he entertained towards his Majesty and this country, he conceived such a step on his part would not be unacceptable."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795,] July 6, Downing Street.—"In addition to the general account of the disembarkation at Quiberon Bay, it appears by a letter from Sir James Warren to Lord Bridport (which the latter enclosed in a private letter to Lord Spencer) that only a small party of the enemy shewed itself near the place of landing, who were driven off by a party of 700 Chouans. Our troops have been received with open arms. The people of the country were flocking in, and they had already distributed arms to between three and four thousand. We shall probably have further particulars soon, but this looks so promising that Lord Spencer, Windham, and myself, think no time should be lost in sending for the Count d'Artois. A dispatch is accordingly preparing to General Dundas, and a ship of the line and a frigate, which are on the point of sailing to convey the Austrian loan to the Elbe, will have orders to receive him and his train on board; but I imagine you will think it best that, besides the letter to General Dundas, there should be a communication either directly from you to the Count d'Artois, or through the Duc d'Harcourt; and if you approve of this, it will be desirable that you should write by the return of this messenger, as the ship will be ready to sail by the first fair wind. I am going out of town; you may as well, therefore, desire your letter to be sent to Huskisson to be forwarded with the dispatch."

THE DUKE OF PORTLAND to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, July 10 [London].—"It really hurts me very much to appear to make any objection to a measure in the success of which you are at all interested, but you must make some allowance for prejudices and forgive the reluctance I cannot help feeling at consenting to such a mode of transferring property as seems to me to be about to take place by the grant of the Bodmin Charter, which, it must be admitted, is neither at the request nor conformable to the inclinations of either of the present possessors of the predominant influence in that Borough. Whether these gentlemen are usurpers or not I don't mean to inquire; one of them has been in possession of the influence which has given him one seat there for upwards of 40 years, and the other has had it for the last ten, and they now only incur the risk of losing it by a degree of indolence and neglect which, blameable as I admit it to be, I am not prepared to say is so culpable as to deserve to work a total forfeiture, for so I conceive a new Charter would operate with respect to their influence. But as you understand that the basis of the application for a new charter is laid on the superior property of the person in whose behalf it has been made, I acknowledge that a considerable part of my objection to it would be done away, though not the whole of it. But, even in that case, I should wish that the old proprietors (for so you must allow me to call them) could be previously informed of the real cause of their having been passed over, and for this purpose I desired you to allow me to acquaint Mr. Anstruther with it, which I did on Sunday or Monday last, for the information of Sir John Morshead and my old friend Mr. Hunt, to whom I strongly feel such an attention to be due on my part. I expect to hear from Anstruther every day, and sincerely wish his report may relieve me from the embarrassment which this transaction has occasioned me."

LORD ROBERT STEPHEN FITZGERALD to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, July 12, Chichester.—"I have had the honour to receive your Lordship's letter of the 8th, acquainting me with his Majesty's gracious approbation of my appointment to the mission of Copenhagen in the room of Mr. Hailes. Your very great goodness to me on this occasion makes me feel somewhat ashamed of my importunity on a late one, but I am now truly persuaded that your Lordship has done every thing that is possible and kind by me; and the very handsome manner in which you have communicated this circumstance to me enhances the obligation in a very high degree, while it lays double claim to the unfeigned thanks which I have the honour here to return your Lordship."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, July 13, Downing Street.—"You will of course have received yesterday the bulletin of the surrender of Quiberon and its garrison. The accounts of the strength of the place and the shelter it affords for shipping make the preservation of this place an object of the first importance. They have determined us, without delay, to send off three thousand of the troops who can be quickest embarked; and this service presses extremely, as from some of the skirmishes that have happened, the steadiness of our Chouans troops cannot as yet be relied upon, if they are left much to themselves. Lord Moira has no hesitation, on seeing the accounts, in undertaking to follow this expedition, with the remaining force which we can give him, or prepare to follow him. The army (I mean the British part) may, on his arrival, be at first about 7,000 infantry, increased soon after to about 10,000, and by the end of next month to about 14,000 in the whole; and 3,000 cavalry, independent either of British from Germany, or of the foreign cavalry now ordered from thence. Lord Cornwallis is to be in town tomorrow, and I hope, if possible, we may agree on Lord Moira's instructions tomorrow, so that he may leave town on Wednesday, in order to hasten everything for the second embarkation. The first is, I hope, already put in train. I conclude you mean at all events to be in town tomorrow morning, and if you are likely to be at leisure about one, we may probably have the instructions drawn by that time. There seems again good reason to believe that the report of Hotham's action is not without foundation.

"You will receive, very unexpectedly, the account which arrived this morning of the death of poor Lord Henry Spencer. The messenger brought a letter to Lord Auckland, who has since written to the Duke of Marlborough, probably to break the news, and Lord Spencer has also written to the Archbishop to inform him of it.

"The Duke of York has suggested an idea that it may [be] worth while to instruct Colonel Crawford (if Clerfayt wavers any longer respecting his operations) to repair immediately to Vienna, and take the chance whether the Government there can be brought to recall him, and substitute any nominal General in his room with the assistance of Mack (if he can be again brought forward), or of Meerfeldt, of whom he entertains a very high opinion. In the present critical state of things this seems worth thinking of.

"By letters from General Dundas there is a great appearance that the French are almost evacuating Holland."

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE to the KING OF PRUSSIA.

1795, July 22, Windsor.—"Je prie votre Majesté de vouloir bien excuser la liberté que je prends de l'importuner de nouveau par une lettre; mais je crois de mon devoir de lui communiquer une démarche que je fais, pour tacher de tirer ma patrie du joug humiliant et ruineux qui lui est imposé, et j'ose espérer que votre Majesté daignera l'approuver, et voudra bien avoir la bonté de m'accorder son appui pour la faire réussir. Votre Majesté n'ignore pas que la plus grande partie des officiers tant de l'armée de terre que de la marine de la République ont refusé de servir les usurpateurs du pouvoir suprême dans ma patrie, et que leur attachement à leur devoir, à la constitution légitimement établie, et à ma maison, leur a fait quitter les places qu'ils occupaient. Beaucoup de ces braves gens étant sans pain, et n'ayant pas le moyen de leur en fournir, j'ai dû m'adresser à sa Majesté Britannique pour être mis en état de les rassembler, et d'y joindre les bas-officiers et soldats qui viendraient réjoindre leurs officiers, afin de pouvoir prévenir que l'armée de l'Etat ne se débande pas entièrement, et ne soye hors d'état d'être utile quand les circonstances permettront de rentrer dans la République des Provinces Unies, et d'y rétablir un ordre de choses capable de pouvoir contribuer au bonheur, et à la sûreté, et à la propriété des bons habitants de ce pays.

"Sa Majesté Britannique ayant daigné m'accorder les secours pécuniaires, nécessaires pour cette formation, j'ai chargé mon fils cadet de se rendre en Allemagne et d'y rassembler tous les officiers, bas-officiers, et soldats de l'armée de la République, qui pourront le joindre. Je la supplie de vouloir bien donner les ordres nécessaires dans ses états pour que l'on facilite le libre passage à ceux qui viendront au lieu du rassemblement, et sortiront pour cet effet de la République. Ce rassemblement aura lieu à Oslabruck. Qu'il me soye permis de saisir cette occasion pour me recommander avec les miens à la continuation de sa protection, et pour la supplier de vouloir bien me donner son puissant secours pour rétablir dans la République des Provinces Unies, la constitution qu'Elle a bien voulu garantir; et qui n'a pas été détruite par la volonté du peuple, mais par une cabale de gens sans aucune qualification légale, soutenue par les armes Françaises."

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, July 25, Admiralty.—"I return you the enclosed papers communicated to me by your desire, to the contents of which I really do not know what further can be said than that, as we are at present circumstanced both with respect to the enemy's supplies and our own, we are under the necessity of transgressing a little the bounds of strict propriety. The station in which our cruisers are stated to be is exactly that which it is most essential they should occupy, and, even though we have now several small squadrons cruising in that and other parts of the North Sea, we have in them these few days lost no less than from 11 to 16 merchant ships by means of two or three small privateers who have escaped the vigilance of our officers. All the accounts we receive so strongly prove the fact of the Swedes and Danes loaded with provisions, under whatever papers they sail, being invariably destined to ports in the dominion of France, that no doubt can remain upon it, and indeed the enclosed letters only appear to express a desire to keep up appearances. If you can suggest any restrictive instruction which could be given of which you could make a merit with M. Wedel without its preventing our attaining the very necessary object we look to, I should be extremely glad to concur with you in adopting it; but I own I do not at once see how that is possible."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1795, July 26, Dropmore.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to transmit to your Majesty with the dispatches two private letters from Lord Bute and Sir Morton Eden. He is persuaded that your Majesty's goodness, of which he has had so many proofs, will induce your Majesty to excuse him if he so far exceeds the line of his duty as to submit to your Majesty the infinite advantage which might arise in the present moment, if your Majesty should judge it not improper to send your Majesty's Electoral Minister at Vienna such instructions relative to the points in discussion at Ratisbon as might take from the Court of Vienna all plea for inactivity on that ground:

"From a sense of the delicacy of his situation in this respect, and from an anxious desire to avoid any interference in a business which your Majesty might justly deem foreign to that trust with which your Majesty has been graciously pleased to honour him, Lord Grenville both in what he has said to Count Starhemberg and in what he has written to Sir Morton Eden has endeavoured to keep within rather than to exceed what your Majesty was graciously pleased to authorise him to express on that subject; and he is confident that a much greater effect would be produced by any commands from your Majesty to the same effect to your Majesty's Electoral Ministers at Vienna and Ratisbon."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, July 27, Windsor.—"Lord Grenville may rely on my sending proper instructions both to the Regency at Hanover, the ministers at Vienna, and the one at Ratisbon, as soon as Baron Steinberg arrives who embarked last Monday at Cuxhaven and therefore may be hourly expected; but to go any lengths that will remove the inactivity of the Court of Vienna I entirely despair, for though I shall do what I think right, that can never extend to the content of that Court whose apathy seems only equalled by her excessive pride and harshness of language, which must offend whoever is desirous of being well with her."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795,] July 31, Downing Street.—“Lord Moira’s opinion of our prospects is much more favourable than I expected, and he is clearly eager to make the trial. I think I can see Lord Cornwallis here to-morrow before we go to Wimbledon, and therefore, as time presses, I mean to have the Cabinet summoned at one on Sunday. You will, I hope, be able to breakfast at Wimbledon early on Sunday morning. The nonsense of the newspaper gave us no farther trouble.”

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 2, Camp, Southsea.—“I write to you to express the satisfaction I feel at hearing that Lord Moira, after meeting Mr. Pitt at Hertford Bridge, openly said yesterday, at Southampton, that his expedition was to proceed, and it is likewise notorious that great exertions are made since that meeting to encrease his force. I neither know, nor guess his point of attack, but I am very glad that Government have not partaken of that paltry despondency which appeared to have seized all ranks of people upon this calamitous news from Quiberon, which I consider as indeed a very heavy blow, but by no means decisive even upon the struggle for Royalism; but most certainly (even if it were so) the question of continuing an offensive war upon those coasts, availing ourselves of every possible assistance, be it more or less, will not bear a moment’s doubt in opposition to the idea of a defensive war, which I hold to be certain ruin. I hasten to state this very shortly, that you may know one independent opinion upon the present crisis.

“At the same time, I wish you to know that Puisaye is universally execrated. All our navy officers say that his negligence could only be equalled by his cowardice, he being the first on board the Pomona two hours before the Fort was taken. Of this fact, which you may not have heard, I am assured beyond a doubt, and am authorised to state it to you. It is likewise said that Ministers have been told that the stores lost are not very considerable. If this is said (and Puisaye has writ to French at Southampton to tell that story) you may be assured that there is the most direct and positive evidence of two navy captains, both arrived from Quiberon, who are loud in stating that the whole of the stores of the original embarkation are lost, together with the cargoes of flour and rum of fifteen American ships. I mention this, because it is fit you should know it; particularly if it unmasks Puisaye, of whom every one, English and French, speak alike.

“I am very anxious for the Mediterranean news, and the more so because our navy people here say that the Bay of Frejus will not hold more than seven or eight ships, and that it is entirely open. I will beg you to order a bulletin to be sent to me as soon as you get your account. My wife arrived four days ago, and we are all very well. You, I know, are not curious in the article of shipping, but if you was, I would wish to tempt you to pass a few days with us.”

GEORGE III to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 3, Windsor.—“I am sorry to find by Lord Grenville’s note and the enclosures he transmitted to me, that the Court of Spain has made peace with the French; the example is the real evil, for the efforts of Spain have been so very supine, that I cannot say any material advantage has been derived to the general cause by its exertions; but I fear Naples and Sardinia may follow this bad example."

FREDERICK WILLIAM II., KING OF PRUSSIA, to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1795, August 3, Berlin.—"Je viens de recevoir la lettre que votre Altesse Sérénissime a bien voulu m'adresser en date du 22 Juillet. Elle connaît les sentiments que je lui porte, le vif et tendre intérêt que m'inspire sa famille, et le désir qui m'anime de contribuer autant qu'il dépendra de moi à réparer les malheurs et les torts dont elle a à se plaindre; mais je croirais mal répondre à la confiance qu'elle me témoigne si je lui déguisais un instant les inconvénients et les dangers qui sont visiblement attachés au projet qu'elle a formé de rassembler à Osnabruck les transfuges de l'armée Hollandaise. Sans parler de l'ombrage qu'en a déjà conçu le Gouvernement actuel des Provinces Unies, et des précautions qu'il a prises en conséquence, il existe une raison bien plus forte qui s'oppose aux vues de votre Altesse Sérénissime, c'est que le lieu du rassemblement est situé dans l'enceinte de la ligne de démarcation arrêtée par le traité de Basle. Cette ligne, qu'à la réquisition du ministère d'Hanovre, j'ai imaginée comme l'unique moyen de couvrir le nord de l'Allemagne, et que j'ai obtenu avec tant de peine, parce qu'elle entrave à tous égards les opérations de l'armée Française, n'a eu d'autre but que d'écarter les maux qui menaçaient les provinces voisines, et nommément l'Electorat de Hanovre, l'Evêché d'Osnabruck, et les Etats Allemands de votre Altesse Sérénissime. Il a fallu promettre, en retour d'une stipulation si onéreuse pour les Français, mais d'ailleurs si bienfaisante, la neutralité la plus stricte; et cet engagement serait rompu par la moindre démonstration hostile, et les Français ne tarderaient pas d'en tirer vengeance. Dans des telles circonstances, votre Altesse Sérénissime jugera elle-même qu'à moins de contrevenir ouvertement à mon traité de paix, je ne suis pas le maître de permettre dans mes états le passage des militaires Hollandaises qu'elle se propose de réunir sous la bannière du Prince Frédéric. Je sens très bien que son cœur généreux compatit au sort des braves gens qui se dévouent à sa cause; mais leurs faibles efforts sont-ils capables de lutter avec la moindre espérance de succès contre le parti dominant, et peut-on se cacher les maux incalculables que leurs mesures téméraires entraîneraient infailliblement, soit pour eux-mêmes, soit pour les pays des Princes qui les favorisent, après que Sa Majesté Britannique a fait déclarer encore récemment par son Ministre Electoral à la Diette de Ratisbonne, que si la pacification de l'Empire en corps venait à manquer, elle s'empresserait de profiter de la neutralité stipulée pour ses états Allemands par le traité de Basle, et d'en réclamer le bénéfice. Il serait douloureux de voir renaître les difficultés et des embarras sans nombre par des entreprises contradictoires, qui loin d'opérer le moindre bien, ne feraient qu'irriter les esprits, et détruire l'effet de moyens qu'on pourrait employer encore en faveur de votre Altesse Sérénissime à l'époque de la paix générale. Je souhaite que ces considérations lui paraissent assez fortes pour l'engager à modérer l'excès du zèle de ses adhérents, et à révoquer la commission dangereuse dont elle a chargé le Prince son fils cadet. C'est l'amitié qui me dicte ce conseil, et j'y suis d'autant plus autorisé, qu'il s'accorde avec les principes que j'ai dû adopter pour le retour de la paix."

French. Copy.

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 4, Mulheim.—“I came here in a light phaeton that would but just hold Mr. Flint and myself, having every reason to suppose from Sir Morton Eden’s letter that General Bellegarde would have been here before me. I see however where the mistake has been, and will rectify it immediately on my return to Lausanne.

“I shall at the same time send your Lordship the full history of Mr. Vincent’s correspondence, all the papers concerning which I had left behind me. The sum of the whole is that he is zealous, credulous to the last degree, honest but liable to be imposed on, and consequently not fit to be trusted with the management of money. He had formed a connection with some members of the Assembly and had gained some clerks of the Committee of Public Safety, but I fear they had imposed on him most grossly. Unless I see that the connection will be necessary to keep open the communication with Brittany, I shall break it off.

“Besides the measures mentioned in my public dispatch, I have spared no pains to increase the desertion in the army of Savoy. I have sent several very active agents there from Geneva, and Bayard has encouraged some of his young friends to go there as volunteers with the same intention.

“Everything is ripe for a complete insurrection in Savoy and the mountainous parts of the Jura, but nothing can be done without foreign assistance.

“If the two armies could be brought together upon Lyons, it seems to me impossible that the expedition should fail of complete success. If the insurrection in the Forez take place at the same time, the retreat of the army of the patriots acting on the east of the Rhine will be entirely cut off.

“Tessonnet and Ferronière have taken some very clever, active people with them. They will have the assistance of all the young men of Lyons, and the priests are at this moment actively employed in preparing the way for their arrival.

“I have received a very handsome letter from the Duke of Portland conveying assurance that the office of Under Secretary of State shall be kept open for me till my return. I know not how I shall ever be able in any way to justify the confidence that both his Grace and your Lordship have been pleased to show me.”

Two Enclosures.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795.] August 9, [Camp, Southsea].—“Having passed two hours yesterday with the Comte D’Artois in the Asia, I wish to tell you how much I was pleased by his very moderate and proper language, so very different from that of the bulk of his countrymen. He professed the highest obligations to the King’s servants, and a determination to abide explicitly by their directions so long as they thought his services might be made useful in co-operation with any views of this country; but that, whenever he understood that he could no longer be made useful to any such views, he should then request, as the last of very many favours, a shallop to land him wherever any means presented themselves of making himself useful in a last desperate attempt. I took great pains to explain that I spoke no opinions but my own, and then told him that it was universally known that a large armament was fitting for the West Indies, which could only be taken from Lord Moira’s army; that, even if this draught was replaced, some delay must occur; but that it was impossible but that a bystander must see that this peace with Spain must materially change the objects of the British force in this campaign, though I was confident that it would not change the general principles upon which this country engaged in the war. He spoke very reasonably upon all this, and with great cheerfulness of his personal inconveniences, which are really almost insupportable. For, the cabin of a small seventy-four, divided between him and Admiral Pringle, with one dining room in common to the Prince, Admiral, Captain, and seven French officers, gives him only one hole of about eight feet square to sleep and write in. If, therefore, the French expedition is either delayed or abandoned, you must do something with this unfortunate man; for the ship is so crowded that the misery is beyond imagination. He might be moved to the Royal William or some other very large ship; or he might, if the King's House at Lyndhurst is a privileged place, be removed to advantage there, as it is close to Lord Moira, and to his Frenchmen. Carisbrooke Castle (I mean Orde's apartments) are said to be privileged; from motives of humanity some measure must be taken upon all this. I sincerely give you joy of your Dutch capture; but the navy people are all agog to know whether they are prizes or not.

"Pray order any of your news gazettes to be sent to me, for I never get them. He found some London letters from the Duc D'Havr  in Spain, dated three days before the peace, assuring him from Alcudia that no such thing would take place."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 12, [Southsea].—"The post is this moment going out, but as it is probable that this letter will reach you before you see Monsieur de la Riv re, whom Monsieur is sending back to you, I wish to tell you that he is to bring you a letter from Monsieur, telling you that the news from France impose upon him the duty of putting himself at the head of the Royalists in that kingdom; that he wishes to know in what manner he may best co-operate with the views of England; or may engage in the attempt in such manner as may best suit the means which you may have to furnish; but, in short, he presses for a very explicit answer (and in my opinion in terms too peremptory) as to the time when, and the means (if any) with which you may wish to assist Charrette; and begging that some person may be named with whom he may discuss some projet, soit Milord Moira ou quelque autre G n ral au quel on voudroit confier l'exp dition. All this is the result, as I plainly see, of a conversation yesterday between Baron Rolle (his chief adviser) and Lord Moira, who affects to fronder upon every thing; and it likewise arises out of Charrette's letter to him, which is most urgent to him to put himself at their head, and promises mountains. The language likewise of Monsieur de la Riv re is most urgent, and has had a wonderful effect upon every one round him, by stating, from his own knowledge and sight, armies of which you will see the details in a compte rendu prepared for you; and stating Charrette at the head of a force sufficient to protect La Vend e, and to spare for an expedition north of the Loire 20,000 men, Sapineau 20,000, Stofflet 24,000; in short, either Riv re is the falsest of men, or Charrette is blind to his own strength, in not having yet moved; but he vauts for Monsieur. The letter is very civil to you, but I think Lord Moira (from some words I picked up) has urged him to make it peremptory. I write all this without a comment, but I think I am serving you to tell you all I know about the measures and language of Monsieur, which has very much changed since Rivière saw him; for he now declares to me that nothing shall prevent his joining Charrette en chaloupe, but the prospect of co-operating with the designs (if any such exist) of our Ministers; that it is probable that their views may make it necessary for them to look to the West Indies as the more immediate object; and that, if so, he has to thank the King in the warmest terms for all his kindness, and to beg a chaloupe may be ordered to land him; and told me that he should, in that case, wish to be put ashore alone on the Isle Noirmoutier; that he knew this was the language of a desperate man, but that he was convinced that this was the moment in which all must be staked by him, and that his honour was engaged; that he should not complain if we gave him no troops for that he knew that Ministers meant fairly, and if they gave him none it was because they had not any to spare; and, in that case, he should beg for arms and powder, and that Charrette would undertake (which Charrette's letter to him states) to force a communication with our storeships and transports either at the Isle Noirmoutier, Sables d'Olonne, or St. Gil[les].

"You will, of course, keep all this a secret as having come from me, and, if I hear what may appear to me interesting, I will write again tomorrow.

"Colpoys with his five sail just hove in sight. No news as I am assured. Admiral Ford just arrived from St. Domingo."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1795, August 12, Mulheim.—"My mind is so entirely occupied by the magnitude of the business we have in hand, and the fear of leaving anything undone that might tend to further the important views of his Majesty's Ministers, that I really can think of nothing else night or day. I fear therefore I must beg your Lordship to excuse me if I acknowledge this last proof of your kindness in a very inadequate manner. . . . I am the more affected by what you have done because I cannot but consider it as a means of communicating to the public in the most open and honourable manner the satisfaction that his Majesty's Ministers had been pleased to express in my conduct.

"You may most safely rely upon my word when I assure you that there is nothing to be done in the interior but in concert with a foreign force. I know some very well-disposed persons on the side of Besançon who have declared their firm determination at all events to resist any attempt of the kind.

"The Court of Vienna (if her intentions are really good) must be made to understand this point and pressed to its execution night and day, otherwise the whole thing must be given up.

"If that Court will do its duty, I shall not be terrified even by the business of Quiberon, unfortunate as it is.

"Will your Lordship allow me to mention in the very strictest confidence that I have some reason to fear lest my observations on M. de Monciel and the Constitutional party may have been seen or repeated by some person connected with the party. It has been intimated to me that I have not represented them in a favourable light at home. Your Lordship is no doubt aware of the very delicate nature of many parts of my correspondence, and I am sure I have no occasion to recommend them to the strictest secrecy."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August [16], Camp, Southsea.—“Your messenger has just delivered me your letter and I am glad that my intimation was useful. I have, since I wrote it, received the strongest proof that Lord Moira is at the bottom of that epistle. I judged this from the change of style, and from accidental expressions, but I have been confirmed in it by an interview on Friday night with the Baron Rolle since his return from Southampton. The Baron told me that all they wanted in answer was an assurance that, as soon as the situation of our colonies and of our immediate concerns enabled the King's servants to ascertain the means applicable to any purpose on the coast of France, and the propriety of applying those means according to the information they might receive, immediate communication would be made of their intentions; and, if the circumstances did not admit of the strong assistance with troops, and in great force, which they much wished, that they would, in that case, endeavour to consult his wishes, by landing him with a small force (if he should wish it) or with such assistance in stores as might be useful to Charrette, or any other body with whom he might wish to concert his landing; but, that it was probable that no decisive measures could be ascertained sooner than a month. This was Baron Rolle's explanation, in consequence of doubts which I hinted to him on the style of Monsieur's letter, and I pressed him to send a courier to the Duc D'Harcourt or to the Bishop of St. Pol, that they might give this explanation to you, foreseeing that your answer must be dry, and venturing to foretell to him that en ministre sage you ought to give no other. Under these impressions, I do not imagine they will be much disappointed at your answer, and I rather think that they will embark with General Doyle, particularly as the personal inconvenience on board the Jason frigate, to which they moved yesterday, is really very distressing. I shall do everything to urge it, for I see no good, but much possible mischief from his continuance here. I write in a hurry, and, by mistake, upon a half sheet.

“I shall endeavour to see the Baron this evening.

“Admiral Harvey is sailed; Prince of Wales, 98 [guns], Queen Charlotte, 110 [guns], Prince, 98 [guns], Colopus, 74 [guns], Orion, 74 [guns]. The ships are ready for the West India troops except one, which is not yet come round from the river. For God's sake do not delay a moment in the sailing of this armament. The number to be embarked in these ships is 3,264. The ship not come round holds 460.”

W. WINDHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, [August] 16, [Hill Street].—“It will be very desirable that at M. de Moustier's return from Portsmouth, whither he is set off this morning, we should be prepared with such instructions as it may be thought proper to give him; and above all that we should make up our minds as to the degree to which we will, in point of fact, follow up our professions of assisting the Royalists; supposing that they should be still desirous, as I conceive they will, of receiving our assistance. I urge this latter point of consideration, because I certainly do not think that we have acted hitherto like persons really intent on giving that assistance which still, whenever the subject has been mentioned, we have professed to make part of our plan. In the instance of the expedition to Quiberon, everything was done in respect of supply that the circumstances admitted or required; but I cannot say the same of the period either preceding or following. For these last six weeks stores have been lying at Portsmouth that had been prepared for that very purpose, and were of little value for any other. Arms have been lying there that are not of a quality and calibre to be employed in our service, yet I have never yet been able to obtain an order for their being put on board a ship, to take the chance of such opportunities of being landed as we have reason to think have actually happened, and as we have too much reason to apprehend are not likely to happen again. If the Royalists of Brittany should at this moment have received any supply, the importance of which it is impossible to calculate, they owe it to causes from which I am afraid we can take no credit. At all events, there is reason to suppose that if the stores now lying at Portsmouth had been sent out in time, they might have received them into the bargain; and so many more men have been added to their force as there would have been muskets included in that supply. All this might have been effected without the least interference with any other service; for I am afraid the service in question is not sufficiently popular to hope for any attention, as long as any of the others shall remain unsatisfied in any of their least considerable wants. It is the Cinderella of the fable, which is sacrificed in every instance to her more favoured sisters; but which may prove, like her, in the end, the only one really deserving of favour and affection.

"It is very important, if M. de Moustier is to go at all, that he should go as speedily as possible. It is necessary, too, that a reasonable degree of attention should be paid to his safety, and for this reason, as Admiral Harvey is coming away, that he should go in a frigate. On board this frigate it is very desirable that an opportunity should be taken of sending as many arms as she can conveniently dispose of; or perhaps that a transport or two should be sent with her. We know how long such preparations often are in being carried into effect. It is necessary therefore, if they are to be made, that they should be early determined on.

"I trouble you with the suggestion, first with a view to the paper to be prepared for M. de Moustier, and the conversation which you may wish to have with him; and then for the purpose of accelerating any meeting which, on other accounts, you may wish soon to be held."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 17, Camp [at Southsea].—"After I had written to you yesterday, Baron de Rolle called upon me and shewed me a letter to you from Monsieur, couched in terms that I think will please you. It accepts at once the proposal of going with General Doyle, and thanks the King in the warmest terms for the supplies which your letter announces, of arms, money, and stores. I found that your letter was supposed to be the most friendly loyale et franche that could be written; and if the Duc D'Harcourt had not accompanied it with a letter stating that you thought the style of the first too strong, they would have continued in the most perfect conviction that they had obtained all that they wished for. They had entirely given up all hopes of any enterprise till after the sailing of our West Indian armament; and all that they flattered themselves they might obtain was assurances that the very thing would be done in four or five weeks that is done now; with this difference only, that they imagined the delay of five weeks would have given the means of supplying more troops. Seeing that your letter was so kindly taken, I contented myself with observing that they had an advantage of which I wished them to feel the full weight, and that was the advantage of knowing that whatever you had engaged to, be it more or less, they might be certain of seeing accomplished as far as depended upon you; and that I regretted that the Duc D'Harcourt, or the Bishop of St. Pol, had not been directed to give to you the explanation which they had made to me of the first letter, as it would have prevented, in all probability, the necessity of any conversation of the nature which had passed (as Rolle informed me) between you and D'Harcourt.

"I, this morning, went on board the Iason, and found Monsieur more delighted than you can imagine; and this was certainly his natural feeling upon it, for I went so early that Rolle had not been on board, nor indeed could any boat have gone (from the squally weather) before I saw him, and this I did on purpose. He told me how much he was au désespoir that his letter could have been supposed too pressing, for, that all he had ever dared hope for was for such an answer as you had written to him, knowing how much the Spanish peace and our West Indian news had deranged your plans; that the 4,000 men under Doyle valoient bien 16,000 six weeks hence; that it was not only his duty, but his inclination to seize the very first moment to endeavour to render himself worthy, if possible, of this mark of the King's goodness, and of his Ministers' good faith and exertions; that he was very sanguine of success, and that he was miserable that his messenger did not go yesterday, as it might be imagined that he had paused upon the offer made to him. He was pleased when I told him that Rolle had, last night, shown me his answer to you, and begged me as a favour to bear testimony to this fact, for that he could not bear to suffer in your opinion after the manner in which you had treated him. He dwelt very much upon those parts of your letter which mark so distinctly General Doyle's orders, and the nature of the assistance which he had to look to, namely, money, arms, and clothing; and he told me that this style was so very different from what he had met with in his other correspondences where all was promised, and nothing done, that he was more sanguine than if you had promised him more. He asked me what I thought of that part of your letter which speaks of the force as being only 4,000 men under General Doyle, for that he understood from Lord Moira that these 4,000 men were all English, and that, your letter not having said one word of the French troops now at Southampton and elsewhere, he had flattered himself that these 4,000 were exclusive of the Frenchmen; and that the emigrants of all sorts were to accompany him. I told him that I had likewise understood from Sir William Pitt that the British troops under Doyle were 4000, and if this was so, I had no doubt but that the French would be ordered to accompany him. He begged that I would mention this to you, and renewed a very earnest hope that the cocardes blanches, now at Bremerlehe, would be allowed to come away instantly, as he now more than ever should want officers who had served. He said that the details of stores which Lord Moira had shown to him were magnificent, and that the impression made by this unexpected attack would be most sensibly felt through every part of France. He said that he owed it to his family to leave his son behind him, and that he thought he followed the wish of Government in leaving him with Lord Moira; but that in case Lord Moira was to embark, and the King did not otherwise dispose of him, he implored me to take care of him, en cas de malheur, till his brother could send for him. He admitted that, upon re-perusing his letter, he thought it trop fort; but that he was urged from every quarter to write in the most pressing terms, and that he hoped Ministers would not think his impatience unnatural, particularly when everything and everyone round him increased that impatience by the most earnest language, and by urging him to consider that this was their last stake, and the last struggle. He said that he should still permit to himself one representation upon this expedition, founded upon the universal opinion of all the French and English navy officers employed at Quiberon : and that was the necessity of having 400 English cavalry to be employed as redettes and advanced posts to the English port, wherever it was occupied. That, of course, he would not wish that such a corps should sail with him under the uncertainty of the present orders for Houdiac [Houdan] and Houat ; but that he knew so strongly the necessity of such a corps for our security, that he hoped that any application for this body to be kept ready for a second embarkation, would not be deemed an infraction of the rule he had proposed to himself of not urging for one man more than was proposed by Ministers for this object. I told him that I thought such a communication to Lord Moira or to General Doyle would be considered undoubtedly as originating in the motives he assigned ; and that I would mention the subject to you as one that he wished might be considered upon the grounds alleged by him ; and he said that he wished that the French cavalry now coming from Germany should not be considered as destined to this purpose, as it would be essential for him to give to Charrette every French horseman that could be collected, he being deficient in cavalry.

“He then spoke to me of the strange message which the Prince of Wales had sent him yesterday by Sir Sydney Smith, whom he appeared to think very officious, to apprise him of his intention of making him a visit ; and said that he was very much distressed about it, as the King might not perhaps have been apprized of it ; and that, in every point, he wished to follow the line which he thought the most pleasing to the King. I said that the King was so much in the habit of seeing the Prince of Wales acting from his own impressions, that he would not perhaps attach much importance to this step ; and that his line appeared to me very plain. He told me that he dreaded a private interview with the Prince of Wales, fearing that the Prince might not be in the secret of the measures proposed by Government, and that any language which he might hold afterwards might be imputed to communications on board the Jason, that he saw no means of explaining these fears, but that he trusted them to me in hopes that I would write to you what he could not on this subject. He added that he had ordered a vast number of French officers on board in order to make a private interview more difficult, and that he should make him no communication whatsoever. When he leaves England, he proposes, in the letter he writes to the King, to acknowledge the Prince's visit as an additional proof of the interest which his Majesty has been so good as to mark to him ; and he promises me a full detail of all that has passed between the Prince and him.

“He mentioned to me (what you had likewise told me of in London) the proposed coinage of Louis 18th ; and said that the impression to be made by this was so great, and that it was so essential to them, now that they were left more immediately to their own exertions, to avail themselves of all collateral aids, that he begged that this coinage (or even the copper coinage, if the other was not finished) might be sent to him as soon as possible. He likewise spoke upon the hopes given that some arrangement might be made for his brother's debts ; as circumstances might make it very necessary for him to look towards Lyons (where there were very great dispositions for monarchy) or towards the Prince of Condé's army, and, at present, he could not leave Verona without risk of personal arrest.

"I have now put together the result of this long conversation; much of it he requested might be stated to you, which I promised, provided it was not expected from me to give any answer upon those points, as they ought to be discussed (if he wished for an answer) by some one properly authorised. He said he considered what had passed simply as memoranda; but he wished to convey to you through me his sense, which he should always retain, of the attentions, the frankness, and the real assistance he had received from you. Upon this he spoke very much at length, and with much apparent sensibility. He appeared to have found out that Lord Moira was not well with Ministers, and, once or twice, made an opening of that sort which I would not understand; but I have no doubt but that Lord Moira urged and dictated part of that letter which he regrets having writ.

"What I have done and said cannot, I trust, disserve you, and I am glad if these communications help you.

"Admiral Harvey came to again yesterday, with his sailing signal still flying. The Prince of Wales is this moment gone from Portsmouth. The transports from Southampton arrived this morning, and all will be ready by Wednesday. But, for God's sake, send some subordinate general with Doyle; for his force is too large for one officer, and, hitherto, no second general is named; and, in case of his death, the command devolves on Colonel Graham, who never saw a soldier or a shot but what he saw at Toulon."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795,] August 17, Wimbledon.—"The Duke of York has been here with me this morning, and tells me the King will not, on any account, agree to part with the Guards for the West Indies. He says the King wrote to me yesterday on the subject, but, by some strange inattention somewhere, I have not yet received his letter. We must do the best we can to devise a substitute. I must withdraw the Scotch brigade from the East Indies, which will afford, I hope, about one thousand. If success attends us at the Cape, it will be [a] hazardous expedient the doing so, as we have nothing else reserved to send there; but, with the impression which you know I entertain of the importance of St. Domingo, I think the risk must be run. The King has consented to allow us to draft Prince William's regiment, which will give us 800 good men. Still, however, there is a deficiency, and I cannot devise any possible means of supplying it except by taking two regiments in place of one from Gibraltar; and in order to enable us to do so, you must order Rolle's regiment to Gibraltar in place of joining the Prince of Condé.

"Before I see you again I trust you have formed some plan to get, as fast as possible, some thousands of German troops for West India service. I hope it is our last draught on that fund, and therefore you must not grudge giving a high price if necessary. We can get plenty of transports at Hamburg, and if I thought there was a chance of a good supply of Germans for the West Indies, I would send an agent over to see the transports properly fitted up for West India transports."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795,] August 18, [Camp, Southsea].—"I have a letter from Mr. Smith of Thame soliciting my interference with the Lord Chancellor for the living of Aston Rowant near Thame for his son-in-law; and informing me that he had written to you in order to be in time. I had applied to the Lord Chancellor last week for Lillingstone-Lovel, upon the plea of it being within 2 miles of Stowe, and found it given to Lord Harcourt. I do not therefore like to expose myself to a second refusal. But, if you have, in consequence of Mr. Smith's letter, applied, and if you understand Lord Chancellor to be disengaged, I will, in that case, write an application for it.

"Lord Moira sent for the Baron Rolle this morning to Southampton. I will endeavour to know the result of this conference on Thursday, for he does not return till the night tide of Wednesday. The convoy from Bremerthe is said to be off, but it blows too hard at south-west for them to make Spithead. Harvey's signal is still out."

Postscript.—"Lord Moira recommended the Prince of Wales to visit the Comte D'Artois; but came here 5 minutes after the Prince was gone, and said that it was very unlucky, for that he had a great deal to say to them both. I believe he dined with the Prince at Sir H. Featherstone's, and sent for the Baron Rolle."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795,] August 21, [Camp, Southsea].—"I am just returned from on board the Jason, where, notwithstanding your surprise, you are certainly in very high odour, and Monsieur very loud in his gratitude. I am persuaded that this is unaffected, for it is certain that they did not expect the smallest effort to have been made for them till our West India armament had sailed; and the strongest proof of it is that the Comte D'Artois shewed me a letter written by him to the Duc de Bourbon, from Deal, stating the news which he had learnt upon his arrival in England, and his doubts whether it was expedient, under all the circumstances of difficulty which had presented themselves, for him to press the idea of coming to join him, till he could give him some assurances of what l'Angleterre pourrait ou voudrait faire. He is delighted with the arrival of his cavalry, who are more numerous than he expected, and with the assurances given him yesterday by Lord Moira that his emigrants are not included in the 4000 men ordered for his service. Lord Moira's three transports, which were wanting, do not arrive till this evening, but the transports are now working down to St. Helens, and, while I was there, Admiral Harvey sent him a note to inform him that they should certainly sail on Sunday morning, or perhaps to-morrow night. The wind is now perfectly fair, and, but for the unaccountable delay of the transports, might have carried them by this time half-way down channel. If they are still to wait for the other regiment that Lord Moira proposed to you to send, they will, I fear, lose at least five days more.

"Monsieur shewed me the King's manifesto from Verona, which is not quite so good as Lord Clarendon's from Breda. I think it full of verbiage, and of repetitions, and with some very exceptionable parts, such as the unnecessary mention of the Duc D'Orléans, which can only offend his family. The very vague proscription of all the judges and all the actors and co-operators in the murders of the King, Queen, and Princess Elizabeth, without leaving himself the means of pardoning any of the large number (not less than 500) whom this proscription includes, declaring that their crimes passent les bornes de la clémence royale, and finally the very silly and very indecent expression of conquering France. These appeared to me so striking that I could not help stating them to Monsieur, and he shewed me part of a letter which he had already written to his brother, attacking those three identical points, and informing him of his intention of explaining some, and, in the Bas-Breton translation, altering the term conquête; but if he could shorten at least four-fifths of it, his brother's character as an author (for it is all his own composition) would gain by the alteration. His brother writes him word that he has heard of the Spanish peace, and that, within the last 24 hours, he had seen Monsieur de la Casas, who had assured him that Spain would redouble her efforts, and make exertions plus vigoureux que jamais in his favour. He added that this transaction must inevitably totally change the relative situations of the two countries, in case of the success of these attempts.

"I found that the Prince of Wales had been very curious as to the project of a descent, and had questioned Monsieur much about it, appearing wholly uninformed of what was going on, but speaking with great eagerness and apparent anxiety for the event. Monsieur vowed that there was nothing said that might not have been proclaimed at Charing Cross, and I rather think it was true, for the means of conversing are so few that unless he orders every one out of the great cabin (which he could not do as there was a large suite), everything is overheard. Lord Moira had sent for Rolle to Southampton to settle the French, who are to go on this expedition, for they were disputing their droits de service, and the arrival of the transports from Germany made many details absolutely necessary. I have some reason to think that this was the case; but more passed, for Rolle à propos de botte said to me this morning: Il me paroit que Lord Moira fronde beaucoup vos ministres, and je crois entrevoir que cela pourroit nous nuire, si nous restons encore quelque jours à Spithead. I write all this without any other object than that of giving you hints that may assist you.

"Many thanks for your offer respecting Smith. I agree with you that it is not tant. I am surprised at your hint about Jemmy, because he had, some years ago, spoke upon this very object, and declared he would not look to it. I support Dickenson, and I think he will carry it."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 24, Wimbledon.—"I send you the enclosed as I received it. I do not recollect the other application transmitted under my cover. Wherever integrity and industry are requisite I believe he may be fairly trusted, and his knowledge of commercial business I believe to be very considerable. At the same time I feel it unfair to the Duke of Portland to wish him in any other situation than where he now is, for I believe he is universally admitted to be one of the best magistrates that exists in the metropolis."

Enclosing a letter from Mr. Colquhoun offering his services as one of the commissioners to be appointed under the treaty of commerce concluded with the United States.

SIR MORTON EDEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1795, August 26, Vienna.—"My best acknowledgments are due to your Lordship for your confidential private letter by my servant. I lost not a moment to make to M. de Thugut the communication contained in it, which gave him, he said, the greater satisfaction, as he has always thought the island of Noirmoutiers should be the object of our attack.

"I greatly regret that my representations in favour of the augmentation of the Prince of Condé's army have had such little effect ; but the cry against the Emigrés increases every day, and M. de Thugut is so decidedly against placing any exclusive confidence in them that of late, notwithstanding the intimate and confidential footing on which I am with him, my representations on that subject are always received with some degree of impatience.

"If your Lordship thinks proper to make any communication here relative to the corps of Dutch emigrants and deserters assembling on the northern frontier of Holland it would be very well taken, as M. de Thugut has repeatedly made inquiries about it, expressing always his wishes that the report may be true.

"By the next messenger I shall, I trust, be able to transmit to your Lordship a memorial about the Bank of Vienna. The delay has been occasioned by the long and severe illness of the person whom I have employed to draw it up."

BARON DE NANTAT to LORD GRENVILLE.

ACCOUNT OF A MISSION TO THE COUNT OF CHARETTE.

Extract.

1795, August 26, Portsmouth.—"Envoyé en France par Monsieur, et subséquemment par Milord Grenville pour porter des dépêches au Général Charette, prendre connaissance des forces des Royalistes de la Vendée, et des dispositions des habitants de ce pays-là, et de ceux qui l'environnent ; pour en suite me transporter à Paris, et ailleurs, et y servir la cause du Roi de la manière que les circonstances le permettraient, je dois rendre un compte exact de ma conduite dans l'exécution de ma commission, de mes observations, et des raisons qui m'ont porté de revenir de Nantes en Angleterre, au lieu de me rendre à Paris, comme il avait été projeté. Je vais rendre ce compte avec la plus scrupuleuse exactitude, et avec beaucoup de franchise, même dans ce qui peut contrarier quelques idées reçues.

"Prévenu que Milord Grenville voulait m'envoyer à M. Charette, je frétai dans les derniers jours du mois de Juin, un sloop Danois nommé la Marie Elisabeth pour Nantes, et je me munis de passeports Américains pour pouvoir m'introduire comme négociant.

"Le 3 Juillet, je reçus par M. le Comte de Serens, les dépêches de Milord Grenville, et je mis à même de partir aussitôt.

"Le 4. M. Windham me fit demander d'aller chez lui. Ce Ministre me donna des instructions, et une lettre pour le Général Charette, et me dit que, désirant lui envoyer de l'argent pour ses besoins les plus urgents, il me serait remis des lettres de credit de Messieurs Ransom, Morland, et Hamersley, pour toucher à Nantes 10,000*l*.

"Le 6. Je reçus à 7 heures du soir les lettres de crédit qui devaient m'être données par ordre de M. Windham, et je partis immédiatement après avec le Comte de Butler.

"Le 17. À deux heures du matin je partis, laissant mon sloop à Pimboeuf, et j'arrivai à Nantes à 8 heures du matin avec le Comte de Butler.

"À notre arrivée à Nantes, nous nous rendîmes chez le Citoyen Bridon, ancien Capitaine de vaisseau marchand, que je savais avoir toujours été dans les charges depuis le commencement de la République, et pour nous en faire un protecteur, nous jugeâmes à propos de l'y engager par son intérêt. Nous lui dîmes donc, que nous étions deux

Américains qui désirant établir un commerce en France, étaient venus de Londrès pour faire un essai ; que nous aménions une cargaison, et voulions en refaire une autre de vins et d'eaux de vie ; que ne pouvant connaître le prix des marchandises dans un moment où le signe monétaire variait prodigieusement de valeur à chaque instant, nous le prions de faire nos ventes et nos achats, en acceptant un droit de commission sur les unes et les autres. La proposition se trouva fort du goût de Bridon ; il nous accueillit très bien, et prit pour comptant tous les contes que nous jugeâmes à propos de lui faire. Il nous dit qu'il y avait des formalités à remplir à notre arrivée, mais que ce serait d'autant plus facile que le citoyen Le Roi, son associé, était de la Municipalité et de service. A l'instant il nous mena donc à la Municipalité, au Comité de Surveillance, et au Département, où, présentés par lui, nous fumes bien reçus et admis sans examen. On nous fit seulement des questions, dont quelques-unes assez bizarres, sur l'Angleterre et les Anglais.

“ Les premières et indispensables démarches faites, je cherchai sans perdre de temps, à me mettre à même de m'acquitter de la commission dont les Ministres de Sa Majesté Britannique m'avaient chargé envers le Général Charette. Je me trouvai très embarrassé pendant un moment, ayant appris que M. Le Veneur avait quitté Nantes dans la crainte d'être arrêté ; et aucunes des personnes auxquelles je demandais M. de Brue d'Ivignac ne pouvant me l'indiquer. On me disait qu'il y avait 4 ou 5 de Brue, mais qu'on n'en connaissait aucun sous le nom d'Ivignac. La crainte de mal tomber m'empêchait d'aller chez aucun des cinq. Il m'était fort difficile de m'éclaircir, parceque les questions que j'aurais pu faire n'étaient pas naturelles à un Américain, pouvaient me faire suspecter, et m'ôter tous moyens de remplir mon principal objet. Le même jour, je me déterminai cependant dans la soirée à aller voir la veuve d'un Capitaine de vaisseau marchand, nommée Madame Cazal, qui m'avait été indiquée à Londrès comme Royaliste. Je trouvai en elle une femme courageuse, et très zélée pour sa religion et pour son Roi. Elle m'entendit bientôt, et m'assura qu'elle ferait sans hésiter et sans crainte, tout ce que je lui demanderais, et qui pourrait être utile à la cause à laquelle nous étions dévoués, elle et moi. Et, en effet, elle m'a été très utile pendant mon séjour à Nantes. C'est elle chez qui j'ai déposé, et toujours laissé, tout ce que j'avais intérêt que ne fut trouvé ni sur moi ni chez moi.

“ Sur ce que je lui demandai si elle pouvait m'indiquer quelqu'un qui fut en relation avec le Général Charette, et par le moyen de qui je pusse lui faire tenir un paquet, elle me répondit qu'elle ne connaissait personne qui eut des rapports avec le Général, mais que sa sœur, Mademoiselle Charette, était à Nantes, et que sans doute elle avait des moyens de communiquer avec lui. Je demandai à voir Mademoiselle Charette. Madame Cazal me dit qu'elle se tenait cachée, et qu'on ne savait où, mais qu'elle allait travailler à trouver un homme qui avait toute la confiance de cette demoiselle, et qu'elle ferait ensorte de m'aboucher avec lui. Effectivement, le soir même, elle le trouva, et me dit le lendemain, 18, à dix heures du matin, qu'elle le ferait venir chez elle quand je le voudrais. A ma demande elle fut le chercher sur le champ, et me l'amena au bout d'une demie heure ; je lui parlai. C'est un maçon devenu entrepreneur de batiments, nommé Souriceau, pauvre mais plein d'honneur et de probité, et entièrement dévoué à la cause du Roi. C'est lui qui a été de ma part trouver le Général Charette, et lui porter mes paquets, toutes les fois que je l'ai jugé à propos, qui m'a accompagné quand j'ai été parler à ce Général, qui a pris tous les moyens nécessaires pour me faire sortir de la ville secrètement, et y rentrer de même ; qui s'est chargé de faire tous les achats et envois de poudres ; et, en un mot, qui a fait tout ce qui a pu être utile, sans être jamais arrêté ni effrayé par les dangers qu'il y avait à courir, s'il était découvert ; c'est lui qui cache Mademoiselle Charette dans sa maison, et fournit le plus souvent à ses besoins.

"Lorsque je demandai à Souriceau de me faire voir Mademoiselle Charette, il me dit qu'il lui ferait part de mon désir, mais qu'on avait été si souvent trompé, et qu'il y avait tant de danger pour elle à laisser savoir où elle était, qu'il ne l'engagerait pas à me recevoir s'il n'avait pas connaissance de ce que j'étais, et de mes intentions. Je fus donc obligé de m'ouvrir à ce brave homme, qui dès qu'il m'eut entendu, et vu les paquets dont j'étais porteur, me protesta que je pouvais compter sur lui. Il me donna rendez-vous à dix heures du soir chez Madame Cazal, pour delà me mener chez Mademoiselle Charette.

"Effectivement il me conduisit chez elle à l'heure indiquée. Je trouvai en elle une demoiselle de 30 ans, d'un sens très droit, et très zélée pour la cause du Roi, mais très inquiète sur le sort du Général, son frère, dont elle connaît les besoins pressants. Quand elle connut l'objet de ma mission, elle me traita comme un ange tutélaire envoyé pour le salut de tous. Elle me dit que son frère était à Belleville, à 12 grandes lieues de Nantes ; et qu'elle allait me faire chercher quelqu'un pour lui porter mes dépêches, et lui demander un rendez-vous, où nous puissions avoir une entrevue, qu'elle regardait combien nécessaire. Souriceau qui était présent, assura que l'objet était trop important pour qu'il souffrit qu'un autre que lui en fut chargé. Il fut donc convenu qu'il partirait le lendemain matin, 19. Je lui remis en conséquence mes paquets pour le Général, et le chargeai de lui demander de me fixer le jour et le lieu où je pouvais me rendre pour le voir, désirant que ce fût le plutôt possible, et à peu de distance de Nantes, afin que mon absence de cette ville fut courte, et put être ignorée, comme il était nécessaire. Le 19, Souriceau partit, et je remis après mon entrevue avec M. Charette toutes démarches pour réaliser en espèces les lettres de crédit que m'avait fait remettre M. Windham ; espérant que ce général aurait à Nantes quelque correspondant, qui m'en fournirait les moyens. En attendant, je commençai à travailler, comme j'ai fait constamment depuis pendant tout le temps de mon séjour en France, à connaître, d'une manière certaine, l'esprit public, et l'opinion tant à Nantes que dans les cantons qui l'avoisinent, et même dans les autres provinces du Royaume ; l'état de la culture, et de subsistances actuelles et futures ; les forces de la Vendée, celles des Chouans, leurs relations, leurs dispositions. Je mettrai à la fin ce compte, le résultat de mes observations, que je crois pouvoir donner pour certain, parcequ'elles ont été multipliées, et que j'en ai adopté que ce que j'ai vu bien prouvée.

"Mon messenger Souriceau, ayant mis une grande diligence, rentra à Nantes dans la nuit du 21 au 22 ; et m'avertit le 22, au matin, que le Général Charette serait le lendemain, 23, à la pointe du jour auprès de St. Philbert à 4 lieues de Nantes, où il m'attendrait ; et, qu'en conséquence, il fallait que je sortisse de la ville le jour même avant la nuit, afin d'être à 10 heures du soir à Ruzé, qui en est éloigné d'une demie lieue, et où je trouverais des chevaux et une escorte de cavalerie.

“À 6 heures du soir, en plein jour par conséquent, affublé d'un habit de maçon, des outils et un baguet de chaux sur les épaules, et conduit par mon fidel Sourceau, une toise à la main, je traversai la ville, et passai tous les ponts, excepté le pont Rousseau, qui est le dernier et le plus soigneusement gardé. Un peu avant d'y arriver, nous trouvâmes dans la rue un chirurgien (M. Minx) qui, sans nous rien dire, marchait devant nous, et nous conduisit par de petites rues et par des jardins, à une maison de campagne sur le bord du dernier bras de la Loire, et tout près du porte. Arrivé là, Madame de (Je n'ai pas su son nom, mais c'est une sœur de M. de Monté) à qui appartient la maison, me reçut avec empressement, et me cachait soigneusement jusqu' à la nuit. Je trouvai dans l'endroit où l'on me renfermat, un chirurgien qui venait des Chouans de la haute Loire, et allait pour soigner des malades à l'armée de Stoffel. Quand il fut bien nuit, en me faisant escalader plusieurs murs, on me conduisit de jardins en jardins jusqu' à un bateau, avec lequel je passai la rivière. La femme du batelier me conduisit à Ruzé chez Madame Bascher. C'est la mère de M. Bascher qui a débarqué à Quiberon, et qui de là a été rejoindre le Général Charette. Cette dame, ainsi que sa fille, me reçut avec empressement, et m'appris que M. de la Roberie, commandant de la cavalerie, était venu dans le village avec une escorte pour me recevoir, et me conduire ; mais que le hasard ayant fait sortir de Nantes un corps de troupes assez considérables, il avait été obligé de se retirer, après avoir donné l'ordre à un officier de la paroisse, de me faire fournir deux chevaux, et de me conduire.

“J'attendis les chevaux jusqu' à minuit. Alors je partis et courus par des chemins creux et bordés de haie ; et comme la nuit était très noire, mon cheval tombait très souvent, et entre autres au milieu de la rivière, qu'il me fallut passer à gué au pont St. Martin. J'arrivai à la pointe du jour, le 23, au petit camp de cavalerie où je devais trouver le Général. Il n'y était pas encore rendu, et n'y vint qu' à 9 heures du matin. En l'attendant, je m'occupai à causer avec les soldats du camp, et les officiers que j'avais trouvés couchés dans les granges d'une maison voisine, appartenante à M. de la Roberie, et qui a été brûlé. Les entretiens que j'eus avec les uns et les autres m'intéressèrent infiniment. Ils me firent connaître les forces de la Vendée, son organisation, sa discipline, ses moyens de subsistance. Je fus infiniment content de l'esprit qui régné généralement dans cette armée. Officiers et soldats protestent qu'ils ne mettront pas les armes bas que le Roi ne soit sur le trône, et qu'ils réprendront tous leur sang plutôt que de reconnaître la République. Leur assurance fait plaisir, ils ne craignent rien, et se croient invincibles. J'ai admiré la naïveté avec laquelle ils racontent leurs victoires sans se faire valoir, et leurs défaites sans honte et sans les dissimuler. Les officiers m'ont paru très absolus, et les soldats soumis et respectueux. Tous ont la plus grande confiance dans M. de Charette, et le plus grand attachement pour sa personne, quoiqu'ils le craignent infiniment. Tous les chevaux, que j'ai vus, sont beaux et bons et dans le meilleur état.

“ Nous étions tous réunis dans la maison de M. de la Roberie, lorsque le Général arriva, accompagné de 4 ou 5 officiers. Tout le monde courut à lui et l'entoura. Je remarquai avec plaisir cet empressement, et l'impression que chacun éprouvait en le voyant. Il reçut tout le monde sans fierté, mais avec dignité. Je perçai la foule pour aller à lui, et le priai de vouloir bien recevoir un maçon qui venait lui rendre l'hommage. Il me répondit que ce maçon verrait que les Brigands n'étaient pas sauvages. Il ne me dit plus rien ; mais après dix minutes il me propose de passer au jardin. Là me prenant la main, qu'il me serrait tant que nous marchâmes, il me conduisit dans un cabinet couvert, où nous commençâmes une conversation qui dura 8 à 9 heures, en plusieurs reprises. J'en rapporterai le plus intéressant, avec la plus scrupuleuse exactitude ; et je supprimerai ce qui l'est moins pour éviter d'être trop long, me réservant d'en rendre compte verbalement, si on le désire ; assuré que je suis, que le tout est si bien gravé dans ma mémoire, que de longtemps rien n'en serait effacé.

“ “Général, vous avez vu les dépêches que j'ai eu l'honneur de vous apporter, et j'espère que les offres et les assurances qu'elles contiennent, vous auront fait autant de plaisir que j'en ai eu à vous les porter.”

“ Charette : ‘ J'ai le plus grand plaisir avoir quelqu'un qui a la confiance de Monsieur, et celles des Ministres du Roi d'Angleterre. Je lui donne toute la mienne, et je me conformerai à ce que vous me direz.’

“ “ Je ne viens point, Général, pour vous rien prescrire ; ce ne serait pas répondre aux intentions de Monsieur, qui a infiniment de confiance en vous, et qui d'après tout ce que vous avez si glorieusement fait, s'en rapporte entièrement à vous. Je suis seulement chargé de vous le renouveler de vive voix, ainsi que les assurances que vous donnent Milord Grenville et Mr. Windham dans leurs lettres, et de prendre connaissance de votre position politique et militaire, de vos besoins, et des moyens de vous faire parvenir ce qui vous sera destiné.’

“ Charette : ‘ Ah ! ils m'ont abandonné pendant deux ans, dans un temps où j'aurais pu, avec peu de secours, finir la guerre, par le rétablissement de la Monarchie.’

“ “ On a tenté plusieurs fois de venir à vous, et on n'a jamais pu y parvenir, parceque vous n'aviez pas de port sur la côte.”

“ Charette : ‘ Que ne me faisait-on savoir où l'on viendrait, et j'y aurais été au temps fixé. Mais comme je ne pouvais pas me soutenir sur la côte, tandis que la République avait des forces maritimes, je n'ai pas voulu perdre des hommes précieux en attaquant des ports, sans avoir la certitude que cela était nécessaire au moment même.’

“Charette : ‘Puisque vous, qui étiez sur les lieux, me l’assurez, e l’espérerai donc ; mais croyez-vous qu’ils m’envoient quelques troupes ?’

“‘Je ne crois pas, Général, que le Gouvernement Anglais en ait assez dans le moment à disposer pour vous en envoyer ; et même Mr. Windham me l’a dit la veille de mon départ, en m’assurant que vous auriez d’ailleurs tout ce qu’il vous faudrait, et que vous demanderiez.’

“Charette : ‘Ah ? s’ils m’envoyaient seulement deux mille hommes de troupes Françaises ! Ce n’est pas pour le nombre des hommes que je désire ce secours, mais pour qu’on sache, pour qu’il se répande, que j’en ai reçu, afin de soutenir la confiance de mes soldats, et des habitants des pays qui m’environnent, qui n’attendent qu’un moment favorable ; et que je puisse leur fournir des armes.’

“‘Vous aurez, Général, de tout ce qui vous est offert, dès que vous aurez fait connaître en Angleterre ce qu’il vous faut. Mr. Windham m’a même chargé de vous dire, si vous ne le saviez pas encore, qu’un vaisseau avait déjà reçu l’ordre de se porter à la côte avec 20 mille livres de poudre, pour vous les délivrer.’

“Charette : ‘Il est vrai qu’il en est venu un, il y a 10 à 12 jours ; mais comme je n’étais pas prévenu, on n’a pas répondu à ses signaux. Il a mis à terre 5 à 6 émigrés qu’il avait pris à Quiberon après la descente. Ces Messieurs sont venus m’avertir. J’ai aussitôt porté 6 mille hommes à la côte, mais le vaisseau n’y était plus, et n’a pas reparu depuis.’

“‘Si vous les y tenez, Général, d’un jour à l’autre, vous le verrez reparaitre, ou quelques autres ; surtout après que vous aurez répondu aux Ministres.’

“‘Mr. Windham m’a aussi, Général, donné à mon départ, des lettres de crédit sur une maison de Nantes, pour toucher 10 mille louis, et vous les remettre. Je m’occuperai de suite à les réaliser et à vous les faire passer le plutôt possible.’

“Charette : ‘C’est de la poudre, des armes, et surtout un Prince pour être à la tête des armées Royales, qu’il me faut ; quant à l’argent, ce n’est pas ce que je demande.’

“‘Général, ce désintéressement est bien digne de vous, mais enfin il faut de l’argent pour faire la guerre.’

“Charette : ‘Je suis habitué à ne payer mes soldats qu’avec des coups de baton quand ils ne font pas leur devoir, et je ne veux pas leur donner une habitude différente qui les gênerait.’

“‘Mais, mon Général, même en ne les payant pas, si vous pouviez au moins leur fournir les choses qui leur manquent, vous pourriez mieux disposer d’eux.’

“Charette : ‘Ils m’obéissent tout de même, parce qu’ils ont confiance en moi, et qu’ils savent bien que je ferais fusiller celui qui n’obéirait pas, et qu’aucun de leurs camarades n’oserait refuser de le faire, si je l’ordonnais. Je ne demanderai pas d’argent, cela me répugne.’

“‘Eh bien, Général, comme il est absolument nécessaire pour le bien de la cause générale que vous soutenez si bien, que vous ayez de l’argent, et abondamment, j’en demanderai pour vous, et vous en auriez. En attendant, je vais tacher de toucher à Nantes les 10 mille louis ; mais d’après les informations que j’ai prise sur la maison Babu, elle est très républicaine. Je n’ai pas voulu la voir avant d’avoir conféré avec vous, imaginant que vous aviez quelque banquier ou négociant à Nantes avec qui vous aviez des rapports, et qui, sur votre indication, pourrait faire les fonds et vous les faire remettre.’

“Charette : ‘Assurez le Roi de ma fidélité, de mon dévouement à son service ; et Monsieur de mon respect, de mon attachement à sa personne, et de mon extrême désir de me voir sous ses ordres. Assurez les deux Princes, que je verserai jusqu’à la dernière goutte de mon sang, s’il le faut, pour rétablir le Roi sur son trône ; et que tous les officiers et soldats de mon armée pensent de même. Vous pouvez aussi les assurer, ainsi que les Ministres de Sa Majesté Britannique, que j’ai de ce côté de la Loire, 80 mille hommes armés pour défendre le pays ; que dans les 80 mille hommes, il y en a 50 mille que je puis mener partout où il faudra pour y planter le drapeau blanc ; et qu’il n’y en a pas un qui ne soit aguerri et éprouvé par 120 combats au moins.’

“Charette : ‘Oui, je les y comprends ; mais je réponds que si j’ai des armes à distribuer, et un Prince à notre tête, il aura dans deux mois 200 mille hommes à ses ordres. Les offres et les demandes qui me sont faites, ainsi que la confiance qu’on me témoigne, m’en donnent l’assurance.’

“ ‘Vous avez, Général, de la cavalerie.’

“Charette : ‘Oui, il y a, en tout, 3 mille hommes bien montés. J’en ai dans ma division 1 mille ; j’aurais des chevaux pour monter 1 mille hommes de plus, parcequ’un grand nombre de mes cavaliers en ont plusieurs ; mais comme ils seront pris à l’ennemi, c’est leur propriété, et je la respecte. Si je pouvais les acheter, je doublerais ma cavalerie ; il me faudrait aussi, cependant, des sabres et des pistolets—vous verrez mes chevaux (je les ai vus).’

“ ‘Général, il vous faut donc de l’argent, et puisqu’on vous en offre, il faut profiter de ces offres.

“Charette : ‘Eh, sans doute il en faut, mais je vous le répète, je ne puis me déterminer à en demander. Je demanderai des habits ; des souliers pour mes soldats qu’en manquent ; des armes pour ma cavalerie, qui sera augmentée par beaucoup de jeunesse de Nantes, dès que je pourrai la monter et l’armer ; je demanderai aussi les armes pour l’infanterie ; afin d’armer tous ceux qui veulent me rejoindre. J’ai besoin aussi de vivres pour pouvoir les nourrir ; mais c’est surtout de la poudre qu’il me faut, car j’en manque absolument. J’ai cru devoir rompre la paix apparente que j’avais faite, et publier la proclamation que vous avez vue ; je puis être attaqué d’un jour à l’autre, et je n’ai point de poudre.’

“ ‘Vous en avez donc bien peu Général ?’

“ ‘Je ne puis, Général, encore partir de Nantes, puisque mon vaisseau n’est pas prêt, et que j’ai bien d’autres objets à remplir. Mais il faut, sans tarder, envoyer quelqu'un en Angleterre, comme Milord Grenville vous a demandé.'

"Charette : 'Oh ! si les Anglais m'avaient fait parvenir la moitié de ce qu'ils ont donné à M. de Puisaye et envoyé avec lui à Quiberon, quelle différence ! J'aurais pu passer la Loire pour me porter en Bretagne, où je suis appelé ; et toute la province serait sous les armes ; au lieu que l'expédition de Quiberon ne produira rien de bon ; Je vous le prédis.'"

"Vous avez, Général, des nouvelles de ce qui s'y est passé depuis la descente ?—quant à moi je l'ignore.

"Charette : 'Oui, j'en ai ; il m'est venu 5 à 6 officiers qui étaient à la descente, et qui sont partis de Quiberon 8 jours après qu'elle a été faite ; entre autres M. Bascher et M. Charette de la Colinière que vous avez vus. Lorsqu'on est arrivé, et qu'on a eu fait la descente, le drapeau blanc a été arboré dans tout le canton, et les habitants sont accourus demander des armes, et des munitions. On en a distribué un grand nombre à tout ce qui soit présenté, sans les connaître, sans savoir qu'ils étaient, ni d'où ; sans en tenir d'état, et sans les organiser en aucune manière, en sorte qu'on a peut-être armé des ennemis, et qu'on n'a tiré aucun parti des bons. Croiriez-vous bien, M. le Baron, que M. de Puisaye, au lieu de profiter du premier moment d'enthousiasme, de laisser les troupes avec lesquels il était venu dans la presque île pour garder ses provisions, et de se porter de sa personne dans l'intérieur du pays pour rassembler ce qu'on venait d'armer ainsi que tout ce qui le reconnaît pour chef, et tomber, sans perdre de temps, sur le peu de troupes républicaines qui étaient séparées dans le pays, afin de détruire les unes et d'empêcher les autres de se rassembler et de venir fermer la sortie de Quiberon ; croiriez-vous bien, dis-je, que M. de Puisaye au lieu de cela, est rentrée dans la presque île, disant qu'il ne pouvait s'éloigner des troupes qui étaient destinées à sa garde ! Croiriez-vous bien, encore, que M. de Puisaye, lorsque d'Hervilly a pris le fort Penthièvre, au lieu de se trouver à l'attaque, était loin de là, sur le bord de la mer, à manger tranquillement des huitres. A présent, on ne peut plus sortir de Quiberon, et le zèle des Royalistes de la Bretagne en est bien refroidi.'

"Je ne puis, Général, vous dire que tout ceci est au mieux, mais Milord Moira va venir en Bretagne, et j'espère qu'il réparera tout.'

"Charette : 'Mais Milord Moira, en qui j'ai beaucoup de confiance d'après tout ce qui j'ai appris de lui, trouvera à la côte des troupes ennemies au grand nombre ; au lieu que si M. de Puisaye s'était conduit comme il le devait, ces troupes républicaines auraient été tenues éloignées.'

"Vous avez bien raison, Général, d'avoir la confiance en Milord Moira ; il a celle de tous les Français qui le connaissent ; il est plein d'estime pour vous ; il prend le plus vif intérêt à vos succès ; et, la veille de mon départ de Londres, il m'a spécialement chargé de vous dire que, dès qu'il serait à la côte, vous pourriez lui demander ce dont vous avez besoin, et qu'il vous l'enverrait sur le champs, sans avoir besoin d'attendre des ordres d'Angleterre. Et il m'a ajouté, je ne lui demanderai pas même un port pour y envoyer ce qu'il me demandera ; je me soucierai peu de perdre quelques transports en les faisant échouer, pourvu que M. de Charette reçoive des secours. De plus, Général, je suis certain que pour le bien général, toutes choses à part, vous vous concerterez avec M. de Puisaye.'

"Charette : 'M. de Puisaye ne m'a fait part ni de son projet de descente en Bretagne, ni de ses moyens, ni de son arrivée.'

"Cependant, Général, M. Windham vous a écrit, et il m'a chargé de vous le dire que M. de Puisaye désirait agir de concert avec vous, et que, pendant son séjour en Angleterre, il s'était occupé de vos intérêts comme des siens.'

“ Charette ‘ M. de Puisaye pendant qu’il est demeuré en Angleterre, m’a écrit une seule fois, il y a 4 à 5 mois, pour me mander que si je voulais m’adresser à lui, j’obtiendrais par lui tout ce que je voudrais des Ministres Anglais. Je n’ai pas cru devoir accepter sa protection qu’il m’offrait . . . il m’aurait peut-être beintôt offert de ses faux assignats ! . . . et aucuns moyens fallacieux ne peut convenir à un loyal chevalier Français. Je ne connais que les armes et du courage ! ’

“ ‘ Quoiqu’il en soit, Général, j’espère que, mettant toutes considérations personnelles à l’écart, vous agirez de concert avec M. de Puisaye, puisque le bien du service au Roi l’exige. Je suis, de plus, chargé de vous dire que c’est l’intention du Roi et de Monsieur.’

“ Charette : ‘ Je respecte l’intention de mes maîtres, et je m’y conformerai. Je seconderai M. de Puisaye, mais je ne pourrai jamais accorder ni mon estime ni ma confiance à un homme qui s’est toujours malconduit ; et qui dans la seule occasion où il s’est trouvé, a fait le Jean f—.’

“ ‘ Cependant M. de Puisaye peut être très utile, parceque, d’après ce que j’ai su en Angleterre, et ce qu’on m’a dit à Nantes, il a du crédit sur bien du monde.’

“ Charette : ‘ Oui, sur quelques chefs de Chouans, ou quelques personnes qui tendent à devenir chefs ; mais il n’en a point sur le peuple des campagnes dont il n’est pas connu. Quand on a publié son arrivée en Bretagne, les paysans se disaient les uns aux autres dans leur langage, quel est cet homme, que veut-il faire ? ’

“ ‘ Je crus voir que le Général était fatigué de cette conversation et je changeai de sujet.

“ ‘ Je pense, Général, que vous avez besoin d’officiers.’

“ ‘ Général, vous en aurez tant que vous voudrez. Il y en a en Angleterre un grand nombre de très bons, qui depuis longtemps désirent de vous rejoindre, et qui sont très empressés de servir sous vos ordres. Mais avez-vous de l’artillerie ? ’

“ Charette : ‘ J’ai des canons de campagne, et quelques-uns de 12 ; mais je ne puis en faire usage, parceque je n’ai pas de poudre, ni canoniers pour les servir. Il me faudrait aussi des chevaux et des harnais.’

“ ‘ Quand on a des officiers d’artillerie, on a bientôt formé des canoniers, et surtout avec des matelots.’

“ Charette : ‘ Mais, je n’ai pas du tout d’officiers.’

“ ‘ Il y en a en Angleterre 30 à 35 qui ne sont pas employés ; parmi eux se trouve un Colonel très en état de vous former promptement un corps d’artillerie. C’est M. de Quefville.—Il y a aussi quelques ingénieurs. Tous doivent être prêts à partir à votre première demande, parcequ’avant de quitter Londres, j’ai parlé à M. Windham du bescin que vous deviez en avoir, de la nécessité de les rassembler d’avance, et que ce Ministre a donné l’ordre devant moi pour qu’on fit venir chez lui le lendemain le colonel d’artillerie, et l’ingénieur en chef.’

“ Charette : ‘ Des ingénieurs me seront aussi très utiles.’

“ ‘ Vous en aurez, Général, et comme j’espère vous rejoindre, mon fils et moi vous en serviront. A présent, Général, trouvez bon que nous en venions à un objet bien essentiel. C’est vous que le Roi et Monsieur regardent comme le Général en Chef des armées Royales de la Vendée, et à qui ils veulent formellement en donner le commandement. C’est en conséquence que, chargé de témoigner la satisfaction de sa Majesté et du Prince à Messieurs de Sapineau et Stofflet, je dois me concerter avec vous pour déterminer si je le ferai directement moi-même, ou si je vous prirai de la faire.'

"Charette : 'Je leur ferai part au tout, et cela suffira.'

"Général, je me conformerai à ce que vous me prescrivez, et m'en rapporterai à vous. J'espère, au surplus, que je puis rendre compte que ces Messieurs vous obéissent, et que la plus parfaite intelligence régne entre eux et vous.'

"Charette : 'Je vais vous parler franchement à ce sujet, parce qu'il est nécessaire que vous connaissiez bien l'état des choses à présent. M. de Sapineau est un homme loyal, qui pense bien, et qui veut le bien ; mais, quoique ne manquant pas de capacité, il n'a la force ni de rien faire par lui-même, ni de soutenir ce qu'il a cru devoir résoudre. Il est livré à son entourage, et son entourage ne vaut rien.'

"Stofflet est la bravoure et la loyauté même ; mais né dans une classe obscure, il n'a eu aucune éducation, et n'est capable de rien combiner de lui-même.'

"Lorsque j'ai cru mon honneur engagé à rompre la paix avec la République, parcequ'on m'avait trompé, et que le Roi n'était point rétabli, j'ai communiqué mes raisons et mes résolutions à M. de Sapineau, qui m'assura qu'il ferait comme moi, et ne se séparerait pas de moi. Cependant, aussitôt que ma proclamation a été publique, M. de Sapineau a député à Paris M. de Béjary pour protester au Comité de Salut—Public, qu'il n'était pour rien dans ce que j'avais fait, et qu'il ne demandait qu'à entretenir la paix qui avait été conclue ; il a entraîné Stofflet à adhérer à cette députation. Béjary a fort bien rempli sa mission ; mais on dirait qu'il s'est laissé gagner par les Républicains ; car il m'écrivit que le Comité de Salut—Public est dans la meilleure foi, et dans les meilleurs dispositions, et m'engage à revenir sur ce que j'ai fait. Voici sa lettre. (Je la lus, et en vérité on la croirait dictée par le Comité même). 'Le Général continue, 'Je l'ai lue à mes officiers rassemblés, et leur ai demandé s'il y avait quelqu'un parmi eux qui pensât que je dusse me rendre aux instances de M. de Béjary. Aucun n'a été de cet avis. Je vous avoue que cette communication était de ma part un épreuve pour savoir s'il y avait dans mon armée quelqu'un qui ne pensât pas bien, ou qui n'eût pas la fermeté nécessaire ; si j'en eusse trouvé quelqu'un, je l'eusse chassé aussi-tôt.'

"Comment, Général, Messieurs de Sapineau et Stofflet vous reconnaissent pour Chef, et ils ont pu faire une semblable démarche sans vous ! J'aime à penser qu'ils n'ont voulu que gagner du temps. Mais enfin, ils ne devaient agir que de concert avec vous. Est-ce dont qu'il est à craindre qu'ils se séparent de vous ?'

"Charette : 'Non, ils savent bien qu'ils ne le peuvent pas, parceque leurs armées me sont dévouées, et qu'elles obéiront à ce que je leur ordonnerai. D'ailleurs, je suis sûr que Stofflet fera comme je voudrai, et qu'il commencera la guerre quand je le dirai. Cependant, comme il serait très fâcheux d'en venir à des extrémités avec des gens qui ont assurément très bien mérité, la présence d'un de nos Princes est absolument nécessaire dans cette armée, pour que son autorité fasse un tout des plusieurs parties séparées.'

"J'espère, Général, que vous aurez bientôt Monsieur ; que l'Angleterre se rendra à ses instances réitérées, et qu'elle portera ce Prince à la Vendée. Milord Grenville vous l'annonce dans sa lettre. Mais comment M. de Sapineau a-t-il pu envoyer à Paris M. de Béjary qui passe pour un homme de mérite ? Il me paraît que c'est un homme sacrifié."

"Charette : 'Certainement, c'est un homme perdu. Le Comité de Salut—Public continuera à le caresser, tant qu'il pensera qu'il peut empêcher Sapineau et Stofflet de reprendre les armes ; mais, cependant, le fera surveiller, et s'il veut sortir de Paris, il sera arrêté ; tout comme il le sera au moment où la guerre sera commencée. Mais ce qu'il y a de bien plus extraordinaire, c'est que M. de Scépeaux, que j'avais envoyé il y a longtemps de l'autre côté de la Loire, et qui commandait les Chouans entre Nantes et Angers, s'est rendu lui-même à Paris, au moment qu'il a su la descente des émigrés à Quiberon, pour assurer le Comité de Salut Public qu'il n'était pas d'intelligence avec eux, et qu'il voulait observer la paix qu'il avait faite avec la République ! Il ne sortira jamais de Paris, non plus que Bégary ; mais sa conduite ne fera pas qu'on le plaigne.

“ Ce que vous m'apprenez là, Général, est bien extraordinaire ! Un Chef quitter son armée pour aller se jeter au milieu de ses ennemis ! Il est donc fol ! mais son absence ne nuira-t-elle pas aux affaires ? Qui conduit à présent son armée ? ”

“ Charette : ‘ J'ai envoyé mon oncle, M. de Fleuriot, pour commander dans ce pays-là ; mais, je vous la répète, un Prince est nécessaire ici, absolument nécessaire. ’ ”

“ ‘ Il y a longtemps que j'en suis convaincu, Général, et je le vois plus que jamais, parceque vous me faites l'honneur de me dire. Mais quelles forces ont les Chouans ? ’ ”

“ Charette : ‘ Les Chouans sont tous les habitants de la Bretagne, d'une partie de la Normandie, du Maine, de l'Anjou, et surtout, des bords de la Loire depuis Angers jusqu' à Nantes, et au-dessous. Mais ce n'est pas organisé ; cela ne forme pas un ensemble. Il y en aurait bientôt si nous avions un Prince à notre tête. Tous les ordres partiraient de lui, tout le monde lui obéirait ; tout irait après une même impulsion, et agirait de concert. Combien nos forces ne seraient-elles pas augmentées par là ? Ah ! M. le Baron, faites donc en sorte que Monsieur vienne promptement. ’ ”

“ ‘ Général, je vous le répète, Monsieur, depuis deux ans, brule du désir d'être à la tête des braves Royalistes ; mais il ne peut y venir que quand la cour d'Angleterre, l'intime allié du Roi, jugera à propos de l'y faire transporter. Vous voyez par ce que vous écrit Milord Grenville, qu'elle est déterminée à le faire, dès qu'elle sera assurée que vous avez assez de force pour que la sûreté d'une personne aussi intéressante pour toute l'Europe, ne soit pas compromise en venant parmi vous ; et j'espère, en conséquence, que les Ministres se décideront à passer Monsieur à la Vendée aussitôt après l'arrivée de la personne que vous enverrez à Londres, si le Prince n'est pas déjà parti avec Milord Moira. ’ ”

“ ‘ Général, le Roi connaît votre zèle, et rends à ses braves Vendéens toute la justice qui leur est due. Je ne doute pas qu'il n'ait le désir de rentrer dans son royaume par la partie où son autorité n'a jamais été méconnu, et où la Monarchie Française n'a pas cessé d'exister. Mais je ne sais si les circonstances le permettront à Sa Majesté. D'ailleurs, elle est si loin dans ce moment, qu'elle ne pourrait être dans ce pays-ci qu'au bout d'un assez longtemps ; mais, en attendant, Monsieur qui a toute la confiance du Roi, et qui en a reçu tout pouvoir, le remplacera. ’ ”

“ Charette : ‘ Que ce soit donc bientôt ! Mais en attendant, de la poudre mon cher ami, ou à moins, de salpêtre. ’ ”

“ ‘ Vous avez donc, Général, des moulins à poudre ? ’ ”

“ Charette : ‘ Oui, j’ai les moyens d’en faire, j’ai du soufre. ’ ”

“ On vint avertir le Général, que l’on avait servi le dîner. Il me fit dîner avec M. de la Roberie et 27 de ses officiers. Pendant tout le repas, qui n’annonçait rien moins que la disette, la conversation fut gaie, franche et ouverte. On m’y exprimait souvent le désir de combattre l’ennemi, et de voir le Roi et les Princes de son sang. On me fit sur ces augustes personnes, et en particulier sur Monsieur, beaucoup de questions, aux quelles je répondis comme je le devais, en me livrant à l’impulsion de mon cœur.

“ Sur la fin du dîner, on annonçait que neuf canoniers du château de Nantes venaient d’arriver pour servir dans son armée, et qu’ils avaient été précédés par cinq autres. Arriva aussi un jeune gentilhomme de Nantes. Le Général lui ordonna de se pourvoir d’un cheval et d’armes. Un officier présent dit qu’il lui donnerait un sabre et des pistolets, et qu’il lui ferait trouver un cheval. Je remarquai dans la conversation que plusieurs chefs de divisions annonçaient des projets, d’une manière qui me persuada qu’ils n’attendent pas toujours l’ordre du Général pour entreprendre ce qu’ils jugent à propos. Cela me déplut, et m’engagea à parler généralement, mais avec force, de la nécessité que rien ne se fasse dans une armée que d’après le Chef. Je suis assuré d’après ce que m’a dit ce Général, et d’après ce que j’ai vu, que l’on obéit exactement lorsqu’il commande ou qu’il défend ; mais je crois que la position où il se trouve, l’empêche d’ordonner ou de défendre toujours ce qu’il croirait pour le mieux. Après le dîner, j’engageai le Général à venir au cabinet du jardin, et lui observai qu’il n’y avait pas un instant à perdre pour envoyer ses réponses à Londres. Et que puisque je ne pouvais pas encore répartir et emmener son envoyé, il fallait faire partir sur les champs, pour l’Angleterre ; le Général me répondit.

“ ‘ Général, j’y ai pensé en vous attendant. J’ai appris que vous aviez dans votre cavalerie des fils de pêcheurs de Pimbœuf, et que leurs pères sont des gens très sûrs. Votre envoyé ira chez l’un d’eux, qui demandera une permission pour aller pêcher à l’embouchure de la Loire, et de prendre deux matelots. L’envoyé sera un de ses matelots. La barque qui les portera, sortie de la rivière, longera la côte sur le soir, et se rendra dans la baie de Quiberon, où [est] le commodore Warren, à qui votre envoyé portera une lettre de votre part, et la demande de le faire conduire tout de suite en Angleterre par un avis. Je connais assez le zèle du Commodore pour être sûr qu’il le fera, sans perdre de temps, et que par ce moyen vos dépêches arriveront promptement. Demandez, Général, à M. de la Roberie quels sont les hommes en question ; c’est avec lui que j’ai arrangé tout cela. M. de la Roberie appelé, dit que la chose était possible, et même facile. Il nomma les hommes, et en répondit. D’après cela, le Général résolut de faire partir le lendemain, et que ce serait son cousin M. Charette de la Colinière qu’il enverrait. Je pris la liberté de lui observer que Milord Grenville demandait quelqu’un très instruit de l’état de la Vendée. Il me répondit que quoique son cousin ne fut auprès de lui que depuis dix à douze jours, il était très au fait de tout, et qu’il aurait avec lui un entretien dans lequel il lui dirait tout ce que serait nécessaire. ’ ”

“ Ensuite, le Général me dit.

“ Charette : ‘ Qu’est-ce donc qu’il faut que je remette à mon cousin pour porter à Londres ? ’ ”

“ ‘Mais Général, il me semble qu’il faut que vous répondiez aux lettres qui je vous ai portées.’

“ Charette : ‘Faisant partir demain matin, je n’ai pas le temps de répondre à toutes. Vous présenterez mon hommage à Monsieur, vous lui rendrez compte de mes sentiments, et de ma position, d’après ce que je vous ai dit. Je répondrai à M. le Duc d’Harcourt et à M. le Comte de Serens par une autre voie ; mais qu’est-ce qu’il faut que j’écrive aux deux Ministres ?’

“ ‘Général je ne crois pas à-propos que je les fasse. Si je les fais, on le connaîtra sûrement, et les Ministres pourront croire que je vous ai engagé à présenter mes idées qu’ils connaissent, au lieu des vôtres. Votre style militaire fera un beaucoup meilleur effet.’

“ Charette : ‘Eh bien ! dites au moins à mon secrétaire ce qu’il faut qu’il écrive.’

“ Le secrétaire appelé, je lui dis très en détail ce que je crus qu’il devait écrire. M. Charette de la Colinière vint, quand il fut prévenu de sa mission. Je lui dis aussi devant le Général ce qui je pensais de la conduite qu’il devait tenir. Il nous quitta, et je repris ma conversation avec le Général.’

“ Vous avez traité, Général, avec des membres de la Convention, ce qui me fait croire que vous devez avoir des intelligences avec quelqu’un d’entr’eux, et avec quelques autres personnes à Paris. Si vous en avez, je vous prie de m’en faire part, et de me les donner, en vous déclarant qu’il est très utile, et même nécessaire que vous me les donniez.’

“ Charette : ‘Je n’ai point eu de rapports avec d’autres personnes de Paris que les membres de la Convention qui sont venus dans ce pays-ci m’offrir la paix, et traiter avec moi. Ce sont Ruelle, Gaudin, et les autres ; mais depuis que j’ai vu qu’ils m’avaient trompé, et qu’ils ne tenaient pas ce qu’ils m’avaient promis, je n’ai plus voulu avoir de relations avec eux. Il faut, à-propos de ces gens-là, que vous sachiez que quoique je fusse en quelque sorte forcé de faire la paix, puisque je n’avais plus de poudre, et que mes soldats manquaient de tout, je ne m’y serais jamais prêté, si Ruelle et Canclaux ne m’avaient assuré qu’ils voulaient rétablir le Roi, et que je faciliterais ce rétablissement en m’entendant avec eux, et me prêtant à une paix, qui faciliterait l’exécution de leurs vues, les quelles n’étaient pas différentes des miennes. Ils m’ont trompé, et lorsque je l’ai vu, je n’ai plus pu supporter l’idée que mes Princes et l’Europe entière pouvaient avoir de moi, en me voyant en quelque manière reconnaître la République. J’ai fait ma proclamation pour détromper tout le monde sur mon compte.’

Républicains viennent m'attaquer chez moi, parcequ'ils savent bien qu'ils n'y viendraient pas impunément. Cependant procurez moi de la poudre.

“ J'ai en l'honneur de vous promettre, Général, que dès que je serais à Nantes, je m'en occuperais, et vous pouvez compter sur mon zèle pour tout ce qui vous intéresse. Mais avant de vous quitter, je dois vous dire que Monsieur m'a chargé de faire savoir en France que l'intention du Roi était bien plus de pardonner que de punir, et que tous ceux de ses sujets qui reconnaîtraient leurs erreurs, et qui rentreraient dans leur devoir, il les recevrait comme un père reçoit ses enfants égarés, et empêcherait qu'il ne leur fut fait aucun mal. Il est facile de conclure de cette disposition de sa Majesté que, pour se conformer à ses intentions, il faut éviter, en faisant la guerre, de répandre le sang lorsqu'il n'est pas absolument nécessaire d'en répandre ; ne pas refuser quartier aux prisonniers qui se rendent ; et surtout, empêcher les vengeances particulières, et les assassinats qui ne sont pas dignes de la cause que nous défendons, et qui la déshonorent.”

“ Charette : ‘ À St. Jean de Mont, et depuis St. Gilles jusqu'aux Sables d'Olonne. J'ai porté six mille hommes vers cette côte, et je les y tiendrai constamment. Je vais le mander, et vous pouvez l'assurer.’ ”

“ Si vous aviez St. Gilles même, Général, ce serait bien plus commode pour venir à vous à cause du petit port qu'y forme la rivière de Vic.”

“ Charette : ‘ Quand j'aurai reçu de la poudre, je serai bientôt maître de St. Gilles, et de toute la côte.’ ”

“ Le secrétaire apporta les deux lettres qu'il avait écrites à Milord Grenville et à M. Windham. Je les lus, et j'avoue que je les trouvai fort différentes de ce que j'avais dit, et qu'elles me parurent insuffisantes. Je voulus engager le secrétaire à les refaire, mais il me dit qu'il n'y avait pas assez de temps. Je n'insistai plus, et me contentai d'engager à donner à M. Charette de la Colinière une instruction bien claire, et qui put le mettre à même de satisfaire les ministres surtout ce qu'ils lui demandaient. Le Général eut la bonté de me presser de rester pour causer encore avec lui ; mais je lui représentai la nécessité de mon retour à Nantes pour qu'on ne s'aperçût pas de mon absence, et le priai de me laisser partir. Il me fit donner des chevaux et trois cavaliers pour me conduire. Après avoir pris congé de lui, je montai sur des chevaux de Brigands, qui me conduisirent à Ruzé en trois heures, quoique les quatre lieux qu'on y compte, en vailent plus de six. J'éprouvai que ces chevaux ne se sont arrêtés ni par les haies, ni par les fossés.

“J'arrivai chez Madame Bascher d'où j'étais parti. Je ne pus rentrer ce soir-là, parceque je ne pus faire avertir mon batelier, et qu'un pêcheur que je fis demander ne se trouva pas chez lui. Le lendemain 24, je fus mené à la pointe du jour chez un meunier, bon Royaliste, qui se chargeait de me faire rentrer à Nantes en me menant avec lui comme son garçon. Il m'habilla en conséquence, mais, en suite, ayant réfléchi que tous les meuniers qui entraient par le pont Rousseau étaient connus du consigne, il craignit qu'on connût que je n'étais pas du nombre, et qu'on m'arrêta, et il me pria d'attendre au soir. Je passai la journée chez lui, où il me traitait de son mieux. Quand il fut nuit, on me conduisit chez un pêcheur, qui me prit dans son bateau, me remonta la rivière en évitant les vaisseaux armés, et me déposa sur les quais au milieu de la ville à 11 heures du soir. Après avoir été tranquiliser Mademoiselle de Charette sur mon voyage, je me rendis chez moi avec la crainte que mon absence n'eût causé quelques suspicions; mais le Comte de Butler, avec sa présence d'esprit et son adresse ordinaire, avait trouvé des prétextes pour la couvrir aux yeux de notre hôte très républicain, et empêcher qu'elle ne fut connue de nos commissionnaires, que leur zèle avait porté à vouloir me voir plusieurs fois.

“J'observerai que, dans mon voyage, j'ai offert de l'argent à toutes les personnes que j'ai employées, et qu'aucune n'a voulu en accepter. Tous m'ont dit que je servais la cause du Roi, qu'elles remplissaient leur devoir en me secondant, et qu'elles seraient bien fâchées de recevoir de l'argent pour cela. Je m'occupai dès le lendemain 25, ainsi que le 26, à réaliser les lettres de crédit que j'avais sur la maison Babu, et à faire chercher de la poudre pour le Général Charette. Je trouvai quelques centaines de livres de poudre; mais je ne pus me procurer aucuns fonds sur mes lettres de crédit. La maison Babu, lorsque je les lui présentai, me répondit; nous n'avons plus de commerce, nous n'avons plus de crédit au dehors, et, par conséquent, nous n'avons pas de payements à y faire. Nous n'avons donc pas besoin de fonds chez l'étranger. D'ailleurs, quand nous voudrions vous faire dix mille livres sterling, en numéraire, la chose nous serait impossible. Ce fut aussi à-peu-près la même réponse que je reçus de toutes les personnes auxquelles je m'adressai pour le même objet, et je me suis adressé à tous les négociants, ou capitalistes de Nantes aux-quels on supposait du numéraire.

“Le 27 au matin, après avoir réfléchi et délibéré avec le Comte de Butler, je crus qu'il était à propos qu'au lieu de penser à rien faire d'ultérieur, et d'aller à Paris, je me rendisse en Angleterre. Mon opinion fut déterminée en considérant :—

1. “La malheureuse affaire de Quiberon du 21 dont je venais d'avoir connaissance. Les suites qu'elle pouvait avoir, et les nouvelles mesures qu'elle devait forcer de prendre.

2. “La position de M. Charette, et le besoin urgent de secours, dans lequel il se trouvait.

3. “La crainte que l'envoyé de ce Général eut rencontré quelque obstacle qui l'eût empêché d'arriver en Angleterre.

4. “L'espérance que le rapport de ce que j'avais vu et observé, pourrait déterminer le Ministère Anglais à prendre un parti utile, et même nécessaire dans la circonstance.

5. "La nécessité de faire connaître sans délai à Monsieur le véritable état des choses en France, le parti qu'on en pouvait tirer en ne perdant pas de temps, afin que ce Prince fut à même agir, ou faire agir, comme il le croirait à propos.

6. "La difficulté de sortir de Nantes et de me rendre à Paris, les Chouans ne laissant aucune route libre, et arrêtant, ou tuant, tout ce qu'ils rencontrent de voyageurs; en faisant usage des moyens que j'avais de passer parmi eux, j'étais sûr de devenir suspect, parcequ'ils n'accordent cette liberté à personne.

7. "La persuasion qu'il n'y avait rien d'utile à faire à Paris en ce moment, où les meneurs se voyant avoir des avantages de tous côtés, seraient moins affecté de craintes personnelles, et par conséquent, peu disposés à se prêter à mes vues.

8. "Et enfin, la nécessité d'employer tout ce que j'avais d'argent à acheter de la poudre pour le Général Charette, puisque je ne pouvais pas tirer parti de mes lettres de crédit, ce qui m'était tout moyen ultérieur de voyager.

"J'espérai donc que le Roi et Monsieur approuveraient mon retour en Angleterre, lorsque je leur aurais rendu compte des raisons qui m'avaient déterminé.

"J'écrivis à M. de Charette la lettre ci-jointe No. I, et Souriceau partit le soir-même pour la lui porter. Le même jour 27, nous dinâmes, le Comte de Butler et moi, chez un officier municipal. A force de vanter la beauté de l'aspect des campagnes qu'environnent Nantes, nous le portâmes à nous donner une permission pour entrer et sortir librement par toutes les portes, et cela pendant dix jours. C'est une faveur et une marque de confiance qui n'est accordée à aucun habitant. Nous profitâmes de cette permission dès le soir-même pour reconnaître les fortifications de la ville, et nous examinâmes très exactement celles qui sont depuis le Cours jusques aux Capucins, situés au bas de la ville, sur le bord de la Loire. Le 29, je sortis sur le soir avec le Comte de Butler pour examiner les fortifications qu'on a faites sur la route de Paris. On nous avait bien recommandé de ne pas nous éloigner, si nous ne voulions pas être pris par les Chouans; mais nous ne les croyons pas aux portes de la ville.

"A une portée de fusil de celle de Paris, pendant que nous regardions attentivement le terrain et observions comment on pourrait attaquer Nantes de ce côté, cinq hommes qui étaient couchés dans le grand chemin, se levèrent, montrèrent des armes, et nous demandèrent où nous allions. Nous leur dîmes que nous nous promenions, et que nous allions rentrer dans la ville. Alors ils nous assurèrent que ce ne serait pas de ce jour, ni peut-être de longtemps. Il ajoutèrent qu'ils étaient des Chouans, et qu'il fallait venir parler à leur capitaine. Nous leur observâmes, qu'étants étrangers, nous n'avions rien à de mêler dans les querelles des Français. Notre qualité d'étranger les fit persister dans la résolution de nous emmener, parceque, disaient-ils, nous fournissions des vivres à leur ennemi. Il fallu donc les suivre. Après quelques centaines de pas, ils nous firent quitter la grande route pour nous mener par des bois. Comme il est très certain que, parmi les Chouans, il en est beaucoup qui pour avoir la dépouille des gens qu'ils prennent, les fusillent sans les conduire à leurs chefs, nous jugeâmes devoir nous faire connaître, et leur dire qui nous étions, d'où nous venions, et ce que nous faisions; en leur observant que si nous ne rentrions pas dans Nantes le soir même, notre absence pouvait faire le plus grand tort aux affaires du Roi, et à eux-mêmes. Ils nous répondirent que cela pouvait être très vrai, et qu'alors nous serions amis; mais que leur capitaine en jugerait; et, qu'au reste, il ne nous serait fait aucun mal. En marchant nous nous familiarisâmes, et nous étions assez bien ensemble. Lorsque nous arrivâmes, après avoir fait une lieue, à une maison de paysan, où nous devions trouver le Capitaine Chouan ; mais il n'y était pas venu, et avait fait dire qu'il ne viendrait pas. Alors nouvelle instance de notre part pour qu'on nous laisse rentrer dans la ville, et grand embarras de la part de nos Chouans ; les uns voulaient nous mettre en liberté, les autres nous garder, et quelques-uns nous mener à sept lieues de là où était leur quartier-général. Enfin ils se réunirent à la résolution de nous mener à une demie-lieue plus loin, chez quelqu'un en qui ils ont confiance, et qui déciderait de ce qu'il y avait à faire ; mais auparavant de partir, nos arrêteurs voulurent nous faire boire avec eux. Ils firent porter du vin, et nous bûmes tous à la santé du Roi, de Monseigneur Comte d'Artois, et des Royalistes. Nous voulûmes alors leur faire accepter quelques louis d'or, mais ils les refusèrent. Cependant, sur les instances du Comte de Butler, un d'eux reçut un louis, et les autres allaient peut-être en faire autant, lorsque des femmes qui étaient présentes, s'écrièrent que si nous étions des honnêtes gens et Royalistes, on devait nous rendre service sans nous faire payer ; que c'était infâme de recevoir notre argent, et qu'il fallait le rendre. Dès lors, nous ne pûmes en faire accepter ; et nous eumes beaucoup de peine à faire garder le louis reçu, encore ne fut-ce qu'en disant de l'employer pour acheter de la poudre.

« Enfin, en exécution de l'arrêté du conseil, nous fûmes conduits chez M. Le Mane, homme bien né, et très bien pensant. Quoique nous n'eussions sur nous rien pour nous faire reconnaître, comme j'étais en rapport à Nantes avec quelques amis et parents de M. le Mane, en lui racontant plusieurs particularités, je lui eus bientôt inspiré de la confiance. Il assura donc nos Chouans, dont la troupe s'était grossie chez lui, que nous étions des Royalistes venus en France pour leur préparer des secours, et qu'il était important qu'ils nous fissent rentrer tout de suite à Nantes. Ils résolurent donc, en buvant encore à la santé du Roi, de nous faire conduire, et même escorter, parceque, dirent-ils, nous pourrions tomber entre les mains de quelques-uns d'entre eux qui nous feraient peut-être une mauvais parti. Du moment que nous fûmes reconnus, les Chouans nous témoignèrent beaucoup de la confiance, et ils nous auraient obéi en tout ce que nous aurions voulu. Ils nous témoignèrent le plus grand désir du rétablissement du Roi, et d'avoir un Prince de son sang à leur tête. Nous partîmes avec 4 hommes, que nous fîmes beaucoup causer en chemin, et dont nous tirâmes quelques renseignements. Nous remarquâmes avec plaisir que lorsqu'ils entendaient quelqu'un, et qu'ils criaient qui vive, on répondait sans hésiter 'Royaliste,' même dans les endroits où l'on pouvait rencontrer des patrouilles républicaines. Nos conducteurs nous firent aboutir chez un blanchisseur qui loge sur le bord d'une petite rivière à 150 toises du poste de la porte de Paris. Ils lui demandèrent de nous prendre dans son bateau et de nous entrer dans la ville ; mais il s'y refusa, parcequ'il lui aurait fallu passer le long d'une chaloupe canonnière et du porte. Il nous donna un lit, et le lendemain 30, il nous passa la rivière un peu loin, et nous indicat des chemins détournés par lesquels nous rentrâmes à Nantes sans difficulté.

« Nos hôtes avaient été fort étonnés et inquiets de nous voir absenter une nuit, sans les avoir avertir. Mais nous leur fîmes un conte tel que nous voulûmes, et ils nous en crurent.

« Le 31, je reçus la réponse du Général Charette : et comme elle ne remplissait pas mon objet, je me déterminai à lui récrire. Le 1 d'Août, je fis partir Souriceau pour lui porter ma lettre No. 2. Le même jour

1 Août, je parvins à trouver M. le Comte de Bruc d'Ivignac; et je le vis ainsi que Madame de Bruc, chez Madame la Comtesse de Kerambar. M. le Comte de Bruc est un veillard qui a la moitié du visage rongé par un cancer, qui le fait cruellement souffrir; mais si son corps est affaibli, son âme a conservé toute sa force. Il est très religieux, extrêmement zélé pour le service du Roi. Il m'assura qu'il ferait pour l'objet dont j'étais chargé tout ce qui dépendrait de lui, et que pour ce qu'il ne pouvait pas faire lui-même, à raison de son état, il me donnerait un homme en qui je pouvais prendre toute confiance.

"Madame de Bruc est une femme très courageuse, et dont le zèle égale celui de son mari. Elle a été longtemps en prison, et n'en a pas été intimidée pour la suite. Elle a depuis assisté tous les prisonniers suspects, et en a fait sauver plusieurs. Elle avait, dans les derniers jours de mon séjour à Nantes, pris des moyens pour faire sauver M. de Belle-vue, un chef des Chouans mis en arrestation en même temps que M. Cormatin et les autres ont été arrêtés à Rennes, mais au moment de l'exécution, M. de Belle-vue s'est refusé à sortir de prison, et a préféré, je ne sais pas pourquoi, d'être jugé; comme il l'a annoncé dans une lettre que j'ai lue, adressée à Madame de Bruc. Cette dame m'a rendu tous les services qu'elle a pu. Elle a un fils de dix-huit ans, qui est avec les Chouans, aide-de-camp de M. le Veneur. J'ai promis à la mère, sur sa demande, de demander les bontés de Monsieur pour le jeune homme.

"Le soir du même jour, je trouvai chez M. de Comte de Bruc l'homme de confiance qu'il m'avait promis. C'est un fermier à son aise, nommé Buron, qui s'est retiré à Nantes. J'ai vu en lui un loyal homme, entièrement dévoué au Roi, et aux honnêtes gens, zélé, courageux, et sous un extérieur froid, très actif et capable. Depuis que je l'ai connu, jusqu'à mon départ, il s'est donné beaucoup de peine pour me faire placer mes lettres de crédit, et pour trouver de la poudre; mais il n'a pas été plus heureux que moi dans le premier objet. Voyant qu'il y avait impossibilité de me faire avoir des fonds, il m'a donné 200 marcs d'argenterie, sur ma parole d'en compter la value en Angleterre à un émigré de ses amis. Aussitôt que j'eus cette argenterie, je la remis, avec les 400 louis que j'avais porté de Londrès, à Mademoiselle de Charette sur son reçu, pour qu'elle fit payer la poudre achetée, mais nous n'en avons eu que bien peu, car comme c'est celle de la République qu'on nous a vendue, et que ceux qui la vendent s'exposent beaucoup, ils le font payer très cher; 8" la livre, en argent.

"Buron m'a dit qu'il devait toucher de l'argent peu de jours après mon départ, et m'a promis de le faire passer tout au Général Charette, ou de l'employer suivant ses ordres. Il m'a assuré aussi qu'il se procurerait six mille livres de poudre dès l'arrivée d'une personne qu'il attendait tous les jours à Nantes. Je l'ai abouché avec Souriceau, afin qu'ils prennent de concert les moyens et d'acheter des poudres, et de les faire tenir au Général. Ces deux hommes précieux sont fait pour travailler ensemble, et s'entendent parfaitement, parcequ'ils sont, tous les deux, pleins d'honneur, et du même zèle pour le service du Roi.

"J'autorisai Buron à tirer sur moi à Londrès des lettres de changes pour toutes les sommes qu'il fournirait au Général Charette, ou pour lui; et je promis de les acquitter, espérant que les Ministres de sa Majesté Britannique, d'après les intentions qu'ils m'ont manifestées lors de mon départ, voudront bien me mettre à même de remplir mes engagements à cet égard.

"Le 3, Madame la Comtesse de Bruc m'apprit que Le Veneur était l'agent-général des Généraux Sapineau et Stofflet, ainsi que de tous les chefs des Chouans, pour la correspondance; qu'il était à l'instant dans un château à 4 lieues de Nantes, où elle correspondait avec lui, et où elle devait dans peu de jours, envoyer un cheval à son fils. Cette dame en me parlant de la manière dont étaient les chefs entr'eux, m'engageait à écrire à M. Le Veneur. Je trouvai les raisons qu'elle m'en donna déterminantes ; j'écrivis sur le champ la lettre No. 3, et elle se chargea de la faire parvenir le 7.

“ Le 5 au soir, je reçus la réponse du Général Charette, et un pouvoir d'agir en son nom ; l'un et l'autre datés du 4.

“ Il est si nécessaire pour l'intérêt du Roi que Monsieur s'ait parfaitement instruit de tout ce qui peut influer sur ses déterminations, que je crois devoir tout dire sur les hommes comme sur les choses ; et c'est ce qui m'engage à placer ici ce que j'ai observé du Général Charette. M. de Charette est un jeune homme de 35 ans ou environ, d'une figure agréable, d'un maintien aisé et très décent. C'est l'honneur, la loyauté et la bravoure personnifiées. C'est vraiment un preux. Je ne lui ai pas aperçu beaucoup de connaissances acquises, et il ne m'a pas paru très propre à embrasser les détails des grandes affaires. Il parle de la guerre même plus en partisan qu'en Général. Cependant comme avec très peu de moyens, il a fait de grandes choses, des choses vraiment étonnantes ; qu'il a su se faire obéir, aimer, et craindre ; qu'il a su organiser et, en quelque façon, discipliner une armée qu'il ne pouvait payer, et qu'il a acquit la confiance tant de cette armée, que des habitants des provinces voisines, qui le regardent comme invincible, il a certainement de grands talents, et peut être infiniment utile. Cependant, comme il n'a pas commandé d'armée régulière, et qu'une grande partie de ses succès peut être due à la connaissance parfaite que lui et ses officiers ont du local où s'est fait la guerre, il peut devenir nécessaire qu'il soit aidé dans bien des circonstances. Pour y parvenir sans inconvénient, il est à propos de lui donner quelques personnes qui aux connaissances nécessaires joignent assez de liant et d'adresse, pour le diriger sans qu'il s'en aperçoive, ensorte qu'il croye n'agir que d'après ses propres idées, lorsqu'il n'agira le plus souvent que d'après celles d'autrui. J'ai vu au travers de la modestie qu'il montre, qu'il sentait le prix de ce qu'il a fait, et le compte qu'on doit lui en tenir ; j'ai vu qu'il verrait avec peine, et supporterait difficilement, qu'on lui donna quelque supérieur autre qu'un Prince, et que même on prétendit le diriger.

“ Lorsque j'ai vu ce Général, je n'ai distingué que M.M. de la Roberie, deux frères de l'infortuné jeune homme qui a péri au printemps dernier en retournant à la Vendée. L'un de ces Messieurs est commandant de toute la cavalerie, et l'autre est chef de division. Il m'a paru que le Général avait beaucoup de confiance en eux, et que les soldats en font le plus grand cas.

“ Ayant fini le 5, tout [ce] qu'il m'importait de finir à Nantes, j'en partis le 6, à dix heures du soir, dans un bateau pour aller rejoindre mon sloop que j'avais fait descendre à quatre lieues au dessous pour n'être pas retardé. Avant de partir, je fus présenter mes hommages à Mademoiselle de Charette, et je remis 10 louis à Souriceau pour le dédommager du temps que je lui avais pris, et des dépenses qu'il avait faites, tant pour des voyages que je lui avait fait faire, que pour le chirurgien qu'il était obligé d'employer, parceque ses courses brusques à cheval l'avaient grièvement blessé.

“ En prenant congé du Comte de Bruc, le respectable viellard me dit, les larmes aux yeux, je ne désire de vivre qu'assez de temps pour voir le Roi rétabli sur son trône ; présentez, mon cher Baron, à Monsieur, mon profond respect, ma fidélité, et mon dévouement. Je le lui promis, mais j'eus bien de la peine à m'exprimer, tant j'étais émue. Il était temps que nous quittions la ville, car il y avait peut-être plus de 100 personnes qui savaient qui nous étions, et pourquoi nous étions venus. M. de Charette m'avait fait dîner avec un grand nombre de ses officiers qui ont leurs parents et leurs amis à Nantes, et y avait mandé ma venue, mon nom, et le sujet de mon voyage. Les Chouans qui nous avaient pris, et à qui il avait fallu nous faire connaître, en avaient fait part à leurs amis, et ceux-ci à d'autres. Je partis de Nantes avec la plus vive impatience d'arriver promptement en Angleterre, où j'espérais trouver Monsieur ; mais il n'a pas plu à la Providence d'accomplir mes désirs. J'ai constamment eu des calmes et des vents contraires ; en sorte qu'il m'a fallu vingt jours pour faire une traversée qui en du ne durer que quatre ou cinq.”

FRANCIS DRAKE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Secret and Confidential.

1795, August 28, Genoa.—“ It was with no small degree of mortification that I gave your Lordship in my last despatch, No. 19, so unfavourable a statement of the situation of affairs in this country, and I regret that I must again repeat that, from the best combination of circumstances which I have been enabled to form, it appears to me but too evident that no further progress will be made by the Austrian army in the Riviera of Genoa during this campaign. General De Vins himself told me in one of his late letters que la position que l'ennemi a prise sur les montagnes du Cap de St. Spirito est presque inattaquable ; je dis presque, car si je pouvois espérer qu'en le chassant d'ici la besogne sera faite, j'y réussirai encore ; mais en le chassant de la position présente, je ne gagnerois autre chose que de leur voir prendre une autre sur les montagnes derrière Albenga, tout aussi forte que la présente ; et pour arriver jusqu'à la Comté de Nice, ils auront encore trois ou quatre positions l'une plus forte que l'autre. Il faut donc faire quelques autres combinaisons, et attendre quelque chose des événemens. This letter, which I quote in the General's own words, could not but give rise to suspicions that there was not at least that degree of activity in the Austrian operations which might be wished, and those suspicions have been since corroborated by what I saw and heard during my late residence at Vado.

“ In my conferences with the General, I frequently took occasion to express my regret that an army of at least forty thousand men, including Austrians and Piedmontese, should have gained so little on an enemy of certainly not more than half that number, weakened by desertion and sickness, disgusted by the want of a sufficiency of provisions and clothing, and dispirited by their first defeat. To these observations the constant answer was that the positions which the enemy had taken on the mountains were so strong as to render the superiority of numbers of little avail ; that the only point where they were attackable was on his right on the side of Ormea, for until Ormea fell, he could not advance without exposing his right flank ; that he had frequently sent orders to Monsieur de Colli, who commands in that district, to attack, but these orders were never obeyed.

“ On this language of the General I have the honour to observe to your Lordship that, in admitting the General's assertion with respect to Ormea to be just, as it undoubtedly is, the question naturally arises, why the General has continued Monsieur de Colli in the command, after such a refusal of obedience to the orders of his superior officer. For your Lordship has already been informed that the King of Sardinia has placed Monsieur de Colli entirely under General De Vins's command. When I touched upon this to the General he endeavoured to explain it away by asserting that he would long since have removed Monsieur de Colli if he could have found a proper person to replace him. I confess that this explanation itself convinces me that the whole is nothing less than a pretext for the General's inactivity, for it is absurd to suppose that the whole Austrian army does not furnish one single General capable (not of forming a plan of operation for himself, but) of executing a plan traced out to him by General De Vins. I must also add that, as the taking of Ormea is of such great importance, there is no reason whatever why General De Vins should not have directed that operation in person, since his presence is not certainly more necessary at Vado than at any other point of his line.

"I beg to be understood that I do not mean to throw any share of this blame on General De Vins. I am fully persuaded that that officer's natural disposition, his inordinate ambition, his great love of military fame, and his desire to distinguish himself, would lead him to active operations; and I believe that he only follows the line of conduct which has been traced out for him by the Cabinet of Vienna; and the general principle of this line of conduct is, I believe, not to risk on any account the loss of men. I have been informed that Monsieur Thugut asserts that the General has carte blanche to act as he pleases; but though this information comes from very good authority, I think it my duty to state to your Lordship my firm belief that this is not the case, and that the General acts purely in obedience to the orders which he, from time to time, receives from Vienna. I wish to be as explicit and as clear as possible in what I now assert, for reasons which I have already mentioned to Mr. Wickham, and which doubtless, ere this, will have come under your Lordship's eye. It has been too long the system to bandy us backward and forward from the Austrian General to the Court of Vienna, and from the Court of Vienna to the Austrian General; and it ought therefore clearly to be understood that the Court of Vienna alone is and must be accountable for the inactivity of its Generals, and that it is there and from thence only that we are to require and look for a better system.

"I have already had the honour to state to your Lordship my fears that the Court of Vienna does not consider the re-conquest of Nice for the King of Sardinia as an object of sufficient importance for it to risk the weakening of its army, and, therefore, is not inclined to make any efforts on this side further than such as will tend to secure the Milanese. As this latter object is now attained, I am apprehensive that the Austrian army in this country will remain in its present situation during the remainder of the campaign. Monsieur Thugut, indeed, holds a different language at Vienna, and says, with a certain degree of assurance, that the Austrian army will be soon at Nice. Upon this point it may not be amiss to mention to your Lordship that Monsieur Thugut held out assurances, of the nature I have just alluded to, to the Sardinian minister at Vienna, at the very time that he wrote a letter to General De Vins to express a hope that the General would be able to maintain his present position during the ensuing winter. The first of these two circumstances I learnt from the Marquis de Marsan, a Piedmontese officer in the confidence of the King of Sardinia; and the latter from General De Vins himself. Your Lordship will be best enabled to judge if the conclusion to be drawn from the comparison of them anyways impeaches the good faith of Monsieur Thugut.

"As I did not wish to leave any means untried of prevailing on General De Vins to advance, I thought it necessary to impart to him in confidence the substance of the instructions which I had given to the emissaries whom I have sent into Provence; and I did not fail to place in the most conspicuous light the advantages which might be drawn from a proper concert and co-operation between the Austrian army and these persons. The General, however, treated the plan with a sort of ridicule, asserting that no dependence whatever could be placed on the well-disposed persons in the interior of France, and, consequently, that all plans of operation framed on such a basis must fail of success. I observed to him that the plan in question did not deserve to be treated lightly, because, taking it at the worst, it could not produce any bad consequences, and it might produce many good ones. There was no necessity to place an implicit reliance on any eventual active measures of those well-disposed persons in Provence, nor did I myself ever entertain any hope that the Provençals could be brought to break with the Convention until they saw the means of doing it securely under the influence of an Austrian army on the Var; but, if by their machinations any impediments could be thrown in the way of the Convention, either by preventing the levy of the requisitions of men or grain, or by disorganising the Conventional troops, one great point would be gained; and this point I had reason to hope from the abilities and talents of the persons I had employed, might be effected. This language, however, drew nothing from the general further than a sort of assurance that he might possibly endeavour to form a second Vendée in Provence by disembarking on the coasts of that country a certain Monsieur Bonnot and a company of French emigrants. I do not know this Monsieur Bonnot, but I understand that he is a man of abilities, and that his company, which consists of about 200 men, are very warmly attached to him. Should the general carry this idea into execution, I can foresee no other effect from this partial and isolated scheme than the destruction of Monsieur Bonnot and his corps, and a subsequent dejection of all the well-disposed party in Provence.

"The next means of attack which I adverted to in my conversations with the General was that of landing in the rear of the French army, whilst simultaneous attacks were made on every other point of the enemy's position. I stated to the General the great importance and advantage of contracting his front by advancing towards Ventimiglia; and I assured him that I was authorised by Admiral Hotham to declare that no interruption should be given by the Toulon fleet to any debarkation he might choose to make; and I was convinced that Captain Nelson, with the Agamemnon and the ten ships under his command, would give him every assistance in this operation. As I firmly believe that this is now the only plan which the general can be brought to accede to, I urged him to the adoption of it by every argument which the subject suggested to me. The general appeared but very lukewarm. I pressed it, however, with all the force I could, stating to him at the same time that a speedy decision was necessary, as, after the month of September, the season for executing the maritime part of the plan would be at an end. The general at length promised that he would give the plan a due consideration, that he would set out that evening to examine the situation of the enemy's line, and that, upon his return, he would concert with Captain Nelson the necessary measures for the execution of it, if he should think it practicable. These assurances were given in so cold a manner that I do not place much reliance upon them ; and it is very possible that, if any plan of operations should be the result of the general's journey, it will be such a one as will be wholly inexecutable, and formed purposely with a view to getting rid of the question altogether.

"Though I have stated it as my firm persuasion that the system of the Austrian Cabinet in this country is now a defensive one, I do not mean to be understood that the Austrian army will in no possible case act offensively. Should any favourable occasion occur of attacking the enemy with a prospect of a great advantage, and without the risk of much loss, General De Vins will undoubtedly avail himself of it ; but this makes a part of every system of defensive operations, and this exception does not entitle General De Vins's plan of campaign to be regarded as an offensive one. Two months have already been lost in perfect inactivity, and whilst the General is waiting for this favourable occasion the season for military operations is advancing towards it's conclusion. Great stress has been hitherto and is still laid upon the system of starving the French army, but that system has not succeeded, and the late pacification between Spain and France renders its final success at least very dubious if not wholly impossible. When I first had the honour to state to your Lordship, in my correspondence of last year, the importance of the position of Vado Bay for effecting this purpose, it was at a time when the French had no naval force in the Mediterranean. But since that period magazines have been formed at Toulon and Marseilles, from which the French army is now supplied without it's being possible for us to prevent it. I have stated these circumstances to General De Vins, and I have endeavoured to convince him that, however well founded this hopes of forcing the enemy to abandon the Riviera from a want of provisions might have been when he first took possession of Vado, these hopes will become perfectly illusive in a very short time, for, by the late pacification, the French will have access to the ports of Spain. They will consequently be enabled to bring corn from Africa along the coast of Spain to Marseilles, and other ports of their coast, without its being possible for our ships to intercept it, particularly during the autumn and winter months ; and there is no doubt but that they will also draw grain from Sicily, Sardinia, and other countries, through the merchants of Barcelona, who must henceforward be considered in the light of any other neutral merchants. If then the enemy can form magazines anywhere upon the coast of Provence, there is no doubt but their army will be supplied with bread in spite of all our exertions to prevent it, though probably with some additional trouble and expence to them. That the General still flatters himself with these hopes is clearly apparent from the orders he has just issued to his cruisers to seize all vessels actually bound to Spain with corn ; orders which, in my opinion, are extremely imprudent, because they must naturally give great offence to the Court of Madrid without producing any advantage whatever to the cause ; for I have already mentioned that the French armies will in future draw their supplies from the westward and not from the eastward. When the General mentioned these orders to me, he appeared very desirous that his Majesty's ships should act upon a similar system, and should not confine themselves merely to detaining ships which were bound for France under pretence of being bound for Spain. I observed to him that this was so strong a measure, and involved in itself so many considerations of the most important nature, that I could not take upon me to advise Captain Nelson to adopt it ; but that a question of such magnitude, must necessarily be referred to the consideration of his Majesty's Ministers at home, who alone were competent to decide upon it. It may be here proper to acquaint your Lordship that I have mentioned this matter to Captain Nelson, and I have strongly advised him to take as much care as possible not to give any just cause of offence to the Court of Madrid, in the execution of the service in which he is now employed.

"Having now gone through the several topics of my conferences with General De Vins, nothing remains for me to add but to assure your Lordship that I shall return to Vado to renew my instances if I should see the smallest likelihood of their being attended with success; and I shall take the same care as I hitherto have done to keep the General in good humour. I again beg leave to repeat that I consider the General as wholly blameless in this business. I have not the least doubt but he acts in implicit obedience to the orders of his Court, and, if there is any insincerity in his language and assurances, it must be attributed to the same cause. I shall send a copy of this despatch to Sir Morton Eden, and I have no doubt but that Minister will, with his usual ability, endeavour to bring the Court of Vienna to a more vigorous and a more active system of operation.

"In my last conference with General De Vins I touched lightly upon the project which I had the honour to lay before your Lordship in my dispatch No. 5; but, as I perceived that he held it in the same cheapness in which he generally holds all projects of which French Royalists make a part, I dropped the subject. I am convinced that this project would fail of its effect unless it should previously obtain the full sanction and concurrence of the Court of Vienna.

"We have had here for some months past the Prince Augustus of AreMBERG (more commonly known by the name of Count la Mark) who came hither with the ostensible view of going to the Spanish army in Roussillon. He deferred his departure for Barcelona under various pretexts till the late pacification; he is in correspondence with Monsieur Thugut, and I am afraid he does the common cause no service with that Minister, as he is very much inclined to a pacification between Austria and France, and as he probably writes in that strain to Vienna. The private and personal object the Prince has in view is, I believe, the regaining possession of his estates in France. He has been very assiduous in his advances towards me, but as I knew him formerly to be an intriguer of the first class, and as I positively know that he sees in secret the French Consul Lacheze, I have treated him with civility but without the smallest degree of confidence."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 28, Wimbledcn.—"It may be procrastinated by circumstances a little longer or a little shorter time, but it is perfectly clear that if Hanover is neuter (which it certainly is) we cannot on any pretence be justifiable in keeping up an idle army of thirty thousand men in Hanover. Half the sum might perhaps induce the Empress of Russia to give us fifteen or twenty thousand land forces to join her fleet under our command. With such a force we could reconquer Holland, in place of treating about it when peace comes. If set about immediately, perhaps there is still time to get them round before the Baltic is shut up. It would be a noble stroke, and, in conjunction with St. Domingo, give us everything either for peace or war we could wish."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 28, Winchester.—“I have been requested by the Duc de Serrant to make him known to you; he will be in town tomorrow, being charged by Monsieur to say all he feels of his obligations to you, and of his desire to be guided by your wishes in everything. This I was likewise directed to urge to you by Monsieur, with a great deal of what I really have neither time nor spirits to write. But as Monsieur de Serrant has much to say, I would not delay writing to you and recommending him as a very well-disposed man, much in Monsieur’s confidence, and very capable of guiding him right.”

W. PITT TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 29, Walmer Castle.—“I received your letter this morning, and agree most clearly with you that it is worth risking money (I should say more than a little) to take the chance stated by your German correspondent. I think too that although we cannot undertake positively for anything in the French King’s name, we might at least offer an asylum here and large rewards to any of the members of the Convention who would take the steps requisite for giving success to the plan. Perhaps we might also engage that we would make it a condition of our future co-operation with the French King, that he should, in case of success, make such provision for the security of the persons concerned, and give such rewards in France as the occasion may require.

“It may be doubted whether more ought to be desired in the first instance, than prevailing on the primary assemblies to negative the proceedings required under the new Constitution; and whether it may not be best (if the plan succeeds) to defer any direct attempt for Royalty till the Convention have felt the embarrassment of the disappointment of their present project. The making provision for the Duc d’Angouleme is not without inconvenience, but it cannot be avoided, and he must, I conceive, be taken off Lord Moira’s hands, and sent to some palace. If Hampton Court can receive him in addition to the Statholder, it would be the best place.”

LORD AUCKLAND TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 30, Eden Farm, Bromley.—“The Princes and Princess of Orange are at this place. Their political prospects are at least gloomy. But I hope I am mistaken when I incline to fear that the continent of Europe must soon be left to its fate, and to the result of events which we can neither foresee, nor prevent, nor produce. To the many who, like me, are uninformed, it is become very doubtful whether the great expenses now incurring in Germany tend to purposes likely to compensate for their inconvenience.”

W. WICKHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, September 6, Mulheim.—“I have the honour to forward to your Lordship several very important dispatches from Mr. Trevor, Mr. Drake, and Mr. Jackson, together with the copy of one that I have received from Sir Morton Eden in answer to mine of the 12th August. Your Lordship will learn from them, that all hope of any co-operation with the Royalists, or of any effective assistance (other than a diversion) being given to them is now entirely out of the question.

"As to a diversion (though I hope I am mistaken in my opinion) I do not scruple to say, that I am myself persuaded it will not take effect at all.

"I repeat to your Lordship that I do not believe that the Austrians will dare to attempt the passage of the Rhine in face of the force that is now assembled against them, though I am far from believing it to be as formidable as it is represented.

"It appears from Sir Morton Eden's dispatch of the 22nd, that the Court of Vienna had even then taken the alarm on account of the reinforcements that were assembling in Upper Alsace, the intelligence of which, to have reached Vienna at that time, must necessarily have left this side of the country so early as the 15th or 16th. Now at that date I can venture to say that no reinforcements of any real consequence had arrived there. From the 20th to the present day, troops, artillery, and ammunition have been arriving daily, and the enemy has been incessantly employed in fortifying every point and post that they consider as likely to be the object of an attack; so that, if the reports of their generals gave reason for alarm when there was so little occasion for it, what have we to expect now when the situation of the enemy is really such as to require not only a superior force, but great military talents, and the most determined exertion, before one can hope to make an impression upon it.

"When I passed through Basle there were 40 pieces of cannon before their camp at Hasinguen, which had been stationed there for some days with the horses constantly harnessed night and day.

"They are adding to the strength of that position every day, and are fortifying all the gorges of the hills on the side of Porentrui, that flank the road leading to the camp.

"They are taking positions and entrenching themselves in several parts of the forest of Hoetz and are tracing lines and camps upon the hill. In short, they seem to leave nothing undone that may tend, if not to render the passage impracticable, at least to make the Austrians believe that it will be so.

"On this side after every public, I might say ostentatious, demonstration of an immediate and powerful attack, I find that the heavy artillery, without which the passage cannot be attempted, will not arrive in less than ten days at the soonest. Before that time the enemy will, in all probability, have really made such preparations that the attempt must be abandoned in good earnest.

"With respect to the passage by the territory of Basle, which I find Colonel Craufurd has recommended as a last resource, I am almost certain that the Court of Vienna will not venture to attempt it.

"For my own part, I am satisfied that it is now too late to think of such a thing; the political reasons your Lordship will find detailed in my dispatch, but I consider the enterprise itself as by no means an easy one.

"From the conversation I had with the Austrian Generals here, I am persuaded not only that that point had never been considered by them, but that they knew nothing at all of the country, and that they had imagined the passage to be over plain ground.

"They seem to have forgotten that the gorges of Porentrui, by which the passage was heretofore effected, are now occupied by the enemy, and that the only road by which they can march passes directly under the ramparts of Basle, and within reach of the enemy's batteries on the hills opposite to the town. Add to this, that they could only march in one column which, supposing it to pass safe through this defile, will, on coming out of it, find itself exposed immediately to the fire of both Huningen and the camp of Hasinguen under which it must form.

"I don't by any means intend to say that this is not a position that may be forced, but it certainly presents many more difficulties than they were originally aware of; and I don't doubt, when they come to examine them, that they will magnify the danger in proportion to the surprise it will occasion, and another messenger will be sent to Vienna with new representations of the difficulties; but I repeat to your Lordship that I do not believe the Court of Vienna will dare to attempt it, and I rather think they are right, for, in case of a defeat, or even a check, the enemy will not scruple to follow them by the same road; and even should the Austrians be successful, I have no doubt, as soon as the snows fall, that the French would make a powerful diversion by passing through Switzerland into Swabia with a large force drawn from their southern armies.

"I shall wait upon the Austrian Generals to-morrow at Fribourg, in consequence of an invitation from General Bellegarde, when (as nothing can be expected on the side of Franche Compté) I shall submit to their consideration the passage lower down, where, I understand, it is infinitely more practicable, and where alone it can be effected by surprise.

"I mean below Fort Louis. I shall, however, only suggest this plan in case I find them undetermined to pass higher up.

"This is but a melancholy account I have to convey to your Lordship, and but ill-calculated to encourage one to persevere in any attempt to support the Royalists in the interior of the Kingdom.

"However, after the instructions conveyed to me in your Lordship's dispatches, and the information you have been pleased to give me of his Majesty's intention with respect to the coast of France, I do not think myself by any means at liberty to suspend the execution of the measure that has been previously taken. I have therefore, in furtherance of the execution of those instructions, placed the sum of 10,000*l.* at the disposition of MM. La Tour, Imbert, Columbez and Jessonel. A part of it has already passed to Lyons.

"I send your Lordship enclosed a receipt for that sum which I have drawn for upon Messrs. Bethman and Company. Some arms and powder have been purchased, and are now safe within the frontiers, but in no great quantity.

"Three thousand pounds are sent to Lyons, and the rest is to be distributed at Bourg en Busse, Macon, and Mont Brison, and is mostly in the hands of the priests.

"No more is wanted at present, and I shall keep a cautious hand upon any further expenditure. The 30,000*l.* left at my disposal will, I should hope, cover everything. M. Imbert, who may be most entirely depended on, has engaged that no money at all shall be wanted at Lyons after they shall have once declared themselves. How soon that moment will arrive it is impossible for me to say. It can only be determined by circumstances that no human prudence can foresee.

"A decided success in the Vendée appears at this moment the only event that is likely to make such a measure advisable, unless the coalition should become general throughout the whole of this side of the country, an event that would seem to me far from improbable, and which, I think, would certainly take place if the armies were not in the way. . .

"I returned here at the particular request of Colonel Craufurd and the Prince of Condé. His Serene Highness seems to entertain a hope that I shall be able to have some influence upon the operations of the Austrian Generals, in which I fear he will be entirely disappointed.

"I found him very low-spirited at the present situation of things, and it has not been in my power to give him any consolation. I have, however, carefully concealed from him the contents of Sir Morton Eden's dispatch.

"Deserters arrive here constantly but in small numbers; the difficulty of passing the Rhine being almost insurmountable for them."

"I found Colonel Craufurd absent, and shall remain here till his return.

"The army on the other side has accepted the new constitution, but without any particular mark of satisfaction. We wait with great impatience for the result of the first meeting of the primary assemblies.

"It is clear that the Convention is apprehensive of the consequence. I have not information enough to enable me to form any conjecture.

"From what Mr. Trevor communicated to me I presume that the Prince of Condé must have been mistaken when he informed me that the King had desired his manifest to be published here, without communicating it to Colonel Craufurd or myself. I therefore asked his Serene Highness to explain that matter to me. He said that the order to him was peremptory to publish it without suffering any communication to be made to anybody, and that he had construed this to relate to Colonel Craufurd and myself; whereas he had since reason to believe that it was meant to be confined to the Austrian Generals. He repeated to me, however, in confidence that he had very strong assurances from Verona, by the same conveyance, of the suspicions entertained there of the intentions of the British Government."

W. WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, September 7, Fribourg.—"I have just left General Bellegarde, with whom I have had a conversation of some hours. The difficulties of every kind are still greater than I had expected; but he assures me that their orders are positive, and that they are determined to put them in execution should the passage cost them ten thousand men. The reports of the engineers as to the difficulty of passing anywhere between Basle and Strasburg are extremely unfavourable. They have sent another officer to reconnoitre the whole course of the river a second time, and General Bellegarde told me that, if his report was as unfavourable as the others had been, they should turn their attention very seriously to the passage by Switzerland.

"I asked him whether they had considered the difficulties of such an enterprise, physical as well as political. He answered that they had, and that a very competent person was at this moment employed in examining the position. That he was aware that it was by no means easy, but that he had rather scale the higher Alps than cross the Rhine. That if they lost men, they should at least have the satisfaction of destroying a number of the enemy; and that a victory might have a happy effect both for the moment and in its consequences. In short, he said, if the Court of Vienna would permit it, that he should be most strongly for advising the measure.

"I proposed to him the plan of passing lower down. He said the idea was certainly a good one; but that they should, in that case, abandon the project for which I had been before so strenuous an advocate, and which he was himself as much disposed to approve as I had been.

"I asked him if he really thought the project still feasible. He said, as much so as ever it had been; excepting that the enemy would have stronger force to oppose to them at the beginning of their enterprise. I asked him what he thought of contenting themselves with Schlestat, Huninguen, and New Brisac. He said that would not enable them to maintain their winter quarters on the other side. They must have Belfort and Pozenbrug.

"I asked him if such was really the opinion of the Court of Vienna. He said, he had no reason to believe it otherwise ; but that if the Court of Vienna meant to abandon all hope of co-operating with the Royalists, he thought they had much better pass lower down, inasmuch as the passage was not only much easier, but might be now effected by surprise. He repeated to me, over and over again, the strongest assurances that they were determined to pass at all events. It was impossible, however, to do anything in less than a fortnight, as they had neither magazines nor money. He said that they had artillery enough for the passage, though not enough to enable them to commence a siege immediately.

"Some other Generals with whom I conversed, particularly General Sporek, told me that the affair was too hazardous to attempt without knowing their object. General Lauer said it was extremely difficult, but they only wanted their pont d'or.

"I had a long conversation with General Wurmser, who told me he was determined to go on; but that he really did not know to what purpose. He asked me what the Prince of Condé intended to do. I answered that that depended on his Excellency. 'Why does not he go to Lyons?' said the General. 'We will give him troops; we have enough, if you will pay for them. They will be much better than any he can raise.' I told him, in answer to this remark, that if he would conduct the Prince there, and leave him 15,000 men, I could almost answer for taking them immediately into British pay; and that I thought I might engage for half that number, if he would conduct the Prince to Besançon, and leave him master of the place with 15,000 good Austrian troops. He said the latter proposition was well worth attending to; and asked if I would conclude the bargain. I asked him, in return, if he had full powers to undertake the enterprise; and there the conversation ended, the General giving me no answer.

"I do not scruple to recommend the subject to your Lordship's consideration. An offer of that sort, at a moment when the General might be elated with success, might possibly have the effect desired. All the Generals tell me that he is extremely desirous of distinguishing himself on this occasion.

"I have promised to come over again before I leave Mulheim, and your Lordship may be assured that I will omit no argument that may tend to urge them to vigorous action."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1795, September 9, Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to transmit to your Majesty the communications which he yesterday received from Count Starhemberg. He humbly takes the liberty to request to be honoured with your Majesty's directions with respect to the answer to be given to that part of them which relates to the transactions in Germany, with respect to which your Majesty will observe that the Court of Vienna appears to rest its future conduct entirely on the line which may be observed by your Majesty's Electoral Government, particularly on the subject of separate treaties of peace concluded by the members of the Germanic body. This subject appears the more important and pressing, in the present moment, by reason of the treaty concluded by the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel.

"Lord Grenville hopes that your Majesty will not disapprove his having immediately, on receiving the account of that treaty, written to the Treasury, to suspend for the present, all further payments on account of the subsidy treaties with the Landgrave."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, September 10, Weymouth.—"I have received Lord Grenville's note transmitting the communications which he had received on Tuesday from Count Starhemberg, who seems always more eager for immediate answers than the tardy conduct of his Court can call for.

"The unpleasant minute of Cabinet I received yesterday for withdrawing the British cavalry from the Continent so clearly shows that this country means to leave the German Empire to shift for itself, that I cannot, till I have maturely weighed the situation in which every German Prince is placed by this change, give a decided answer as to the step I shall think best to take as Elector."

The MARQUIS of BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, September 13, [Southsea].—"I enclose to you a letter from George Nugent, upon which I know that you will do whatever is right, or whatever you can with propriety. Hewitt and Hutchinson have each had their new corps completed by draughts for this very service, as a douceur; and Nugent has had his 85th (senior to both) actually draughted into Hutchinson's six weeks ago, so that not only there is no plea for sending Nugent, his regiment not being ordered there, but, on the contrary, he is deprived of his men, and consequently of part of his profits, exactly in the moment in which he is ordered. As to his wish to be Major-General, I fear that it cannot be; but, if he is to go to this cursed service, it will not surely be expected from him (senior to all the brigadiers) to go without his regiment, and that corps draughted from him, while Keppell, Hutchinson, Myers, Hewitt, Howe, Whitelocke, all junior to him, and all serving or ordered for the West Indies as brigadiers, have their regiments completed. This might be obviated, or rather compensated to him, by giving him the local rank of Major-General, which can injure no one, as Bernard, his only senior, does not go, and the precedents of this local rank are numberless. However, upon all this, I would not upon any consideration press you beyond what may be really convenient for you.

"I return you Mr. Lipscomb's letter. He is a lieutenant in the North Hants. Tom has been with me for the last week, and has made some heavy hours roll very pleasantly. My wife is, thank God, recovering, and gets strength upon the sea, where she is not fatigued. We have just now packed off the Prince of Orange to Southampton. I wish you could keep your strange animals in their cage, for they do no good travelling about."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1795, September 21, Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to submit to your Majesty the draft of a despatch to Sir Morton Eden, in conformity to the ideas which Mr. Pitt had the honour to lay before your Majesty at Weymouth. Lord Grenville thinks that if Mr. Pelham could be induced to go to Vienna, to assist in the execution of these instructions, it might much facilitate the service; and he will therefore, if your Majesty should be graciously pleased to approve it, see Mr. Pelham for that purpose."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, September 22, Weymouth.—"When Mr. Pitt was here he mentioned the idea of sending Mr. Pelham to Vienna as the most ready means of coming to some agreement with that supine Court; I certainly cannot object to it now formally proposed by Lord Grenville. Did I think much good can be got from thence, I should be eager for the appointment, as I am certain he would do his utmost; but I cannot say that the experience we have had can make one very sanguine as to any real vigour being produced while the present directors continue in the Austrian Councils."

THE DUKE OF PORTLAND to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1795, September 23, Welbeck.—"The subject of the despatch of Sir Morton Eden has occupied so much of my thoughts that but little consideration is necessary to induce me to give my entire assent to the propriety of requiring of the Court of Vienna a full and confidential explanation of her sentiments and views upon the two great points of war and peace; and I can certainly have no difficulty in adopting without reserve every one of the arguments you have made use of to induce that Court to make the most vigorous exertion in this, as also with a view to another campaign. But neither your Lordship nor any other of our colleagues will be surprised at my not expressing the same degree of readiness to become a party to a renunciation of the existence of monarchy in France. Perhaps I express myself too strongly, but I know not how otherwise to interpret the communication proposed to be made to the Court of Vienna, that his Majesty by no means feels the establishment of monarchy a sine quâ non preliminary of any negotiation with France. I certainly may and very much wish I may be mistaken, but I cannot but fear that this declaration will be so understood, construed, and received by all nations, and by none more eagerly than our own; and that instead of its proving encouragement to the exertions of our allies it will be looked upon as the signal of our abandonment of one of the principal, if not the best security, that existed against the overthrow of civil society. I beg you not to imagine that I am sanguine enough to flatter myself that we shall not be obliged to acquiesce in the present or some such form of government as now prevails in France, that is that we shall have to make peace with a Government which is not and does not consent to become monarchical; but what I question the propriety of is the explicitness of a declaration to that effect, an invitation to an adherence to the present wretched system. At the time that we are supplying the Vendée with provisions, arms, ammunition, clothing and money; that we are equally endeavouring to set the Prince of Condé's army on foot; that we send a minister and mentor to Lewis the 18th; that Monsieur is landed in France from on board and under the protection of our own fleet; that his eldest son is actually resident in this country; and in short that all the French nobility are immediately under our safeguard and patronage, there seems something unaccountable in our choosing that particular moment to invite the enemy to make us a proposal which, primâ facie at least, implies the abandonment of all those unfortunate persons and the sacrifice of the interests and existence of the soundest and best part of France. I own it does not occur to me how this step is particularly suited to induce the House of Austria to increase either its efforts or its confidence, or how it is to guard us against the repetition of those attacks to which the evacuation of Toulon in particular exposed the then Government of this country. But my intention was to confine myself strictly to the consideration of the necessity and propriety of making such a communication as is proposed to the Court of Vienna, because we are certainly not tied down by any public declaration that I recollect, or prevented by any other means from entering into negotiation with any form of government which may exist in France, which may, in our opinions, afford a reasonable prospect of bringing about a safe and honourable peace. In all other respects I have no doubt in acceding to every part of your instructions, and, having occasion to write to Mr. Pelham the day I received your Lordship's, I did earnestly urge him to comply with whatever wishes you might express to him in an interview which, I told him, I had just learnt from you your having solicited of him. I very much admire the caution of not letting M. Monneront come farther at first than Dover, and am glad that our friend King is appointed to converse with Mr. Majent. An idea prevails and, I believe, is strongly credited by Mr. Burke, that several considerable people in France wish to place the Duke of Orleans on the throne, and that that plan is carried on in concert with some of the most active of the Opposition here. The latter I can't give any credit to, nor can I fancy any very good reason for the probability of the former part of the report. I shall certainly be in town on Tuesday."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, September 27, Southsea.—"I was not very sanguine in my hopes that George Nugent's letter might give any opening for the completion of his wishes, and I am perfectly satisfied that you could do nothing in it, particularly as I find that orders had been sent to his 85th, consisting of officers and about 300 men, to embark for Gibraltar, where they will be completed with draughts to 600 men, and will embark for the West Indies. Under these circumstances much of his grievance is done away. I have written to him to try to reconcile him to his disappointment respecting the local rank of Major-General, which, as senior of all the brigadiers, he wished to obtain.

"I have been worried out of my life by my important nonsenses, which have detained me here très malgré moi, but, as they are now all settled, I look towards Stowe, and shall be there on Tuesday, the 6th, in hopes of enjoying a few quiet hours with Tom and with you. Pray endeavour to arrange so as to manage this, and you shall have the choice of my nursery, if that will tempt you and your little woman to come to me. Adieu; we are all well and prosperous. No news except that the Cork and Gibraltar detachments are preparing to sail. As usual, I am a frondeur for the delay of your West India armament."

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1795, October 7, St. James's Square.—"I send you the article as proposed by Mr. Jay respecting the American trade to the East Indies.

I should be much obliged to you to consider whether any objection occurs to you in form or substance, and particularly to advert to these points.

1. "Can the King stipulate for this during the existence of the charter?"

2. "If the consent of the Company must be had, can the Directors give that consent, or must the Proprietors be consulted? And, in either case, should the treaty be made in the King's name or the Company's?"

3. "Are there any articles of import or export that should be excepted from the general liberty of commerce?"

4. "Is it worth while to insist on the stipulation that the Americans shall not trade direct between Asia and Europe? If it is, how can that point be enforced?"

5. "Are there any advantages which ought to be stipulated in return, either for the interest of our East India Company at home, or for that of our dominions there?"

"If anything else strikes you, I shall thank you to state it."

LORD GRENVILLE TO SIR MORTON EDEN.

Private.

1795, October 10, Downing Street.—"I have stated to you in my dispatch the principal object we have had in view in sending Mr. Jackson to you, which is to convince the Austrian Government that matters are now brought to a point, where some distinct explanation of what we are to expect in future is become absolutely necessary; it being quite impossible that things can continue on their present footing. I feel that it may be unpleasant to you to assume a tone of so much complaint and peremptoriness towards a Minister with whom you live on personal good terms; but you will, I am sure, see with us the absolute necessity of it. In our present situation, we might possibly not find it very difficult to make either war or peace with advantage, if Austria will set her shoulders to the work in earnest. If the system of this year continues, we may both find ourselves in a situation not to be able to make either.

"You know that Mr. Jackson has the character of the King's Minister at Madrid; so that you will have no difficulty in carrying him to M. Thugut; and his presence will certainly be useful to support you in many disagreeable things that you must say. I hope you will be able to send him back soon, and with something explicit and positive; and, what is still more, that the effect will follow immediately; for without that, the credit of Austria will be very low here indeed.

"I have written to Sir Charles Whitworth to apprise him of these overtures, and to request that the Russian Minister may be directed to support you. His orders will, I conclude, be such as to put all ideas of peace at a distance; but, in that case, the Court of Vienna will naturally ask whether Russia, when she dissuades peace, will assist in the prosecution of the war."

W. WINDHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, October 11.—"It becomes very urgent as well as important to come to some determination as to the supply of stores and money where we can give nothing else to the unfortunate Royalists; who are still contending with zeal and energy, unconscious of the changes that are taking place, and still supposing that they have a country behind ready to support their efforts at least by feeding their wants; and to prevent, for a long while to come, the powers of the Convention from being wholly turned to their destruction. We shall really risk something more than injury to a cause which includes all other causes, if, as long as we maintain the war, and till we formally apprize the Royalists that they must no longer count upon our support (a notification by the way which our former declarations hardly leave us the liberty to make) we do not continue to afford them all such assistance as we cannot show to be actually out of our power. As it stands at present, orders are preparing to a large amount, and with reasonable dispatch, for clothing and other necessities of that sort; powder is sent, or on its way, to the amount of more than 1,000 barrels (eight or nine thousand would not be too much, supposing the thing to go on) and authority is given to send by opportunities, as they occur, such additional quantities as the stores at Portsmouth may furnish, and the demands of other service can spare. Arms will be supplied, not in large quantities, but in such as the numbers manufactured and the demands for other service can admit; and, lastly, 50,000*l.* has been sent out with General Doyle, exclusive I believe of 10,000*l.* intended for the payment of his own army, and which is now in great part expended; and 50,000*l.* more has lately been sent out by the Robusta. This is the whole, I believe, of what has hitherto been done; and this, for the present moment, and for Charette's army, may be sufficient; though certainly it is at this moment that that army may be most pressed, and when a large sum of money ready to be instantly applied might produce an effect, either of obtaining good or averting evil, which could not be hoped from tenfold such sums at a later period. But we must recollect that Charette's army is only a part of the Royalist force; and of that force which even his success and safety requires to be maintained. There is the whole of the force under Puisaye, including Scepeau's army, which has now elected him as their chief. There is a large district under M. de la Vieuville, whose conduct has been in the highest degree meritorious; and another still larger district, and under the direction of a person equally meritorious, M. de Frotté. Neither of these three armies can well receive assistance directly from Monsieur, nor with 100,000*l.*, pressed as he is likely to be, could he well spare any. I would, if my own judgment were to direct, send without a moment's delay a sum of money to each of these. A very moderate or inconsiderable one would be sufficient; 20,000*l.* to Puisaye and 10,000*l.* to each of the others, or even 10,000*l.* to Puisaye and 5,000*l.* each to the other two. Nor would there be any difficulty of finding agents to whom I should feel no hesitation of trusting. To Puisaye indeed it should be conveyed from Quiberon. To M. de Frotté means might be found of conveying it from St. Marcout [Marcouf] opposite to which at the distance of not many leagues is his headquarters. With M. de la Vieuville a constant communication is kept up, as you may have observed, from Jersey. To none of these should I feel the least scruple of confiding sums to a much larger amount, with a full confidence of their being fairly applied to their proper purpose. M. Frotté is man strongly recommended, and who has shown himself perfectly devoted to the general cause. M. Vieuville, with the same proofs from conduct, is the heir of property in Brittany to a great amount. Of Puisaye, though I have often had reason to complain of rather too great magnificence in the expenditure of public money, I have never had the smallest reason to doubt of the integrity and correctness as to all views of private emolument, or of idea of appropriating any part to himself.

"Money is now almost the only means by which we can assist them ; for arms in great abundance we have not to send, besides the difficulty of conveying them into the country. They all agree that with money a great deal is to be done in gaining both arms and powder from the Republicans, as well as in gaining the Republicans themselves.

"Without such assistance, all those who are here, Allègre, Boisberthelot (the two persons that went into France previous to Puisaye's expedition) and Prigent, who though of inferior condition has merited by his services that some attention should be given to his opinion, all agree that the cause in that quarter must die away. Puisaye, in his letters since his landing, speaks with great confidence of the force and spirit still remaining in the country, and of the means which he has of co-operating with Charette, but strongly enforces, in order to give effect to them, the necessity of pecuniary aid. The utility indeed of this seems to be clear. It cannot but do good as far as it goes ; and what is the comparison between the value of 50 or 100 thousand more in the expenses of this war, and the chance even of the effect that may be produced by it ?"

THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1795, October 14, Brunswick.—"Je saisi l'occasion du départ de Son Altesse, le Prince Frédéric, pour remercier votre Altesse des marques de souvenir dont Elle m'a honoré par le Prince Héritaire. Les affaires d'Allemagne ont considérablement empirées ; l'ennemi est le maître des deux rives du Rhin, à l'exception de Wesel, d'Ehrenbreitstein et de Mayence. Ces deux dernières places sont cernés par les Français. Manheim est tombé par capitulation, et les armées Impériales se sont retirés sans coup férir, jusque derrière le Mayn. Une petite affaire qui a tournée à l'avantage des Autrichiens près du Neckar à Lahnbourg, a coûté un couple de mille hommes à l'ennemi, sans avoir aucune influence sur la totalité des affaires. L'Electeur de Cologne a retiré son contingent ; celui de Bavière a fait un traité de neutralité pour le Palatinat ; et le but de l'ennemi, de forcer un Prince après l'autre à faire la paix particulière, lui réussit en plein. Le mal est au comble, et si la ligne de démarcation, fixée par le traité de Basle, n'était strictement observée par les Français, tout l'empire serait en proie à la dévastation de l'ennemi. Les clubs gagnent beaucoup en Hollande, et il y aurait déjà eu des scènes sanglantes, si les ennemis, par une affectation de modérantisme, ne balançaient l'influence populaire. Il ne m'appartient pas de faire des réflexions sur les désastres que l'Europe éprouve, mais sûr est-il que si enfin les Puissances ne finissent pas par s'entendre entre elles à la pacification, après n'avoir jamais pu y parvenir durant la guerre, elles assureront la Révolution Française, la destruction de la Hollande, la perte de la Belgique, et le renversement de la constitution Germanique."

French. Copy.

THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK to the PRINCESS OF ORANGE.

1795, October 14, Brunswick.—"Je dois des obligations infinies à votre Altesse Royale des informations qu'elle a daigné me faire parvenir par Son Altesse le Prince Héritaire. Personne n'est plus à même de la mettre exactement au fait de la position affligeante où le Continent se trouve, que les Princes ses augustes fils. Je dois naturellement m'en rapporter à eux, et je ne puis y ajouter que la réflexion douloureuse qu'après que l'Angleterre a abandonnée la Prusse aux intrigues, et au parti anti-Anglican en adoptant, au lieu d'un ton amical, conciliataire, et doux, celui de la hauteur et de la menace, elle a ébranlée sans le vouloir l'existence politique de la Belgique, de la Hollande, et de l'empire Germanique. Si la cour de Londres ne se rapproche pas de celle de Berlin, si des vues personnelles empêchent d'employer sur le Continent des hommes qui connaissent la situation de l'Europe, les hommes qui la gouvernent, leurs moyens, et leurs faiblesses, elle ne fera que servir la France dans ses projets, consolidera cet esprit révolutionnaire qui gêne partout, se verra coupée du Continent pour longtemps, et se trouvera hors de portée de rendre les services qu'elle voudrait. Ce ne sont pas les menaces qui opéreront sur les esprits, je ne saurais le répéter assez. L'ennemi commun saisira avec toute l'adresse possible les fausses démarches du Ministère Britannique ; et la hauteur dans les négociations et dans les procédés ne lutte jamais contre l'adresse, et ne fait que donner des armes à eux qui ne tendent qu'à éloigner l'Angleterre des affaires Continentales, en jouissant du renversement du Stadthoudérat.

Voilà tout ce qui m'est permis de dire dans la situation désolante où nous nous trouvons, et dans laquelle l'égoïsme, l'esprit de parti, et les influences de toutes les petites passions nous ont plongé."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, October 16, Sittingbourne.—“I came here last night to meet Dundas in order to talk over the instructions which he had prepared in consequence of a minute of Cabinet made last Wednesday, for withdrawing the British troops from Isle d'Yeu [Isle Dieu.] You will receive with this letter the draft, and Doyle's despatches, and I dare say you will agree with us that there can be no doubt of the propriety of the measure. At the same time this will so change Monsieur's situation and expectations, that I think we ought on no account to be parties to landing him on the French coast (if he is not landed already) unless, after a further explanation, he still insists upon it. In particular we are, I think, bound to explain to him that the present crisis at Paris, though on the one hand it may lead either to a continued state of distraction, or to a new order of things more favourable to his prospects, yet, on the other hand, may possibly produce some established form of Government with which this country may think it necessary to treat, provided it should find them inclined to negotiation on a footing consistent with our honour and interest, and that of our allies. That we should still see the restoration of monarchy with infinitely more satisfaction than any other result, and that, at all events while the war continues (which may be necessarily prolonged by the pretensions of the enemy, even if the objections which have hitherto existed to the state of their Government should be removed) every effort will be used on our part to continue supplies of arms, clothing, ammunition, and money for the use of the Royalists on different parts of the coast ; but that, feeling it possible that there may be such an issue of the present crisis as may lead sooner or later to negotiation with some form of government different from monarchy, we have thought it right to apprise him of what may eventually be our line of conduct, in order that he may have under his view all the circumstances which may guide his decision. It would certainly have been desirable not to have made any such communication without hearing again from Paris, from whence there were no accounts at Dover yesterday, later than those of the 6th. But the measure of withdrawing the troops and of setting Admiral Harvey's fleet more at liberty (especially after the bad account of the Mediterranean convoy) is so urgent that it cannot be delayed; and it seems impossible to execute it without such a previous explanation as I have suggested. If you agree in this idea, I think the only mode of making the communication would be directly by a letter from you to Monsieur, to be transmitted through General Doyle; as it does not seem desirable to trust either the General, or the Duc d'Harcourt, with the state of our opinions on so delicate a point.

"I return you Windham's letter; and you will see from what I have already written, that I fully agree in the general propriety of supplying the Royalists largely while the war continues, and (though there may be some risk of our aid being misapplied) I think it well worth the experiment to extend the supply to all the quarters which Windham suggests.

"I had received a duplicate of Lord Auckland's paper, but have not yet read it. I shall get through it in my way back to Walmer to-day.

"You will receive a dispatch from General Dundas containing a communication from Prince Frederic of Orange respecting the Prussian —. I dare say you will agree in thinking that general assurances from the Court of Berlin are entitled to no regard, and ought not in the least to change our plan of bringing away the Dutch troops. Probably you will have some communication with the Stadholder on the subject."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, October 17, Windsor.—"As Lord Grenville seemed so anxious to change his Under Secretary I am glad he has been able to arrange it to the satisfaction of Mr. Burges, and I trust he will find that assistance in Mr. Hammond he appears to expect."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, October 18, Walmer Castle.—"After considering all that you state, Dundas and I cannot help retaining our former opinion, that nothing can justify the risking our own troops being landed on any part of the coast of France. If Charette comes down in force enough to secure the temporary possession of any proper point, it will enable us to land the supplies, and the French troops, without exposing ours to any hazard. If ours were to be previously landed in order to co-operate in an attempt for securing such a point, the supposition implies an enemy in force to contend with, and if the enterprise fails, the possibility of re-embarking is very precarious. I do not, therefore, see how more latitude can safely be given than in the instructions as they now stand. I shall certainly be in town on Tuesday by dinner, and shall be very glad to see you at any time in the evening that suits you. If possible, however, we should wish this despatch to go on Monday.

"I have written to Long, to procure 100,000*l.* in dollars, which cannot, however, be in time to go by this conveyance, but may [be] sent with some supplies of fuel which are preparing. I confess my objections to any idea of dissolution at present are not at all abated, but of that we may talk when we meet.

"The pressing demand for the return of Harvey's fleet is to be added to all the other considerations. Any protection however to Isle d'Yeu [Isle Dieu] from occasional cruises may still be afforded, and Monsieur and those with him must judge how far that species of protection is sufficient."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, October 24, Stowe.—"The enclosed appear to me so essential, that I send them to you. I am convinced that Doyle was right in not establishing himself at Noirmoutier, where he would ultimately have been forced; and therefore all the reasoning on the defenceless state of the island is nonsense; for, had he been even invited to land there by the inhabitants, the same reasons which have now decided him not to attack it, would have weighed equally against accepting the surrender of it. I write to the Bishop to state my private doubts upon Charette's conduct, which does not tally with the professions which I have seen; and this opinion will possibly show him how little those who were the most sanguine for a descent, expect from a project of the same nature in the spring. As to the personal situation of Monsieur, it has occurred to me that a diplomatic character from the Emperor or King of Sardinia might, under the act of Queen Anne, be his best protection against debts; for it will be impossible to suffer him to pass his winter at Spithead, and many political reasons may make it wise (and perhaps necessary) to keep up the appearance of protecting him, and the means of assisting by his presence any (very improbable) exertion from the interior to the western coasts of France. But, in all events, I can venture to assure you that, personally, he is worthy of every attention that you can give to his melancholy situation, and beyond this I do not think it fair to urge you.

"I take it for granted that with the troupes Anglaises, all the French are to return; surely it would be wise to avail ourselves of them for the West Indian armament as a second embarkation; or, if you are in time to order them to Cork instead of Spithead, they would be in time to sail with the foreign troops embarked from Stadt, and directed to sail under the care of the Canada, now at Spithead, but ordered to Cork to collect the St. Domingo armament. I mention this because much dissatisfaction must arise at re-landing the foreign force, and I believe that in numbers (including those now in England) they will exceed the number allowed by law. The disaffected 400, who were sent back four weeks since, should all be ordered to be draughted into the foreign corps serving in the West Indies; and the consequence would be, that they would desert as soon as they found they were to be sent to that service, and you would get clear of them.

"As to Abercrombie, I really pity most sincerely your feelings upon a delay so grossly scandalous and criminal, wherever the blame may really fall. I understand, and from the best authority, that there is no confidence whatsoever in his army, and that, amongst a thousand horrid consequences of this delay, it is not the least important that the officers and men have had leisure to frame to themselves every mischievous apprehension that can arise from disaffection to this service. The ordnance are still unprepared; when I last heard from Portsmouth only three of their ships from the river had got round. You must make some examples, for no service can go on in this manner.

"I returned on Friday morning from Addlestone, very much delighted with my little woman, and with the most explicit assurances from Lady Caroline Leigh. Still, however, as nothing can be done till the appeal is heard, some months must roll over before the marriage can take place. I have no doubt of the cordial co-operation of the family, but much of the integrity or good wishes of your baronet, Sir Francis Buller. I have found very great assistance from Talbot's prudence and discretion in his management of the old lady, and am more obliged to you than I can express for the means of rewarding him. I have told him of your goodness, and he is overjoyed. When would you have him come to town?

"The plants will be sent so as to arrive at Dropmore on Sunday morning next; if, therefore, you are tied by the leg to London you must order accordingly.

"I have determined to attend your summons for Thursday, though très malgré moi, for I cannot say how much I hate to leave this place, but we must all put our shoulders to the wheel.

"Have you any great dinner, and for what day, as I have a great jack, now alive, at your orders; but write by the return of post to say whether you will have it."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, October 25, Windsor.—"By the communication from Lord Grenville of the Marquis del Campo's private letter to him I am informed of the latter's wish of receiving the Queen's portrait instead of the usual present in money on his quitting his embassy. He has done this in a more polite manner than one should have expected from him, and therefore, on my part, I cannot but permit you to indulge him in his request. You are therefore to order the picture to be prepared by Cosway, and to have it set in diamonds by Duval to the amount on the whole of the money he would have received in the usual manner."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, October 27, Windsor.—"I am much pleased at Lord Grenville's attention in having instantly forwarded to me the two French papers arrived this day, as they certainly show that Marshal Clairfait has forced the French to retire at least to the Rhine, and give good reason to suppose that when the German mail arrives we shall have a full account of the French being completely beat by the Austrians. No one will more sincerely rejoice than me at such an event, as no one more forcibly feels that unless the French are thoroughly reduced no solid peace can be obtained, and no attempt ought to be encouraged of opening a negotiation, which ever has the effect of destroying all energy in those who ought to look forward to the continuance of war."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 6 [Stowe].—"The letter, of which the enclosed is a copy, reached me this morning. The Duke of Portland has, I fear, misconceived the bill, for there is nothing in any of the clauses that can enable me to raise any men as an immediate augmentation to my regiment, with a view of their being taken as part of the county quota. I enclose you a copy of the clause for that purpose which I sent to Mr. Pitt, but the Bill was gone up to the Lords. I can have no interest, but on the contrary, a great deal of plague in the business, and if the clause cannot impede and may assist your ballot, I cannot conceive why you may not give me the means by law of assisting the public in my own way. However, liberavi animam meam, and, if you do not think it tanti, I most certainly shall not employ any other friend to move it as an amendment in the committee in the House of Lords. 211101 250

"When shall I send you your beech, and do you want any sheep.

"I have likewise sent you a clause enabling volunteers to offer to serve for sub-divisions or districts instead of supplementary militia. Mr. Pitt's clause obliges volunteers to enrol as supplementary militiamen, to swear as such, and to train for 20 days, seriatim, in any part of the county, instead of training once or twice a week in their towns. This clause will not repeal the others."

Enclosure.

THE DUKE OF PORTLAND to the MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM.

1796, November 4, Burlington House.—"I have had the honour of laying before the King your Lordship's letter of the 24th ultimo, and am commanded to acquaint you that His Majesty does the most ample justice to the motives which have induced your Lordship, at this important crisis, to offer to contribute personally to the internal force of his kingdom by augmenting the militia of the county of Buckingham at your own expense, and to forward the objects of the Legislature by carrying that augmentation into effect as speedily as possible.

"Your Lordship must not wonder that his Majesty was fully prepared for such a testimony of public spirit and liberality on the part of your Lordship, any more than that he should always recollect it with grateful satisfaction.

"The Bill for an augmentation to the Militia which is now depending in Parliament will be found, I trust, to contain clauses so well adapted to the object your Lordship has in view that, I flatter myself, it will obtain the sanction of your approbation, and enable you to fulfil the intentions you have so generously avowed.

"I am persuaded that Mr. Pitt will have explained to you the reasons which have hitherto delayed the acknowledgments I now offer you for the honour of your letter, and that you will do me the justice to believe that no one can be more disposed than I am to manifest every sentiment of respect and esteem for your Lordship."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795] November 8, Stowe.—"I have sent no requisition to our High Sheriff, because I see that the City of London have not prepared or even mentioned any petition to Parliament for the new bills which we think so essential; and no other county is yet called. We agreed that it would be best to wait for the City, as much of the mischief of seditious meetings is more immediately within their limits, and therefore the complaint of such an evil ought to originate with them, before that string is touched in the country. If I should have been misinformed (for I have read the City address) you will be so good as to send me a messenger with your high commands, who may be here before I go to bed; and the High Sheriff shall have his letter the next morning, fixing it for Wednesday the 18th; but, if not, I shall wait for the City meeting before we fix ours. Adieu. If you are not stoned in your way to Guildhall, let me hear one line from you on Tuesday, to say that you are well."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1795, November 11, Whitehall.—"Vous avez certainement reçu par ces malles les détails des succès brillans et très importants que le Maréchal Clerfaye a gagné, surtout dans l'attaque du Camp Français au-devant de Mentz, où le courage de l'armée Autrichienne et le bon esprit qui l'anima se sont montré d'une manière qui non seulement leur fait le plus grand honneur, mais qui ne manquera pas d'avoir les suites les plus importantes, pourvu que l'on sache profiter du succès qu'on a eu. Recevez, je vous prie, mes compléments et félicitations à cette occasion. Vous savez si ils sont sincères. Vous n'ignorez pas depuis combien de temps je soupire après l'occasion de vous faire un pareil compliment, et combien je m'intéresse à la gloire de la monarchie Autrichienne, et à tout ce qui peut avancer ses intérêts, si intimement liés à ceux de mon souverain et de ma patrie."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, November 12,] Millfield House.—"Je reçois dans le moment la lettre que vous me faites l'honneur de m'écrire. On ne saurait être plus sensible que je ne le suis aux attentions obligeantes dont votre amitié ne cesse de me combler. Les succès de M. de Clerfaye sont, en effet, aussi grands qu'ils étaient nécessaires. Vous n'ignorez pas la partialité que j'ai toujours eu pour ses talens et pour son caractère personnel. Je me flatte que nous allons profiter de la victoire. J'ai deux raisons pour le supposer, la pleine liberté accordée au Maréchal d'agir selon sa volonté, et l'expérience heureuse qui doit avoir anéanti son irrésolution, le seul défaut qu'on puisse lui reprocher. Au milieu de ces triomphes il s'est donné la peine de m'écrire de sa main un journal précieux qui me démontre que, depuis le 12 jusqu'au 29, nous avons eu une chaîne de victoires. Puisse-t-elle se prolonger. Je le désire et le crois véritablement."

Postscript.—"Les malles m'ont apporté des instructions de Vienne qu'il faut que j'aie l'honneur de vous communiquer. M. Erskine s'est plaint de moi au Pape, à ce qui paraît. Je ne m'attendais pas à des démêlés avec le Saint Père. Je passerai demain au bureau vers midi pour tenter fortune."

The MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795], November 12, [Stowe].—"I enclose to you a draft of our address which you will alter if you do not like it; and you will in that case mix the ingredients as you please, except only that I would not wish to carry our requisition for your two Bills further than can be collected from the concluding words of this address, which you probably will think strong enough. But, whatever you determine upon, pray settle it with the Duke of Portland, and let me have the answer or the new draft by Saturday's post. We have fixed on Saturday the 21st as being more convenient than Wednesday. I cannot say how pleased I am with your Bills. I again beg that you will command my attendance if this puissant minority of eight should make you wish me to come up, and take a part in a measure which I approve so very highly, and which, as far as I can collect, is generally called for except by messieurs les intéressés. I trust that you have taken care, at the moment I write this, to check the meeting advertised for this day at Copenhagen house. I see your mails have arrived, and I know your clerks have other fish to fry than to write précis for idle fellows like me; but you courtiers should pity the booby ignorance of country gentlemen."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795] November 13, [Stowe].—"I return you the map with very many thanks, and have been occupying myself with tracing the very singular operations of Clairfait, who appears, in his pursuit of Jourdan to the Lahn, to have risked very much, if the latter had been strong enough to have checked the Austrians; for, in that case, the French army entrenched before Mayence, by crossing the Rhine below that town, would have taken Clairfait in reverse. His pursuit, however, with a part of his army as far as Cologne, whilst he returned with the other part, and attacked the entrenched camp, appears to have been one of the most brilliant blows ever struck. The difficulties of that last attack must have been beyond all calculation, and the loss to the French irreparable for very many months; and God knows they can, in their present state, very little afford to lose days, much less the months necessary to collect a force and materials for any similar attempt. I am sorry that Wurmsers attempt did not succeed more completely, for it appears equally well combined. I take it for granted that Mannheim will fall; and Clairfait's movements will accelerate Pichégru's retreat, and the surrender of that town; and it is probable that the garrison will be cut off from retreating to rejoin Pichégru; but, beyond this, I do not venture to hope for anything further, unless on the lower Rhine; where, I hope, they will be dispossessed of Dusseldorff, as that success will have its effect much more completely in the minds of the Hollanders and Brabanters than a victory in Suabia. And I cannot help indulging some hopes of a change of sentiment and of measure if the Rhine was completely Austrian, and a port so essential and so near was occupied by the Austrians.

"I wrote to you yesterday to enclose the draft of the address, which I trust you will return to me by to-morrow's post. I enclose a proxy which you will enter whenever you will; but I hope before the House of Commons' Bill makes its appearance in the House of Lords, I shall be able to bear my testimony to the wisdom of measures which I have so long and so earnestly wished for; and, in all events, I am glad to put my conscience on that and every other point ostensibly into your keeping.

"I have been obliged to send Frogatt to the printer of the True Briton, November 12, for the manuscript of a most impudent forgery, signed Nugent Buckingham, and offering 500*l.* reward for a paltry libel upon the whole race of Grenvilles, which I would not give 5 farthings to have kept out of every newspaper. I am only hurt at the possibility of being conceived to be so egregious a fool; for as to political sins, or indeed as to any other than are usually announced in a newspaper I am very callous. In point of fact I never heard of any such libel, nor has it ever existed save in this newspaper. I cannot say how happy I am to see the triumphant support given to your Bills. I believe most firmly that nine-tenths of the people are with you in sentiment upon the necessity of such a measure. You will probably pass them by commission the moment they are ready, for you see by all the Jacobin newspapers that the lecturers and societies are (what the jockeys term) running against time; and I think you should not, after recognising the necessity of protecting the King, suffer him to go to Parliament till the law is actually passed."

LORD GRENVILLE TO HENRY DUNDAS.

1795, November 13, [London].—"I enclose you a letter I have received from Sir C. Malet. I believe I once mentioned to you that I have no other reason for being interested in his favour than that he is of an old family in Somersetshire, and, as such, was known to my mother's family, and, I believe, originally sent out by their assistance. I have therefore no pretence or desire to solicit for him in this instance, but I should be glad to be enabled to answer his question as an attention due to a man of whom, as far as I remember of India affairs, we have always had reason to think well."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, November 14, Windsor.—"I cannot sufficiently approve of Lord Grenville's having declined taking the step of seeing Baron de Wimpffen till he had communicated to me the object of his coming. In the course of the summer I was astonished at the Duchess of Brunswick mentioning in a letter to me a desire of such an alliance, but knowing the brutal and other unpleasant qualities of this Prince, I could not give any encouragement to such a proposal. I therefore desire Lord Grenville will fairly tell him that I shall not consent to his request, and if he will not take a gentle hint, I have no objection to his adding that, after the very unhappy life my unfortunate niece led with him, I cannot as a father bequeath any daughter of mine on him."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, November 19, [Stowe].—"I have received your two letters and have altered a very loyal address from the corporation and inhabitants of Buckingham so as to meet your ideas, and we have just had our meeting, and signed it. The address from the county cannot be easily altered, because I have sent copies of that which was settled to several persons, and it would be difficult to alter it now, particularly as I have sent it to Sir J. Lovett, and have stated it to him as approved by his respectable correspondent. But I think that a petition to the House of Commons might likewise be proposed, and, if you agree with me, you had better prepare one and settle it with the Duke of Portland; and, if his friends understand that he acquiesces, the thing may be proposed by some other person less connected with Government than I am, and I will most heartily join in the support of it; but you must prepare it and send it down by a messenger to Aylesbury, directed to me, that I may have it engrossed and ready against the meeting. I shall be there by eleven o'clock.

"It seems clear that Fox conceives it necessary to keep the mob quiet, and the leaders, Mr. Thelwall and the others, probably acquiesce in order to engage the Whig Club to assist them. But when they see the whole thing desperate, you will have a serious struggle, and I do not doubt your firmness. I have taken care to have an attendance of friends at Aylesbury, and, under the idea of a meeting for a yeomanry address, I have requested that four or five might attend out of each troop besides the officers. This will add to our appearance, as the best part of the Aylesbury troop will attend. I enclose you the address which is to be proposed to them. I have set an Aylesbury address on foot, so that from our county you will have your share of loyalty."

Postscript.—"One advantage will arise from separating the petition from the address, and that is that the measure is more marked, and in case any attempt should be made hereafter to call a meeting to consider the Bills now in Parliament, it is parried by this petition which may be drawn so as [to] point at these very Bills.

"Pray show Captain T. Grenville the yeomanry address."

PRÉCIS of CORRESPONDENCE to and from BERLIN from September 4 to November 24 (sic), 1795.

London, September 4.—"Balau converses with Steinberg, who disapproves the rassemblement of Osnaburg. Blames the Duke of York, and laments the stay of the émigré corps in Hanover.

London, September 8.—"Speculations on the probability of a rupture between Great Britain and Spain.

London, September 11.—"A treaty of subsidy is negotiating between Great Britain and Austria.

London, September 11.—"Steinberg answers a note of Balau's; tells him that all the émigré corps are on the point of embarking, but says nothing of the English troops. Affairs of Corsica.

London, September 15.—"Reports of an approaching session. Supposed negotiations for a loan. Flourishing state of commerce in England. Irish affairs. Defenders.

London, September 18.—"Desandrouin returning to Vienna. The treaty of subsidy not settled, but he carries the proposals. Parliament to meet soon; 26 millions to be borrowed. American treaty suspended.

London, September 22.—"Affairs of Corsica; the British party the weakest there. Reports as to the cause of the passage of the Rhine by the French; said that the line of neutrality was violated by them and Prussian soldiers killed.

London, September 25.—"Steinberg repeats to him an official letter which he is to write him, stating that the King has ordered the Regency of Hanover to communicate to Berlin: 1, that all émigré and foreign troops shall leave the electorate; 2, that no more such troops shall be raised there; 3, that His Britannic Majesty adheres without reserve to the neutrality and engages to observe it carefully. The existence of the British troops in the electorate is not contrary to the neutrality because these troops have no hostile destination, but being to serve only for the safety of the states of the King, and his neighbours; they will commit no hostility, but will suffer none to be committed against them. Reasons upon this communication. Steinberg seems to apprehend that the French will attack the electorate.

London, September 29.—"Arrival of Monneron and reports of peace; seized with avidity by the public, who are tired with the war. One million taxes must be raised to pay interest of the intended loan.

Berlin, September 1.—"Extensive preparations making on the Lower Weser by Great Britain for an attack on Holland. Alarm on this subject at Berlin. Danger that the French will attack Hanover and Osnaburg. Has directed his ministers to inform the Regency that if attacked they will be left to their fate.

Berlin, September 7.—"Justifies the Prussian Minister at the Porte from the accusation of too close a connection with the Swedish and French missions. Russia has lately expressed her satisfaction at his conduct. Triple Alliance between Great Britain, Russia, and Austria is not completed. The Emperor makes overtures through Denmark for the peace of the Empire, and possibly for his own; and insinuates there that he has not acceded to the Triple Alliance.*

* This last fact is certainly false. G.

Berlin, September 13.—“Impolicy of the manifesto of Verona. Doubts of the success of Wurmser’s intended operations. Invasion of the Empire by the French. Prussian territory and line of neutrality respected by them.* Increased danger of the north of Germany. Has declared at Hanover that if the rassemblement continue he must either act by force to enforce the neutrality, or declare the line of demarcation void and of no effect. Balan is to make the same communication to Steinberg.

Berlin, September 21.—“Acknowledges letter of 4th September, which gives hopes that his representations will have their effect. Reports that England is inclined to peace. Trevor’s journey to Lausanne supposed to be for a conference with Barthélemy.”

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, November 30, Windsor.—“I rejoice at the surrender of Mannheim, and defeat of Pichégu by Marshal Clairfait, as I trust it will encourage the Court of Vienna to make such real efforts this winter as may enable Clairfait to open the next campaign very early. Indeed I think no problem in Euclid more true than that if the French are well pressed in the next year, their want of resources and other internal evils must make the present shocking chaos crumble to pieces.”

THE EARL OF MORNINGTON to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, November—December] Brightelmstone.—“If I had received your summons a few days sooner, I should have been able to make my arrangements so as to have obeyed it; but as I mean to leave this place for the season on Sunday or Monday, and have all my children with me, who are also to be packed off on the same day (and some must be stowed in my carriage) it is impossible for me at so short a notice to change my order of march. I will endeavour to get off on Sunday, and to be in London by dinner. If you should remain at Dropmore on Monday, let me know on Sunday night. If you come to town on Sunday or Monday, either you or Pitt can probably give me a dinner. Whatever questions occur to either of you which you think I can answer, you might note down at Dropmore, and send to me. Pitt knows the outline of my opinion on the present state of the question; nothing has happened to vary it much since I saw him at Walmer. If you mean to argue (which I suppose you must) that the present Government of France is more treatable than that which existed during the last session, your main difficulties will be to prove that it has more appearance of permanence, and that its views of ambition and aggrandisement are either lessened, or become of a less dangerous tendency.

“There can be no doubt that most of those mischievous principles of universal application to all Governments are entirely renounced by the new Constitution, which I have carefully compared with that of 1793; namely, Equality, Natural Rights of Men, Insurrection, Right of daily or rather hourly Revolution; the duties of men on the contrary are now declared to be founded in nature; the maintenance of property is a duty; no club government; no exercise of political rights but by legal assemblies; no mobs. There are also many provisions in the new Constitution which tend to give permanency to any Government formed under it; but my objection on this head is the force which has been employed to compel the people to adopt this Constitution, and the characters of those who have been thrust down the throats of the people by the decrees of 5th and 13th Fructidor.

"This species of violence leads to an argument against the permanence of the Government exactly of the same nature as that which was used against the system of terror. I know Pitt will say that it is the stability of our treaty and not of the Government to which we are to look; and that the cry in France being now for peace, any and every Government must maintain the treaty of peace. Is this a safe argument?

"Remember to let me know what your motions are; I shall probably be in town by five o'clock on Sunday."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, December, 1, Varel.—"Since my last (of the 24th) by accounts from various quarters, I have every reason to be confirmed in my opinion that the discontent is daily increasing in the Seven Provinces, and of course the weakness of the present Government. They have for the present suspended all proceedings against the persons they have so long detained in prison, the man who was appointed Attorney General to carry on the prosecutions having declined to act.

"A friend of ours, Mr. Van der Haer, one of the most popular and active members of the late Government in the Province of Friesland, where he has a strong party with which he corresponds, and which he influences, said a good deal to me this morning with respect to the corps to be formed under Prince Frederick, and I thought his observations deserved some notice. We had some conversation on the same subject, when the orders came from General Dundas to discontinue all recruiting for this corps. He said that, though at first he was concerned this order had been given as tending to check the desertion in the army of the Republic, which at any rate was an advantage, the reasons which had dictated the order, which he did not know, might be very satisfactory; that he wrote to his friends to desire them not to think England withdrew her support, but that the change of situation from the successes of the Austrians and other causes very likely made it more desirable the well-intentioned should remain in the country where their presence might be of great use if it became necessary to act. He understood from the person with whom Prince Frederick desired him to correspond that a second order was arrived from England to pay the corps from fortnight to fortnight, and that there were reasons to expect this payment would shortly be entirely discontinued and the corps dismissed. He observed that, though he never expected so much from this corps as many people did, having once been collected under the protection of England, and many of the persons that compose it having been induced to leave the country in consequence of its formation, there would be a great hardship in leaving them in this situation without support or protection. That it would lessen the dependence of the army on the House of Orange, and hurt the reputation of Prince Frederick, whose name had contributed to bring them together, and who would incur great unpopularity and a good deal of odium from their sudden dismissal; and, lastly, that besides lessening the confidence on the support of England, and furnishing a handle to her enemies, there was some chance of throwing, by the step I allude to, a very great number of officers and other men connected with every part of the Republic, into the power of Prussia, who might not, perhaps, be sorry in this manner to court popularity at the expense of England, which could be no advantage to the cause. Talking with him of the Court of Berlin, he said that he had consented to communicate with that Court, and more particularly since the Hereditary Prince was there, because he had been given to understand in the most positive manner that they acted in concert with England; that he went on upon this idea, but that he never could reconcile himself to any plan that might exclude England; that, whatever circumstances might take place, his constant endeavours would be to thwart any means that might occasion or prolong the separation of the two countries; and that he should be happy to communicate to his friends everything that might forward the views of England in opposition to France, and that I might name him where I thought it could be of service. I thought it right to say so much, as Mr. Van der Haer is a man of considerable property, connected with some of the most independent people in his Province, and a tried, zealous, and able partisan of the House of Orange; and influences by far the most considerable party in Friesland, to whom we may attribute that things are so well managed there. I thought it right to state this to your Lordship, as it is possible you may think this gentleman, who is exceedingly active and quick, may be of service. And it is impossible to act more fairly and to be a better Englishman than he is. As to his hopes from the Court of Berlin I cannot say I share them; nor shall I believe anything will come from that quarter favourable to the cause unless I hear so from my friends in England. Had I more to say than I have I should act with the greatest reserve and caution with respect to that Court, though I am open to conviction if I am told by my friends in England that I am mistaken. At the same time I am thankful for the good offices of those persons at Berlin who have taken steps with respect to M. de Rhoon which have certainly contributed to save him from worse treatment. But hitherto I have not felt inclined to say a syllable to anyone I know there but as far as related to M. de Rhoon, at the time we were most uneasy for him. Nor shall I depart from the line I have taken unless I hear to the contrary from your Lordship or some of my friends in England who are acting on the same system.

"I cannot help observing that I have not been favoured with a line from your Lordship since the end of April. I know, however, how very little time you have left for any private correspondence."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, December 4, Varel.—"I closed my last (of the 1st inst.) by mentioning how very cautious I was of being drawn into any correspondence at Berlin relating to the affairs of the Seven Provinces, any farther than taking notice of the situation of M. de Rhoon at the time we were most uneasy on his account. That very situation and our former connections with that Court might otherwise easily have led me to communications on the subject, particularly as some of our friends, one of whom I took notice of, are in the supposition that some concert does exist between the two Courts (of London and Berlin) with respect to the United Provinces. I have but too many reasons to entertain my doubts as to this supposition, whatever it may arise from; and shall continue to observe the most perfect silence, and induce others to do so as far as I can, on the hopes of assistance from that quarter in all correspondence with our friends within the country, unless I hear to the contrary from your Lordship, or by your orders. I speak with diffidence, as I am aware my information is imperfect. But I do not like what I hear of the language held at Berlin, where blame is thrown upon everything that comes from England, with an evident jealousy of her interference, and of the successes of the Austrians, the only circumstance at this moment that could possibly have led to a change in our favour. I should be very happy to know something more positive on this point, that in case some reserve may still be proper, I may continue to pursue the line I have taken; or even open the eyes of those who are going on with the idea of a concert; and that we may thwart any measures calculated to exclude England, and gradually to throw the Republic into the arms of her enemies. If this could be the plan of the Court of Berlin I should not only wish to see her checked, but I should see with pleasure that steps were taken by the powers in alliance with Great Britain to prevent her interfering in any shape whatever in the affairs of the United Provinces. At the same time that, if it was possible for once that that Court should take a fair, decided, and consistent part, they certainly have it in their power to terminate shortly the oppression and misfortunes of that country.

“I have the following circumstances to add to what I have mentioned before with respect to the disposition of the people. The clubs at Leuwarden, and throughout Friezland, are so dissatisfied with the Representatives that they have said openly they would proclaim the Prince, and would rather submit to his authority than to such a set of men. The Representatives place so little confidence in the military that, with a few exceptions, they are not allowed to appear in the streets with their sabres. In collecting the votes of the inhabitants upon the question whether a National Convention for the Seven Provinces should take place or not, the well-intentioned kept away in most places, and in others not a man appeared to give a vote; and in the generality of meetings, not above one, two, or eight and ten at most, appeared for the affirmative. This I have from Mr. Van der Haer, whom I met lately, and it is confirmed by others.”

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, December 8, Varel.—“The alarm spread among the adherents of the present Government of the United Provinces by the late interrupted successes of the Austrians was easily foreseen. They are aware how fatal the interference of England, aided by such powerful means, is likely to prove to their unsettled authority; and they are now endeavouring by all imaginable artifices to excite suspicions and jealousies of those two Powers, should they have it in their hands, by the overthrow of the present system, to settle the affairs of the Seven Provinces according to their own views. It is not my intention to detain your Lordship with the detail of all these idle artifices; and, should the fears of cabal be realised by their fall, the event will show the falsehood of all their insinuations and assertions. But, as they were taken notice of in a number of letters from our friends within the Republic, I thought it right some answer should be given to them for their satisfaction. I had some conversation on the subject with Mr. Van der Haer, whom I mentioned in my last, his friends having alluded to this subject in their letters. I suggested to him several points upon which I thought he might lay a stress with safety and effect, and inclose a translation of a letter he wrote in consequence to his friends within the country, among many others written with the same view; in some of which he insists still more strongly on his confidence on the support of Great Britain, and her efforts to restore the independence of the Seven Provinces, and reunite them with all their possessions under the auspices of the House of Orange. I should not say so much about Mr. Van der Haer if I did not know that he may be of great service to the cause by his zeal, his indefatigable activity, his quickness, and the number of considerable persons in his Province and in the Republic who place confidence in him. His popularity in his own Province is founded upon the only true ground; he has not, like so many others, endeavoured to gain a momentary influence by flattering the passions of the multitude, but he has constantly endeavoured to gain confidence by a fair and open line of public conduct, and by his adherence to his principles; and in this he has succeeded so far that, should the moment come, he is assured of the most active support from a very great number of persons in his Province, who are all ready to declare at a moment's notice, but will not stir without his directions. This party is so strong within itself, and by its connections in the neighbouring Province of Groningen, as to [be] well worth attending to. I have to regret that, by the circumstances of the moment, I am deprived of all free communication with the persons in the Province of Holland who might be of the greatest service to the cause there; and, still more so, by the intimacy and confidence that subsisted between them and the party I have been alluding to. I should not forget to mention that Mr. Van der Haer came into the government of his Province (Friesland) in the year 1779; and that from that moment to this hour he has always been firm and consistent, from habits and principle, in his attachment to the House of Orange and the English interest; that he resisted for three months the proposals of a separate peace with France, and left the country at last, not to be a party in the capitulation, and with the intention of co-operating to the utmost of his power to bring about the deliverance of his country; and that he had previously taken all the necessary measures with his friends for that purpose, as he intimated to the Prince of Orange as soon as he left his Province. By the bye, I do not believe he ever received an answer till some months afterwards, when Prince Frederick came over. Mr. Van der Haer and his friends are, many of them at least, men of affluent circumstances, who act from attachment to the cause, and to the House of Orange, and aversion to the usurpers and their system. As Mr. Van der Haer is somewhat awkward in his appearance and manners, with a degree of formality, and some provincial habits, I am well aware there are persons who may throw some ridicule upon him; but this does not alter what I have been saying, and will not prevent his being of great service, if properly guided. I mentioned in my last that he had gone on with the idea of some concert between London and Berlin. He said since that, without entering into that question, he should be very glad if, whilst they were hesitating and putting off at Berlin from day to day, the Austrians, acting in concert with England, made a sufficient progress to bring about a change without any other assistance. And he agreed with me that, should they recover the Netherlands, nothing was more likely to happen, even before the arrival of any troops to support the well-intentioned, such was the general disposition of the people. He has taken care that his friends at least should be prepared to look upon the Austrians as friends. There are other persons of my acquaintance who have done the same, and I, for my part, shall carefully avoid naming the Prussians unless I hear from your Lordship to the contrary. I need scarcely say that the hints I gave Mr. Van der Haer for his letter are chiefly an application of the principles of a work too generally known and celebrated in England to make it necessary to name the author to your Lordship. This at any rate can do no harm, though I am well aware that general reasonings, however excellent, will not alone operate counter-revolutions. I depend much more on the divisions of the present rulers amongst themselves, on the evident symptoms of confusion and despondency in all their proceedings, on the decided and growing aversion of the people, confirmed daily by all the accounts we receive. This aversion will break out sooner or later. It is to be hoped the moment will not be left to chance, but that things may be so managed that it may happen at the same time in all the chief places in the country. I am only sorry I have it not in my power to be of greater service to the cause; and I beg your Lordship will not believe I attach much importance to the little I have had to communicate, but will consider it as a proof that I do not lose sight of my object, and shall neglect no opportunity that may offer of being of more use than I have been hitherto, from the unfavourable circumstances of the moment, which deprive me of the assistance of many of our friends, and oblige us to some caution as long as things remain in this situation.

"I shall be thankful for any suggestions your Lordship may think of service; the more so as it is very long since I have been favoured with a line."

M. VAN DER HAER'S LETTER.

1795, December 5.—"I have received yours of the 2nd December, and had received similar representations from other people. I am glad I find myself enabled to repel and, by your means, to point out to the well-intentioned the machinations encouraged by narrow views with respect to England. I can assure you upon my honour that the English Government has no other object in view by its interference than to restore our Republic to her integrity and independence. That they will endeavour to bring this about by all means, even by sacrifices; and that the conclusion will demonstrate the truth of this. In fact the system of commerce and navigation gradually adopted in England is as liberal as her system of politics is superior to the French innovations; and her enlarged views are far above the narrow-minded system of our merchants.

"England is not the friend of monopoly. In England the prevailing opinion is that a country whose prosperity depends chiefly upon its manufactures, and the superiority of its productions, finds the greatest advantage in a free trade; but that this must be established gradually to prevent the ruin of those whose existence depends upon the old exploded system of monopoly. England feels that rich neighbours are more like to afford a market for her produce; and that even the shipping of her neighbours may be advantageous in time of peace, and necessary in time of war. In time of peace because a part of her capitals are more advantageously employed in manufactures than in any other branches of trade; and in time of war because, by means of neutral ships, her manufactures and productions may be exported with little risk, and without heavy insurance, and the sailors employed more advantageously to man the fleet. Upon this system is partly founded the treaty of commerce with France; upon this system is founded the last treaty of commerce with America, by which even the trade of the East Indies is left open to that nation under certain conditions. With respect to Holland, the leading people in England are not likely to wish to take from Holland what persuasion of the greater advantages of other branches of commerce has induced them to grant to other nations; and the carrying trade, and all the advantages Holland derives from this chief branch of her trade, may even be of service to England in our hands, for many of the reasons above assigned. With respect to the Colonies, the object of Great Britain is equally fair. I can assure you she has engaged herself of her own accord to restore all these possessions with the restoration of the Republic, should they fall into her hands; that it was the intention to have done so had a part only of the Republic been saved; and that she has accordingly acted in this as a good ally. But I must beg in general you will not compare an Englishman with a Frenchman. This is comparing light with darkness.

"As to the rassemblement, this will all come round, and from that point it is not fair to draw any conclusions unfavourable to the cause. This is enough. I can assure you, and all the well-intentioned, that you may depend upon the good faith and cordiality of England; and all the contrary reports must be looked upon as the last efforts of an enemy who feels his approaching fall, and will be still more convinced of it before long."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, December 11, Varel.—"When I mentioned in my last letters the existence of a strong and popular party in the Provinces of Friesland and Groningen, conducted by men of property, and known by their attachment to the House of Orange, and to the ancient form of government, and with a considerable share of activity and talents, it was not my intention to stop there. I should not forget taking notice first of a circumstance which increases the confidence that may be placed in them. Mr. Van der Haer, and a friend of his upon whom he relies implicitly, and may as far as I can judge from every circumstance, but who does not know anything of my correspondence, are two of the chief persons of that party. They both possess a large landed property in the Province of Friesland, which they have left for the purpose of carrying on a correspondence with their friends and relations within. Hitherto the correspondence has been conducted with so much fidelity and secrecy on the part of those who have been employed in it that their property has not only been left untouched, though no doubt the Revolutionists would have been happy in a pretence to seize upon it; but that I do not believe that any one person connected with this party has yet been exposed to any inconveniency from their proceedings, though certainly attended with some degree of hazard. Having mentioned this material circumstance, I shall come to the point I have in view.

"I have seen, as I mentioned before, by a number of letters that the animosity of the nation against the revolutionary government is so great, that nothing but the fear of the French, and the uncertainty of external support, has hitherto checked the inclination of the country to rise against their oppressors. This fear of the French is giving way gradually to more manly sentiments with every fresh defeat of the Republican armies; and with the opinion that begins to prevail strongly in all parts of the country, that the Powers engaged in the war will take the first favourable opportunity of putting an end to the influence of the French of the Seven Provinces, and to the usurpation which is founded upon it. But how this is to be done is what the information and conjectures of the people within seem to be divided upon. Some look to Austria; others speak with confidence of Prussia; some even of Russia; though all look to England as the spring, the soul, of all that is going on. The conviction of her superiority more than counterbalances the bad effects that might otherwise result from the artful reports that are industriously spread by her enemies, and encouraged by her pretended friends. So far all is well in one respect, that the inhabitants look to foreign assistance with impatience, though not without anxiety. I have seen lately a letter from a person employed in the correspondence, dated early in December, which mentions that in Guelderland, Overysse, Groningen, Friesland, and Drenthe, all is going on so well that, should a small corps of Prussians march towards the frontier with the rasselement were it armed, and should the King of Prussia only say that the Prince of Orange had ceded to him Loo, Soestdyk, Oranjewoud, and the palace of Leuwarden (the property of the Prince in these Provinces) under certain conditions, and that he (the King of Prussia) insisted upon being put in possession of them in the state they were in previous to the departure of the Prince of Orange, this semblance of support, without marching a man into the country, would give so much confidence to the Prince's friends that a change might be brought about without the least effort. Whether this would be a proper mode of interfering whilst a treaty and a guarantee exist, of which the operation may be ostensibly considered as only suspended by an imperious necessity, but which furnish a strong direct and consistent plea for interfering from public and not private and personal considerations, seems to me not to admit of a discussion. At the same time I do not pretend to say that there is not great probability of the event turning out in the manner alluded to. But why should the Prussians interfere at all? Why should we run the risk of being again deceived? Why should the United Provinces again be placed under an influence which experience has proved to be pernicious, and to afford so little security? And how do we know that they will act in concert with England when not subsidised? and when they do not consider themselves as bound by treaty, and bound by the most solemn engagements? I speak sub spe rati.

"I take the advantage of the present situation of things to be this; that as all parties within the Seven Provinces, except the Revolutionists and their few adherents, look to an external military force acting in concert with England for their deliverance from oppression, with a good deal of indifference, according to some, whether Austrians, Prussians, or Russians if they do but succeed, England has the choice among the powers really disposed to take a part. Were I to follow my inclination, and the impulse of the moment, I could wish the Prussians quite left out. I should even be happy if they were prevented interfering in any shape whatever in the affairs of the Seven Provinces. This would be more easy as though a good many people look to them from their late influence, from the journey of the Hereditary Prince of Orange to Berlin, from the habit of looking upon them as necessary to succeed, yet I am convinced no one would regret they were excluded; and no set of libels and hand-bills ever were so violent and malicious as what are actually circulated in the Republic against the Court of Berlin, without sparing the first personages of that Court. Under these circumstances the moment is perhaps very favourable to exclude them entirely; and it would be a proper return for the breach of their engagements, though certainly a very mild retribution. Whether it will [be] advisable or practicable to leave them out is not for me to determine. But, should it be thought so, and should the further successes of the Emperor's arms give a certainty of support from that quarter, should M. de Clerfaut's army recover the Netherlands and approach the frontier of the Seven Provinces sufficiently to be able to co-operate with the well-intentioned, I am sure the four Provinces above-mentioned will declare for the Prince of Orange on the first appearance of support. M. Van der Haer, whose friends are armed and ready, told me that, should the moment come, he would undertake the business in the Provinces of Friezland and Groningen with a few thousand Prussians or Austrians, particularly if done in concert with England. As he is able, writes well, and is in the habit of drawing up papers and resolutions, and perfectly versed in all the forms of the Government, and with a great deal of popular eloquence, he would be of great service in the first moment. He is so sure of his friends' support that, should the time come, he offers to go with the detachments and to conduct them, and answers for the event. The possession of these Provinces, the immediate calling together of the States-General which would be the consequence, and the apparent certainty of all the other Provinces, the majority at least, following the example very soon, are so evident that I shall say no more on this point than repeating my wish that the further successes of the Austrians may soon enable us to try the experiment. I know that at Utrecht things are in that situation, and the chief people so tired out, and so impatient of a change, by the accounts even of persons who were formerly violent enemies of the House of Orange, that the Austrians would be well received; and my second brother who is here, and was in the Government and States of that Province would, I am sure, without hesitation accompany any Austrian troops that were sent on that expedition, that they might be received and looked upon as friends.

"Your Lordship may easily imagine that I would not lightly recommend any measures of this nature. I speak in the supposition of the Austrians not only making further progress, but being in a state to keep their ground. I would not lightly recommend it were it only for the risk I should expose M. de Rhoon and other persons to who are in the hands of their enemies. But should the French be entirely cut off from the United Provinces by the Austrian army, I should not hesitate a moment pressing the measures I allude to, as I am sure from what has passed that, far from their venturing upon any act of violence against M. de Rhoon, he would soon be out of their hands and at the head of his friends.

"I have to add that few things would make me more happy than to be authorised by your Lordship to go to M. de Clerfait's headquarters and to mention to him all I have taken the liberty of saying in this letter. I should be happy to receive letters to that officer with instructions authorising me to communicate with him on the subject; and, were I not afraid of being taxed with presumption, I should press this much more seriously on your attention. The confidence and good opinion shown me at various times by your Lordship and some of his [your?] colleagues will serve as an apology for having said so much. The paper I had the honour of receiving before I left England, which I have constantly kept in view to guide me in the line I have pursued, will account sufficiently for the language I hold in this letter. The line I have been, in a manner, instructed to take I shall continue to persevere in unless I hear to the contrary. I should be very happy if the latter part of the above observations was thought to deserve any attention, and if I had thus the opportunity of being more active than I have been hitherto. Should I be thought too sanguine, I have to beg your indulgence for having unnecessarily taken up so much of your time.

"I have taken every precaution not to let any part of this transpire, and to touch with the greatest prudence the subject of the interference of Berlin, which is the more delicate for me as it no doubt may have some influence upon M. de Rhoun's position. I have had the more reason not to trouble myself much about the prevailing idea that the Court in question will interfere in concert with the other powers, that, for the moment, this idea clearly serves our cause by intimidating the adverse party. M. Van der Haer, to whom I have only suggested doubts on the subject without endeavouring to undeceive him, is strongly impressed with the existence of a concert, but still more with the conviction that no good can arise from the interference of that Court without that concert between London and Berlin. In this system he has been invariable. Nor does he look upon the former conduct of the Prussian Government as giving them a right to dictate to the friends of the House of Orange the time or the means by which is to be brought about a change which becomes every day more pressing and more necessary; and, if put off much longer, must end in the total ruin of a country, the inhabitants of which are the victims of a weak and inefficient Government and a concourse of the most disastrous circumstances.

"I have been so cautious that though Mr. Van der Haer, knowing the confidence shown me in England at different times, authorises me as well as my brother to name them and dispose of them according to the views detailed in this letter, they do not know exactly what I have written nor that I have written to your Lordship. I have purposely satisfied myself with proposing to them the outline of what I have been stating as likely to happen; and they assured me positively, and I know I can depend upon them, that they will be ready at all events to take the part I have mentioned.

"Here the matter rests in suspense and unknown to any one. I earnestly beg an answer from your Lordship. If you decline you will hear no more of it, nor will any inconveniency whatever arise from the refusal to any other measures that may be depending. I shall even be happy in any suggestions to the contrary which may be of service to direct our friends. If the proposals should meet with your approbation I shall be glad at any time to receive further orders. I have every reason to think that every enterprise may be kept in this suspense in the Provinces I allude to for a few months longer, without any great inconveniency, provided we receive from time to time some information to enable us to keep up the hopes of our friends. I thought this letter of too delicate a nature to be trusted to the post. I have sent it to Mr. Fraser by a safe hand, begging he will forward it by the earliest opportunity. If the answer is not in cipher, I wish it may not be sent here from Hamburgh by the post should it contain anything that might involve the safety of my friends, or be imprudent to divulge.

"I have to beg your Lordship will observe M. Van der Haer (Van Campen van Nieuwland) whom I have been mentioning is a different person from M. de Haren, another member of the former Government of the same Province. They have both been here ever since January last. I have not for many reasons let him, Mr. de Haren, into the confidence, though both zealous for the House of Orange. It would have been attended with great inconveniency from a variety of reasons. Mr. de Haren, besides, is by no means popular in his Province. He is too apt to be suddenly elated or depressed with good or bad news; and I am not sure he would have kept the secret with that degree of strictness which, if not required by the importance of the subject, is, at any rate, so essential with respect to the safety and property of many of our friends, that the least doubt on the subject is a sufficient reason for silence.

"I shall be very impatient of an answer ; and indeed could wish to receive from time [to time] some communications on the subject of my letters from your Lordship or Mr. Goddard, as it certainly would enable me to be of more service.

Postscript.—"I think it necessary to add that, should the further successes of the Austrians authorise us to entertain the hope of their being carried to the extent mentioned above, so as to leave no doubt of their being able without any further assistance to effect the overthrow of the present Government, in that case I should be happy to see Prince Frederick of Orange with the Austrians, and at the head of the enterprise I take the liberty of suggesting ; and that he should have all the honour and popularity attending the success. In that case I need scarcely say that M. Van der Haer and my brother are at the Prince's orders to dispose of them according to emergencies. In that case it may be right for me to give up the idea of my going to M. de Clerfait's army, though I should be equally and even more ready to go if it was wished."

M. REGNIER TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, December 15, London.—"J'ai prié Mr. Aust de vous annoncer une note sur les hommes qui se trouvent aujourd'hui à la tête du Gouvernement en France. J'ai l'honneur de vous remettre cette note. Vous me permettrez de vous l'adresser directement. J'ai l'intérêt qu'elle ne soit connue que de vous. Je me flatte que vous approuveriez mes motifs, si vous m'accordez la faveur de vous les faire connaître.

"L'étendue de pouvoir accordé au Directoire Exécutif, l'état dont on l'a environné, vous ont sûrement fait juger que l'ambition de ceux qui le composent doit être satisfaite, et qu'il n'est aucuns moyens de séduction possibles auprès d'eux ; la connaissance de leurs caractères me semble devoir vous confirmer cette opinion. Les ministres, par les motifs contraires, offrent bien plus de prise. Une autre considération importante et qui ne vous a sûrement point échappé, c'est que le Directoire étant un être collectif, dont les délibérations, les résolutions, et la responsabilité sont communes, on n'aurait rien obtenu tant que tous les membres ne sont point d'accord de se laisser gagner. Chaque ministre, au contraire, est seul ordonnateur dans son département, et tout se passe dans le secret.

"Si, ce que je ne présume pas, la crainte rendait les ministres sourds aux propositions qui pourraient leur être faites, on doit tout attendre des premiers commis. Il en est plusieurs dont, moi, je répondrais.

"Je désire que la note que j'ai l'honneur de vous adresser, puisse vous prouver mon désir de vous être agréable. Je vous demande votre indulgence. Vous êtes fait pour sentir qu'il est des développements que je n'ai pu me permettre dans la crainte de vous fatiguer par les détails."

DIRECTOIRE EXÉCUTIF.

Barras.—Gentilhomme de Provence, révolutionnaire par système et par sentiment. De la force et de la détermination dans le caractère ; peu de talents ; d'un esprit médiocre. La nature lui a donné de la rudesse et de la sévérité, la Révolution l'a rendu féroce et sanguinaire.

"Il était dans la seconde Assemblée Nationale au parti républicain ; mais il n'y joua aucun rôle jusqu'à l'arrivée des Marseillais à Paris, époque à laquelle il s'associa à tous les crimes que cette horde commit dans la capitale. Son influence en Provence lui fit donner une mission près de l'armée qu'on envoya contre Toulon. Ses liaisons avec Fréron et Tallien le firent comprendre dans la liste de proscription de Robespierre. Une certaine audace dans les résolutions, un grand courage dans leur exécution, placèrent Barras parmi les chefs du parti qui précipita Robespierre.

" Il est difficile de se rien promettre d'un caractère arrogant, qui s'irrite des obstacles, dont la seule ambition, celle du pouvoir, se trouve satisfaite.

" Carnot.--Ancien officier dans le corps du Génie, distingué par ses talents militaires. Le besoin qu'on avait de lui pour la conduite de la guerre l'a seul soustrait au sort de tous les autres membres du Comité de Salut-Public de Robespierre. Il a des principes exagérés, un caractère haineux et vindicatif. On aurait pu tirer parti de son mécontentement s'il n'eut point été nommé au Direction Exécutif; mais une fois placé là, il s'emparera du Département de la Guerre, et s'y livrera entièrement.

" Rewbell.--Homme sans talents et très opiniâtre. Il est convaincu que le Cabinet de St. James entretient de nombreux agents en France auxquels il attribue tous les mouvements qui se manifestent contre l'ordre actuel des choses.

" La Réveillère L'Époux.--C'est un homme attrabilaire, craintif, et sans ambition de fortune ni de pouvoir; proscrit par Robespierre pour avoir protesté contre la journée du 31 Mai, 1793. Sa rentrée dans la Convention fut remarquable par son opposition au parti Jacobin. Dans les derniers moments de la Convention la peur l'a jetté dans le parti qui voulait ramener la terreur.

" Le Tourneur.--Homme extrêmement médiocre, ancien officier auxiliaire de la marine, et qui par cette raison se croit propre à rétablir la marine Française.

MINISTRES.

Affaires Étrangères.

" La Croix.--Homme de beaucoup d'esprit, très instruit en finances et en administration. Dès sa jeunesse, il fut distingué par M. Turgot, qui se l'attacha comme principal secrétaire à l'Intendance de Limoges. Il lui confia la place de premier secrétaire du Contrôle Général lorsqu'il fut appelé au Ministère des Finances. La Croix fut accusé d'avoir reçu de l'argent pour faire accorder la direction du spectacle de Lyons. M. de Maurépas demanda son renvoi à M. Turgot, qui le défendit longtems. Il céda enfin aux importunités, et La Croix fut renvoyé la veille du jour où le Roi fit redemander à M. Turgot le portefeuille des Finances. C'est à l'espèce d'acharnement que la Cour montra alors contre La Croix qu'il faut attribuer sa conduite révolutionnaire. Sa haine personnelle pour le Roi lui a fait voter la mort de le Prince.

" La nature des connaissances de La Croix, et ses travaux antérieurs le rendaient plus propre au Ministère de l'Intérieur ou à celui des Finances. En homme sage, il a évité ce dernier poste; en homme habile, il a fait nommer au Ministère de l'Intérieur Benezek, dont il dispose entièrement. La Croix n'est exagéré que dans sa haine pour les prêtres. Il ne croyait point à la durée de la République, et il s'attendait à une fin sinistre. Il le disait à ses amis.

“ La Croix a des mœurs, un caractère sage, un extérieur calme que rien n'émeut, et qui le rend impénétrable. L'amour de l'argent est la seule passion que je lui connaisse. Il y a sacrifié dans tous les temps ; et dernièrement encore, il a eu besoin de tout son talent pour sauver l'homme dont il s'était servi lors de sa mission pour la vente des meubles des maisons Royales. Il n'est pas douteux qu'on le déciderait avec de l'argent. Il y a dans le Département deux Secrétaires-Généraux et un chef de Bureau, dont je suis assuré.

• Ministre de l'Intérieur.

Finances.

La Guerre.

La Marine.

French.

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, December 22.—“I send you a cover with two enclosures, one a small account of M. d'Ivernois, which perhaps belongs rather to the Treasury.

“I mention, however, upon this occasion, a suggestion of his of the advantage that this country might derive, or more properly the common cause, by the possession of some periodical work on the Continent, in which the intentions and conduct of the allies should be fairly set forth; and a proposal for this purpose of assisting, at a very small expense, a work about to be established on that plan by a Mr. Pictet of Geneva, a man well known in the literary world, and who, he says, is perfectly well-disposed to this country. The sum which he conceived to be necessary to enable Mr. Pictet to carry his plan into execution is so small as not to be an object of a moment's consideration; and I cannot but think that the advantage of such a work which, without being under the direction of Government, might in general be in conformity to its views, would be very considerable.

“The last object which I have to mention, and the second of the two papers enclosed, is a collection of memorandums from M. de Moustier relative to his mission, and which you may like to look over previous to your seeing him. They are drawn up, as you will probably think, with too much diplomatic formality; but from this, after having given in that respect a cast of his art, he seems perfectly willing to relax.

“Some of his provisions seem to me perfectly good. It will be certainly right to settle some rate at which we would be willing to purchase the possession of the places which he enumerates, and to enable him, either by a deposit in his hands or by a credit on certain houses, to make good the necessary payments. A similar provision should, I apprehend, be made, under certain restrictions, for the securing pay to any of the Republican troops. I have no apprehension for my own part that M. de Moustier is not perfectly to be trusted. His fault is that he is apt to be too busy, and to suppose that when he is not idle, he must be doing good.

“Upon this occasion, and with a view to the prospects that are every day opening in that country, I cannot but lament what seems to be the determination of the Cabinet that no derangement is to be made, however inconsiderable, of the general naval service for the sake of keeping possession of Quiberon. The fleet once withdrawn, it is perfectly possible that the enemy will take possession of it, and by stationing a few ships in proper places, and assisting them with gun-boats and batteries on shore, make it impossible for us ever afterwards to have any use of that station. How far this will be advantageous for the mere naval service may well be a question; but I am sure if the consequence must be, as it must, the total interception of all means of communicating with and aiding the Royalists, the general loss to the interests of the war will be such as no naval advantages, were they ten times greater than they can be hoped to be, will ever compensate. Unless it shall be the opinion of naval officers, which the accounts that I have received formerly from French naval officers does not lead me to expect, that the enemy may always be dislodged from there, I, for one, must protest strongly against that station being given up. Should the enemy, upon Admiral Harvey's coming away, slip in a few ships of the line from Orient, there is an end of all hopes of landing M. de Moustier, and much more, any of the stores which it will be desirable to send with him. There will be an end, too, if they cannot be displaced, of any further effectual support to be given to the enemies of the Republic in that quarter."

THE EARL OF ELGIN TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1795, December 26, Berlin.—"The anxiety I feel to put your Lordship accurately in possession of the sentiments of this Court, on the several questions to which your Lordship directed my attention, has led me to be extremely prolix in my public letters. I must trust for your indulgence, in consideration of my motive. In those letters I have only given the opinions which I received directly from the Ministers, but the tendency of them has been confirmed to me from various quarters.

"As to the dispositions of the individual members of Government, of the King, and of his secret advisers, they remain, so far as I learn, what your Lordship knows them to have been. Count Haugwitz, the only efficient minister, not absolutely untrue to the principles on which he concerted the negotiation with Lord Malmesbury; Count Finckenstein and Baron Alvensleben having no decided line in regard to the danger from France, and supporting M. Struensee's firm opposition, founded on the wants of Treasury. M. Bischoffswerder and other personal friends of the King agree in this with M. Struensee; and the general temper of the army is against the war with France. The King himself is, evidently, a well-wisher to the cause of the allies, and would be happy that his army should bear an active part in accomplishing their object.

"Neither the Ministers nor the King made any direct mention to me of a subsidy from England; and I can assure your Lordship that I have not made the most remote reference to it. On comparing, however, what I collect from all quarters, I can have no doubt that, if it is wished to secure to the coalition the assistance of Prussia, it will be found requisite to afford some pecuniary aid, or hold out some positive indemnification, without which any favourable dispositions which exist here can certainly not obtain a decided superiority.

"Perhaps your Lordship may perceive some benefit from desiring M. Woronzow and M. Stahremberg to write to the Austrian and Russian ministers residing here, and to state the degree of confidence and concert in which the three Courts now act. I suggest this from no disappointment in this respect since my arrival; as Prince Reuss came to me immediately, and has repeatedly, within this week, brought me what he considered as material intelligence; and I have no doubt to meet also with confidence from the Russian mission, when I become more acquainted. But a line from these Ministers in England, stating how they are treated, would probably be more effectual than any assurances I can give, as a claim to a communication of their information. I did, indeed, wait on Count Stahremberg and M. Woronzow in London for this purpose; but Count Stahremberg has forgot to write Prince Reuss, and I was unfortunate in not finding M. Woronzow at home.

"There is little doubt of the good wishes of the Empress of Russia for the restoration of the Stadholder. But is it your Lordship's opinion that we have to expect so far the co-operation of the Emperor for bringing forward the King of Prussia on this occasion, as to justify my making every communication upon it to the Austrian Minister?"

C. BENTINCK to Mr. GODDARD.

1795, December 29, [Varel].—"The following abstracts from different letters lately received will confirm what has been lately communicated from this place. The commission sent by the new States-General to the provinces of Friezland and Groningen in order to bring them over to the plan for a National Convention adopted in Holland, has completely failed in those Provinces, where the plan has been rejected. The perplexity the new rulers are under is so great that they apply in these Provinces to the members of the ancient government for support and protection.

"General Dumonceau and others have been at Leuwarden. 12,000,000 gulden have been required for the defence of the country, besides 1,000,000 by the West India Committee, and no money is to be found. The Ministers of the Cabal write from Paris that the French Government were determined to conclude a peace at any price. That they would not lose sight of the alliance with Holland. But that they must call back their troops, as they wanted them themselves.

"That it was strongly reported some negotiation was going on at Paris between the Prince of Orange and the present Government to bring about a change. (This seems very improbable.)

"The French have left the Nieuwe Schants in Groningen, and been replaced by a Dutch garrison.

"A professor at Groningen has received a letter from his father, who is a member of the Committee of General Confederation at the Hague, which contains the following remarkable expressions. The game is up; the ancient constitution will be re-established. May we but obtain our pardon from our enemies. A schoolmaster at the same place received a letter from the father of one of his pupils recommending his son and answering for the usual payments, though he (the father) will be under the necessity of leaving the country.

"Van der Steeg, a leading revolutionist at Groningen, has been sending part of his property out of the country; 30,000 gulden have been seized at Delftziel.

"The Dutch papers talk of the revolts in the French armies. Some of the French troops in Groningen refused lately to march to the Rhine, if some of the Dutch did not go with them. Neither of them show any inclination to fight the battles of the new Government.

"A friend of ours in Friezland had made a plan to bring off about 80 English seamen, whose ship was wrecked on that coast. He had given out they were Americans, had actually secured fishing boats for that purpose, and a pilot who spoke English. But it was discovered. He afterwards spoke to the French Commandant in the Province, and, by his means, prevented their being put in a common prison, and procured every attention to be shown to the officer or officers. What is singular is that the person I am speaking of is still in Friezland unmolested.

"In different parts of the country the inhabitants refuse to contribute for the payment of the armed force. In Friezland the national guards who, as I have mentioned in a former letter, have refused to march to the frontier, alleging they were only levied for the internal tranquillity, now refuse to take the oath that forms a part of the new plan for their organisation. The disputes between the military, the national guards, and the inhabitants on the one part, and the Government on the other, become more frequent every day. The hopes and exertions of the friends of the old Government in those parts of the country I am acquainted with are still more encouraged by those divisions. At Out-kirk the tree of Liberty having been blown down, an Orange tree has been substituted."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, December, London.—"Je connais trop mon pays et ceux qui le gouvernent pour n'être pas certain que le Ministère Autrichien sera singulièrement frappé de la lecture du message du Roi porté hier par M. Pitt à la Chambre des Communes. Vous jugez bien qu'il faut que je me hâte de lui donner à cet égard des explications, s'il est possible avant que les papiers ne lui parviennent.

"Mais toujours fidèle à mes principes, je ne veux mander que ce que vous approuverez. Donnez-moi donc vos ordres, en peu de mots, ou par écrit; mais, en vérité, daignez ne pas oublier qu'on me prendrait pour un sot si je me taisais tout-à-fait vis-à-vis de ma Cour dans cette occasion. Il faut rassurer ou expliquer."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795, December, London.]—"Il est bien cruel à moi de vous tourmenter toujours; cependant permettez que je vous demande la restitution des remarques que mon amitié vous a confié. Je connais trop Milord Grenville et Monsieur Pitt pour avoir la moindre inquiétude sur l'usage qu'ils en ont fait, et ma confiance aveugle dans toutes les occasions leur prouvera à tous les deux combien je suis pénétré de ce sentiment. J'écris ce soir par mon courier absolument dans votre sens, et je crois très utile à la bonne intelligence et harmonie nécessaire entre nos Cours, que la mienne soit prévenue à temps du véritable sens du message du Roi, et du langage des Ministres, qu'on ne manquera pas (surtout si nos ennemis s'en mêlent) d'interpréter de mille manières différentes."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1795 ?] December 31.—"You do me indeed but justice in supposing me very deeply affected from so many considerations by the accounts of Lord Camelford's misfortune. I could not have imagined that even in the island of Barbados, notoriously the most lawless and ill-affected of any of the West Indian Islands, a jury could have been found to have stated on their oaths the melancholy result of an affray on the very old and very disputed question of impressing, as a wilful murder on the part of Lord Camelford. I know enough of the constant disputes on that subject in all our islands, and more particularly in Barbados, not to be surprised at any such affray; and at any violence, even of the most violent kind, offered to the navy officers who may have engaged in that duty. I would therefore risk everything upon the opinion that he was 'sinned against' before he was driven to the extremity of killing a man (even if he did kill him) in his own defence. But no guilt on an affray of such a nature can be qualified by the term wilful murder, unless by a prejudice and an inflammatory persecution, as violent as it is illegal.

"Any further legal proceedings must be had in England; for I feel confident that Admiral Harvey's discretion as well as his justice (and particularly with the question that must arise from Lord Camelford's rank) will unless the whole affair is made up, send him to England. But, upon the whole, I should be inclined to think that it will wholly blow over; and I am the more sanguine in these hopes from understanding that Governor Ricketts has not officially noticed it (though it happened on the 7th) in his letters of as late a date as the 14th; which, of course, he would have done for instruction on the difficulty arising out of Lord Camelford's peerage. Perhaps it may be wise to consider that question (I believe there is no precedent) and if the lawyers think that the inquest and verdict is removable by certiorari to the King in Parliament, directions may be given (grounded on the rumour of such an inquest and verdict) for removing it. This may be done by secret instructions to the Governor, who may, at the same time, be ordered not to interfere by this procedure unless Lord Camelford should, by any circumstance, be in custody of the civil power of that island. I have writ what has first occurred to me; but, if it could be of any relief to your mind that I should come to London or to Dropmore to converse upon it, or for any other purpose, you know that I am ready at a moment to do anything that you or your good little woman can wish, or that could assist Lady Camelford. The trial is indeed severe to those so near to him; but I feel the whole is so much exaggerated, that I am less anxious than I should have been at seeing the transaction stated more coolly and less exceptionally."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, January 3, Wimbledon.—"Sir. J. Warren arrived yesterday. By his account the Royalists in Poitou, Brittany, and part of Normandy are in great force, and the Republican troops remaining are said to be only 14,000, and those much inclined to desert. He supposes it scarce possible, till spring, to land any considerable articles on the coast of Poitou, but very easy to do so from Jersey, on the northern part of Britany and in Normandy. In the latter the Royalists are said to be at Avranches. He does not think that there would be any difficulty in attacking the enemy in Quiberon Bay, if they should take possession of it, or that their doing [so] could prevent us from landing supplies in some parts of that coast. And he seems to suppose that a considerable quantity of arms and clothing, and a very moderate supply of money, is all that is wanting to ensure their driving the Republicans out of these provinces. By the help of small sums of money, he supposes most of the Republican force will be led to desert. We have appointed a meeting with him and Windham at twelve to-morrow, and I mean afterwards to appoint Montier [Moustier] who has sent to desire to see me. The chief difficulty, I think, will be, whether frigates can now be sent with safety, without a greater naval force to support them, at least till we have further intelligence from Brest and L'Orient. This business, and that of an Irish Secretary which is not yet brought to a point, prevents the possibility of my coming to you at present. I therefore hope we shall meet in town on Tuesday or Wednesday at latest.

"Dundas and I have been talking over the state of our West India prospects, after the repeated disasters which tend to retard and weaken the expedition, and we are both strongly impressed with the idea that, advanced as the season will be before operations can commence, we ought now (with a view either to war or peace) to make St. Domingo our first object of offence, after securing what we still retain in the Leeward Islands. You will receive the drafts of instructions formed on this idea, on which I shall wish much to know your opinions.

"I send you some French papers, lest they should not have reached you. The accounts they contain from the army leave us in great suspense. The finance seems going on as one could wish."

"That part of the instructions which relates to the Spanish part of St. Domingo is of course a matter of a good deal of delicacy, especially in the very unsettled state in which the discussion seems left at Madrid. But this point will not affect the general question, which ought to be the principal object of our operations."

THE DUKE OF PORTLAND TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, January 4, London.—"I have been assured from a very authentic quarter that it is Mr. Windham's intention to quit the diplomatic line entirely, and that he is determined, at all events, to desire to be removed from Florence without delay; this would make an opening which, if I could see filled by my son-in-law, Mr. Greville, would give me great pleasure. I say no more; the confidence with which I rely in your good intentions, and on the reasonableness of my expectations, prevents my importuning you with any argument or apology for the liberty I have taken."

GEORGE III. TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, January 8, Windsor.—"Lord Grenville will direct the letter that accompanies this for the Duchess of Brunswick to be sent by the messenger who goes this night for Brunswick with the agreeable account of the safe delivery of the Princess of Wales of a daughter. I suppose letters of notification to the usual Courts must be prepared so as to be sent by the next mail."

LORD GRENVILLE TO W. PITT.

1796, January 25, Dropmore —"I received the accompanying papers here this evening. The signification of an order to me from one of my colleagues, through his under-secretary, to execute in future a part of his business for him is new in form. But I hope I have both temper and understanding enough to consider such a proceeding in its true light, and to look only at the substance of the proposal made to me, as it affects the public service and the cause in which I am embarked. I had hoped, on the footing on which I have lived with Mr. Dundas, that it could never have been necessary for me to come to an official and formal explanation with him on the duties annexed to our different stations in the King's service. But, on the present occasion, I must say to you, as to the head of the Administration in which I bear a part, that nothing short of a direct order from the King annexing this business to the Foreign Department, will make me undertake the conduct of it; as indeed I conceive such an order would be also absolutely necessary to justify the different Departments of the public service, who now act under the orders of the Secretary of State for the War Department, in obeying such instructions as they may receive not from him, nor even from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, but from the Foreign Office.

"My reason for declining this task is, I hope, sufficiently obvious, and such as no mortal can ascribe to a desire of shifting on other shoulders a business which is become difficult and critical, and become so, in part, by the manner in which it has hitherto been suffered to proceed. In communicating with the Duke de Harcourt in explaining to him and either through him, or more directly to Monsieur, or to the Royalists the general political views of this Government respecting them, and the engagements which we can contract with them, or which we may be under the necessity of contracting with their enemies, I conceive I go to the full extent of what the duty of my situation can either require or authorise. But as to undertaking the detail of their supply and the direction of that part of it which depends on the Ordnance, Victualling, Clothing, Navy, and Transport Departments, I know myself unequal to it. I possess none of the details, I have no means of acquiring them. I have no right to interfere in them except as a Cabinet Councillor, and I cannot, because I ought not, make myself in any degree responsible for them.

"If such an undertaking had been proposed to me in the original division of the State Office, I should, for these reasons, most unquestionably have declined it. I must do so much more now, when I have taken upon myself the duties of a different employment, one which, God knows, is a burthen amply sufficient for any talents I can lay claim to. I have already said that nothing but the King's commands, regularly signified to me, will alter that determination; those I am not at liberty to dispute, having entered into his service in a time of prosperity and ease, and being little disposed to raise difficulties under different circumstances.

"I wished to avoid even the appearance of peevishness either at the manner of this thing or at the thing itself, and have therefore returned the papers not through Huskisson, as I received them, but through you. I must request you to give them back to that Office to which they belong, and, in so doing, you are of course at liberty to communicate the whole or any part of this letter as you shall think best; my object being not to raise or to foment dissensions, but to execute honestly what I have undertaken, and not to undertake what I know I cannot execute."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, January 28th, Lausanne.—"Though my letter of this day's date is sufficiently long, yet I shall venture to add some observations to it of a private nature that I should particularly wish not to be seen by any but his Majesty's Ministers.

"1st. It was stated in the famous debate of the 13th, that no confidence whatever could be placed in the commanders of the cordon on the frontiers, as they were all in the pay of the British Minister.

"The fact is that, without being all in pay, the Colonels Roland and Arpean, and the Major Ronsillon (the three gentlemen entrusted with that important charge) are most entirely devoted to me, and there is no service how difficult or dangerous soever it might be that, in a case of urgency, they would not immediately render to the cause in which his Majesty is engaged. This is perfectly well known at Bern, and I was myself well aware at the time that I secured their services that it would be impossible to keep it secret. But I knew, at the same time, that the most violent democrat in the Council of 200 would not dare to propose the removal of any of them, the tranquillity, if not the entire preservation of the Pays de Vaud depending most notoriously upon the tried conduct, talents, courage, and fidelity of these three gentlemen.

"2nd. The Avoyer de Steiguer though extremely alarmed in the first moment for the business of the gunpowder, which he had imagined to be much more serious than it really was, wrote immediately to Major Rousillon (whom he supposed to have purchased it on my account) to desire that he would convey his merchandise through the county of Neuchâtel for about three weeks to come, before which time all alarm would have subsided, and the transit would be as free as ever again.

“Upon this occasion I should wish to observe that all the powder and ammunition that I have sent into the interior has been either purchased at Geneva and forwarded from thence immediately, or has been deposited at Geneva and entered there as property of some inhabitant of that place before it has passed the frontiers of France. So that, in point of fact, this Canton has never been committed by my means. The Avoyer’s letter to Major Rousillon was founded upon mere conjecture.

“3rd. The comedy of the Banneret Fischer’s mission terminated in his passing two nights quietly in my house in consultation with M. Précy and myself upon the safest means of passing our merchandise, and the safest hands through which it might pass when my removal to Berne should render my communication with Geneva more difficult. Such is the country in which I now live. There is nothing that may not be done here with adequate means, provided it be of a nature that will admit of its being done quietly, and without giving an alarm. But for the constant clamour of the French mission, and the perpetual and indiscreet babble of the French emigrants, it would scarcely be known that his Majesty had a minister in Switzerland.”

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, January 30, Downing Street.—“Lord Grenville has the honour to submit to your Majesty the draft of a dispatch to Sir Morton Eden, which was this day read and approved at the meeting of your Majesty’s confidential servants, as a measure which the circumstances and situation of public affairs appear to render necessary and expedient. Considering the great importance of the subject, Lord Grenville does not presume to take this step without previously submitting it to your Majesty’s consideration, but he would not discharge his duty to your Majesty if he did not take the liberty to add that, as far as he is capable of forming a judgment upon the subject, such a declaration or communication as is there mentioned, especially if it can be made jointly in your Majesty’s name and that of the Emperor, could not but produce the most advantageous effects both at home and abroad. If it should, in the result, produce from France such an answer as it seems most reasonable to expect, from what is known of the views and dispositions of the present rulers there, it would, as Lord Grenville hopes, give additional energy and animation to the public mind here, and would probably lead to much discontent and demur in France. If, on the contrary, it should lead to the opening a negotiation on a footing consistent with the honour and interests of your Majesty and your allies, the present exhausted state of France, though it is yet not such as to preclude the possibility of another campaign on their part, would yet afford a reasonable ground for expecting terms of peace highly advantageous and honourable, particularly to your Majesty’s dominions.

“Lord Grenville is by no means insensible that to these considerations others of great weight may be opposed, as is natural with respect to a subject so extensive in its nature and so important in its consequences. In humbly submitting to your Majesty those arguments and that opinion which prevail in his judgment, he discharges the duty which he owes to your Majesty, and he trusts to the experience which he has so often had of your Majesty's goodness for a favourable interpretation of them. If your Majesty should on the whole be pleased to authorise him to send the despatch in its present form, it will, he presumes, be necessary to make communications of a similar import (as far as the difference of circumstances may permit) to your Majesty's other allies, and Lord Grenville will in that case lose no time in executing the business in that shape."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, January 31, Windsor.—"I have this morning received Lord Grenville's note accompanying the draft of a dispatch to Sir Morton Eden, read and approved yesterday at a meeting of the Cabinet, which [in] the circumstances and situation of public affairs appeared to them to be necessary and expedient. I do not in the least mean to make any obstinate resistance to the measure proposed, though I own I cannot feel the utility of it; my mind is not of a nature to be guided by the object of obtaining a little applause, or staying off some abuse; rectitude of conduct is my sole aim. I trust the rulers in France will reject any proposition from hence short of a total giving up of every advantage we may have gained, and therefore that the measure proposed will meet with a refusal."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, February 1, Varel.—"I transmit to your Lordship two reports, relating chiefly to the Province of Groningen and to the eastern frontier of the Republic, which I have had from Mr. Van der Haer, the person I have frequently mentioned before. I have received them with the express leave of communicating them wherever I thought they might be of service, as well as everything I hear from him. The Report, No. 2, dated Groningen January 19th, is drawn up by an engineer. The one, No. 1, dated Leer the 18th, is not; though I have every reason to think the writer a very intelligent man. What I have been saying, and their not being drawn up at the same time, will sufficiently account for the statements varying somewhat from each other, as the position of the troops in that quarter has of late been constantly changing. The result of all these reports is that the French are not as yet in any great force in those parts of the Republic; that they are however directing their attention towards them, though at this moment, the whole of the frontier I allude to is not in a state of defence. What I receive from time to time I shall continue to transmit, as no doubt the situation may vary from day to day. I have omitted some reflections on the points of attack, which were annexed to the Report dated January 19. They would be of little use without the necessary guides; and I am happy to say, if a time should come to act, not only any further report may be had that may be required, but it will be easy to procure proper guides. In a great many parts of Groningen, and most parts of Friesland, we are sure of the co-operation of the inhabitants. It seems that in the town of Groningen they are nearly divided; and it should not be forgot that our friends (excepting about three thousand of Mr. Van der Haer's in Friesland) are without arms, so that nothing is to be expected without a sufficient body of foreign troops marching into the country. The strength of this body of troops must depend upon the future operations of the French. The suspension of arms will no doubt enable them to take measures against an attack from without, if it enters into their plan, and unless the Austrians should open the next campaign with the vigour and success which have marked the last. In the actual state of things, I must not be so sanguine as I was in some of my last.

“Mr. Van der Haer has constantly stated to his friends in the Provinces of Groningen and Friesland his confidence of support, but he has always represented it as somewhat more distant than he himself anxiously wishes it to be, that his friends might not be discouraged by disappointment or delay. At the same time he has taken his measures to be ready, at all events in those parts of the Republic where he may be of use, as I have mentioned in former letters; and he has written to the Hereditary Prince of Orange, and to Prince Frederick, to represent in the strongest terms the inconveniences and mischief that will arise from delay and disappointment.

“Our apprehensions at this moment are shortly these: 1. What I have taken notice of before, that the French will make use of the opportunity to prepare against an attack. 2. That too many delays and disappointments will discourage our friends, unless we receive some positive assurances to keep up their hopes. 3. That in the meantime a National Convention (one and indivisible) will be established under pretence of framing a new constitution, but in fact vested with arbitrary and unlimited powers. We are afraid that, notwithstanding the opposition of Amsterdam, Friesland, and Zeeland, the destruction of the Federal Government will take place, and that the whole authority will be vested in a National Assembly before any constitution is even thought of that might guide the new representatives, and that might give some chance of checking the abuse of such monstrous powers, and in this manner a revolutionary Government will be established.

“That there is some intention of this sort the Report of the Commission appointed to examine into the conduct of the State prisoners gives reason to apprehend. It is therein stated that, according to the existing laws, and the rules of conduct prescribed to courts of justice in practice under the ancient government, they have no grounds of accusation against these prisoners. But that sound policy, natural justice, the imprescriptible rights of man, and revolutionary principles would no doubt justify further proceedings, which they must defer to the period the National Convention of the whole Republic meet, who would be the best judges of the most proper mode of prosecuting any further enquiry.

“I earnestly hope, particularly if our apprehensions are founded, that the Austrians will penetrate into the Netherlands before long and be able to maintain themselves. That when the French are cut off, or sufficiently occupied on that side a considerable military force may fall upon them on this. I am sure, as I have said in former letters, that at this moment, under these data, a very decisive blow might be struck. But, unless a much more considerable force could be brought to act upon the point I allude to than we have hitherto any reason to expect, I take it for granted I am still to look upon the further successes of the Austrians as necessary to bring about any measures for the emancipation of the United Provinces; though I feel strongly the mischief and scenes of violence with which they are perhaps threatened, should the necessary efforts from without be delayed much longer.

“Mr. Van der Haer and his friends are entitled to every commendation for their spirit, perseverance, and exertions. The man who takes a chief part in Groningen, and is, I believe, well thought of by the Princess of Orange, is highly respected by our friends for his talents, activity, and courage; and should Mr. Van der Haer and his friends be in any wise instrumental in rescuing the Republic from its ignominious state of subjection, I am sure the most perfect concert will subsist between these two Provinces; and influence and authority will be acquired by a set of men who will remain fast friends of England. I only wish the object was thought of more immediate importance in the great scale of Europe. M. Van der Haer and my brother (who was in the Government of Utrecht) know that I write to England on the subject, but I can depend entirely on their discretion, and on their not naming me anywhere without my permission.

"I cannot help observing that I have not had a letter from your Lordship since that dated April 22. Yet a few lines from a person in a high situation, let the expressions be ever so general, always give encouragement and confidence, and enable to speak more positively to the persons concerned. In that point of view, as far as I have had any opportunities of interfering, I have derived great advantage from the paper I had the honour of receiving from your Lordship, which I left in England. For above four months Mr. Van der Haer has taken few steps or written few letters which he has not previously concerted with my brother and with me. This is not known, though at different times we have had a great deal of company here; and must not be known anywhere on account of M. de Rhoon's situation, which obliges us to more caution than would otherwise be required. I take the liberty of expressing my wish that I might receive a letter containing some handsome expressions of M. Van der Haer, which I might repeat to him. It is the only acknowledgment I know that we can make him.

Postscript.—"On January 13 there was a tumult at Leuwarden which ended in the arrestation of seven members of the Municipality. About the same time there were some riots at Groningen; all with a view of forcing the representatives of Groningen and Friesland to give their consent to the meeting of the National Convention for the Republic (one and indivisible) at the Hague. At Groningen they have succeeded. The seven members taken up at Lieuwarden were for this measure against the Republicans and against the Federal Government. At Groningen several persons attached to the ancient Government were ill-used. Messrs. Engelhard (father and son), Ficaal Brugmans, and others ran some risk. Everything seems quiet again. The tumults have not had at Groningen all the effect intended; on the contrary they seem to have made our friends more active, and more determined to risk a great deal in order to overturn the present system.

"They write from Hamburgh that Messrs. Voorda and Valkenaar who conduct the prosecution against the Prince of Orange, have given it as their opinion that the Prince ought to lose his head."

Enclosing reports of the state of the defences, and the distribution of armed forces along the eastern frontier of the Republic.

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, February 8, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has the honour humbly to submit for your Majesty's consideration the drafts of dispatches to your Majesty's ministers at Berlin, Petersburg, Vienna and Switzerland, which have this day been read at the meeting of your Majesty's servants and approved by them. If your Majesty should be pleased to approve of Lord Grenville's sending these instructions, the messengers might go by to-morrow's mail, as it seems material that no time should be lost in executing those parts of them which more immediately press in point of time. From the tenor of some of the secret papers which your Majesty will receive with these drafts Lord Grenville is very apprehensive that no cordial co-operation can be looked for from the Court of Berlin."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, February 9, Queen's House.—"I have read Lord Grenville's draft of instructions to the Earl of Elgin in consequence of the letters received from him of a supposed change of language at the Court of Berlin, as far as an appearance of being willing to take again part in the coalition against the common enemy. I perfectly agree with Lord Grenville that at present no reliance can be placed in this opinion, but that every idea of a subsidy being furnished anew from hence to effect that salutary purpose cannot be thought of; but I cannot approve of any hint, though ever so indefinite, that bears any allusion to the Court of Vienna giving up the Low Countries and obtaining Bavaria; this would destroy every real utility of Austria to Britain, but, what is much worse, be disposing of the country of a Prince because less able to defend himself. This is so immoral and unjustifiable a proceeding that I cannot but in the outset protest against it, and in the same manner against the King of Prussia's acquiring any territory from the Bishoprics in Westphalia

"I do not expect the Court of Petersburg will quite approve or admit of the reasoning stated in the dispatches to Sir Charles Whitworth, as to seeking a negotiation with the present rulers in France, or the rejecting the idea formed in the North to bring the King of Prussia anew into the coalition. As to the former I perhaps agree with Russia, and nothing but the opinion of my Ministers would have made me not reject the idea, which I certainly can now only not protest against; yet, at the same time, not seeing as they do, cannot wish the measure to succeed; and indeed look on the French as too haughty to give any answer but such as will unite every opinion of the impossibility of treating with them at present.

"What I have alleged against the exchange of Bavaria and the acquisition of territories in Westphalia in the dispatch to the Earl of Elgin holds equally against the same objects in that to Sir Morton Eden.

"As to the communication to be made by Mr. Wickham, Lord Grenville must think that I wish to pass that over in silence, as I do not expect it will meet with the answer some expect, and that I never would have entered into the war but on a fair supposition that we meant to go through with it."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, February 9, Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has this day been honoured with your Majesty's commands upon the subjects of the drafts which he had prepared of instructions to your Majesty's Ministers abroad. Nothing can be more mortifying to him than to find that on every occasion, especially on points of such importance, his opinion and the advice which his duty leads him humbly to submit to your Majesty do not entirely accord with your Majesty's sentiments. Lord Grenville does not presume, unless your Majesty should please to require it of him, to intrude upon your Majesty's time with any more detailed reasoning upon the point in question. And his only motive for now troubling your Majesty was the doubt whether it was your Majesty's pleasure that he should send the despatch agreeably to the opinion formed yesterday after much consideration by your Majesty's servants, and humbly submitted to your Majesty by Lord Grenville, or whether your Majesty's intention was that Lord Grenville should stop the messengers and again bring the subject under the consideration of your Majesty's servants.

"Lord Grenville begs leave to add that he has not thought himself at liberty to make any communication of your Majesty's note except to Mr. Pitt, and that he shall feel it his duty to govern himself in that respect by your Majesty's commands. And he hopes your Majesty will believe that nothing but the strongest sense of duty, added to the great importance of the subject, could lead him to press your Majesty to the adoption of any measure which does not perfectly and entirely accord with your Majesty's sentiments."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, February 9, Queen's House.—"I certainly have not expressed myself clearly if what I wrote to Lord Grenville carries an idea of postponing the dispatching the messenger with the instructions that have been drawn up with the concurrence of the Cabinet; I therefore consent to his proceeding according to their advice; but I should not have acted either openly or honestly had I not expressed my own sentiments on the subject, and no reasoning of Lord Grenville on this subject could move me from what I think the line of morality, though perhaps not of politics. I always choose to act on simple principles; Italian politics are too complicated paths for my understanding."

LORD GRENVILLE to the EARL OF ELGIN.

Private.

1796, February 9, Cleveland Row.—"I am too much fatigued with the press of business which the sending off these two messengers occasions, to be able to add anything to my public letter to you, nor indeed does it occur to me that there is anything very material to be said that I have there omitted.

"You will see that we are slow of belief with respect to Prussian co-operation, and that after what passed two years ago we are resolved that the service shall precede the payment. On the other hand, I apprehend our friends at Berlin will insist no less steadily that the payment shall come first, and will mean to reserve it to their own discretion whether after that the service shall come at all; so that I doubt we shall not easily agree. Some good may be done in France and in other parts of Europe by the public manner in which they talk of all this at Berlin; but that very circumstance seems to prove that they mean only to alarm France, and to carry some point with her."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, February 18. [Whitehall].—"I am led now to speak of a subject of higher importance, I mean the general situation of the Royalists; the views that we have on that part of the war; and, above all, the relation in which we stand to this description of persons; the question on all which becomes every day more critical and anxious.

"My own firm persuasion is that, even at this hour, supposing the war to go on, if the endeavours of this country were fairly laid out (short even of assistance in men, though that is certainly what I should wish) in support of that cause, that a great portion of this side of France is recoverable from the Republic; and possibly a great chance given of the downfall of the whole system.

"But there is another view in which this question is not less important, nor concerns us less nearly.

"If we do not proceed with respect to these people in a way different from that which we have followed hitherto, and in which I fear we are still proceeding, it is not the notice that we are now giving that will acquit us in the eyes of God or man of having been cruelly wanting in that assistance which even our own declarations, and still more the nature of the case itself, authorised them to expect at our hands. With respect to the notice which we have sent, I would wish you to consider whether it does not make the matter rather worse than better. We have given them an assurance which we do not care to take ourselves. We have promised them supplies in general; but when a specification is called for, we find that we know ourselves too well to venture upon any particular sum, however limited.

"What we have done hitherto has certainly no correspondence to any idea that either friend or foe would have formed of the extent of the assistance which we might have been expected to furnish.

"Of the money sent into that country, the whole that I can trace, from the beginning of the war down to the present time, and conveyed in any way, is not more than seven or eight and twenty thousand pounds. The quantity of powder I have not by me, nor do I know exactly the account. But the greatest quantity that has been thrown in, at any one time, was somewhat less than 400 barrels by the zeal and activity of Sir S. Warren, spared from his own ships; and upon the remains of which the army of Charette, that army which has resisted the armies that Spain could not resist, is now subsisting.

"We have undertaken two expeditions, one of which failed indeed with circumstances infinitely afflicting, but not in a way by any means to render it useless, nor in the smallest degree to invalidate any grounds on which it was undertaken, and which might recommend other attempts of the same sort. The second attempt was undertaken with only negative failure; and that after being delayed and reduced in a manner to leave it but little title to expect success.

"If such is the state of this question with respect to the Government in general, there are circumstances that make it bear upon me individually in a manner still more delicate and distressing.

"A variety of little causes have contributed to put this service almost entirely under my care. I have had it because nobody else would. I have become insensibly a sort of foreign minister for the Chouans; an office of which I am not going to boast; as, I am afraid, it appears to many analogous to one that one has sometimes heard of, called king of the gipsies.

"This office, however, I should be perfectly disposed to execute with all possible zeal, and with no fear of its disgracing my pains, if I were possessed of the means of executing it. But if the only duties of this character are to amuse these unfortunate people with evasive excuses, and to hold out promises which I have no hope of performing, you will see that, without speaking with any spleen or peevishness, it is impossible that I can continue in the situation. I must, in some way or other, make known to them that I can no longer serve them, and must not be instrumental, either actively or passively, in leading them into opinions which I cannot hope to see realised.

"I wish, therefore, most earnestly, that you would lend your hand in bringing this to a point. It would be easy for me personally to take care of myself; but I certainly cannot 'let this cause down the wind' without feeling that its 'jesses are my dear heart-strings,' nor is it easy to clear myself without the risk of mischief beyond that which would be necessary to my own safety.

"Our parting last night without anything being said upon this subject proceeded possibly from each person's waiting for someone else to begin. But I must confess that, though I shall be very glad to discuss it, I feel great repugnance to being the proposer. Both because I cannot hope any good from the proposal, unless it is considered as a general concern, and equally proper for anyone else as for me; and because there is a degree of ridicule in appearing pertinaciously to attach to any object or opinion a degree of importance, which one cannot get others to share.

"I beg pardon for this long letter, by which I may have tried, I fear, both you and myself."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, February 18, Varel.—"In my last letters I sent your Lordship some very circumstantial accounts of the force and state of defence of the frontier of the Republic on this side, of the disposition of the inhabitants chiefly in the Provinces of Friesland and Groningen, and of the violent measures by which their apparent consent was obtained to the favourite plan of those who have assumed the government in the Province of Holland, namely, the National Convention of the whole Republic. The enclosed abstracts of letters, numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, relating chiefly to the disposition of the people, and to what passed since the 29th ultimo, confirm what I have said in former letters, and show that I have not exaggerated in stating it to be so very favourable. The paper number 1 is ante-dated January 18, for reasons which it is unnecessary to detail, but was written after the violent scenes that took place between the 22nd and 29th instant, of which I sent Mr. Goddard the details by my letter of the 5th and 9th February. By this paper it appears that, in addition to the 3,000 farmers and country people Mr. Van der Haer can dispose of upon an emergency by his own immediate influence, he is assured of the support of between 2,000 and 3,000 more in those parts of the country alluded to. The letter number 2 confirms in general the good will of the people in the strongest terms, with some circumstances of what passed in Friesland after the 29th ultimo. By the letter dated Leer, February 15, number 3, it appears that the authority of De Bere and his committee was of short duration, and that it was not meant they should reap the fruit of their violence. Number 4, a letter I had from Mr. Van der Haer, who was gone to Leer in Oostfriesland to confer with some of his friends, contains still more circumstantial details of what passed in consequence of the outrages of the infamous De Bere, with his infamous committee. These abstracts confirm strongly what I have said in former letters of the disposition of the people; and it seems De Bere's appearance and violent proceedings had excited so much indignation and resentment that he was attacked, pelted, and pursued by the mob, and at last forced to fly the country in disguise. Those who employed him did not judge it expedient or practicable to protect him from the general fury.

"The persons employed by Mr. Van der Haer have shown the greatest firmness and resolution in a very perilous moment. It does not seem that their arrestation is attributed to any other reason than the personal hatred of De Bere against Mr. Van der Haer, the man who manages Mr. Van der Haer's affairs being one of them, and several of them his known friends. The prisoners are now released; and it appears clearly by the steadiness and tranquillity with which Mr. Van der Haer's friends kept their ground to a man, that they were not under any apprehensions of their correspondence with him having been discovered. I expect Mr. Van der Haer back here shortly; if not I shall hear from him, having his express leave and desire to communicate what I hear from him where I think it may be of service.

"Mr. Van der Haer concludes his letter by saying that he has reason to expect that he will be able to carry our plan into execution. To explain what is meant I should first take notice that one of the first things Mr. Van der Haer did after he came here, his correspondence with his own tried friends being established, was to gain over some of the Representatives who were disgusted with what had passed, and dissatisfied with the turn things were taking. By means of these persons, who have acted it seems with great firmness and fidelity, he was able, with the assistance of his own tried friends, to influence considerably the deliberations of the representatives of Friezland. He felt all resistance from the people in the actual state of things was fruitless, if not even dangerous to the friends of the ancient Government. At the same time he saw that it would be an advantage if, without tumults or commotions, it was practicable to delay and embarrass the proceedings of the Representatives in Friezland, in order to gain time, and to retard the execution of the plans of those who have assumed the the government of the province of Holland, by preventing the concurrence of Friezland. In this he succeeded for many months, and so far that some of the resolutions adopted by the Representatives of Friezland were drawn up here by Mr. Van der Haer himself, a circumstance they certainly do not suspect. As long as the attention of the French was taken up with the successes of the Austrians they did not take much notice of the refractory spirit of the Representatives of Friezland. But your Lordship may have seen by my former letters that since the suspension of arms (whatever effect the events of the campaign I speak of may have had upon their conduct in this respect) the French, in concert with their friends in the province of Holland, seen to have made it a point, at one time, to carry this measure of the unity of the Batavian Republic, as they term it. This being the case, and as they seemed determined to employ the most violent means if necessary, all opposition, all resistance became useless. It was necessary to give way, and in the actual state of things the people cannot be kept too quiet; and Mr. Van der Haer uses all his endeavours to make them feel the necessity of laying bye for a better opportunity. But at the same time something must be done. This is the plan we agreed upon; that he should gain over or get to be named some Representatives of Friezland (to the National Convention) that he might depend upon, influence, and direct, and some of Drenthe, which he thought practicable; and that these might, without making use for the moment of the disposition of the people, carry on at the Hague in the National Convention the same system of delay and resistance carried on with so much success in the Assembly of Representatives in Friezland; that they should endeavour to communicate with and to gain over to this plan some of the Representatives of Amsterdam to the National Convention (one and indivisible) Amsterdam's aversion to the measure being well known; and that these Deputies, with all the accession of strength they could obtain from other quarters, should embarrass and delay as much as possible all the deliberations without coming to any extremities. This will answer the double purpose of gaining time, in case hopes should be given before long of assistance from without; and of obtaining more general information of the transactions in the Republic than we have had hitherto, as Mr. Van der Haer intends to secure a correspondence through the channels this will open. In this manner we have a chance of making a stand and gaining time; whilst the known friends of the ancient government and of the House of Orange, without running any very great risk, may, at the same time, exert themselves in keeping up the hopes of our friends where the opportunity offers. This is the plan of Mr. Van der Haer alluded to in his letter."

Postscript.—February 19.—"Mr. Van der Haer returned last night. I am happy to confirm that all his friends, as well as other persons that were taken up, are again at liberty. As a proof of the sincerity of the persons who have entered more lately into Mr. Van der Haer's views and wish to aid in the restoration of the House of Orange, I should not forget to say that they have written and signed letters to him which put them entirely in his power; and they have not required of him that he should put his name to paper any further than he may choose it. In the late disturbances they have been tried, and have behaved with great decision, as I mentioned.

"Mr. Van der Haer is in regular correspondence with the Princess of Orange; but we take it for granted that what I write to England can never hurt the cause, as I hope I should be stopped by your Lordship if I ventured on too far. And it goes no further than my brother whom I mentioned before, (who was in the States of Utrecht lately, and presented the petitions for the restoration in 1787, at a time when our success was doubtful) and Mr. Van der Haer, that I write upon this subject. Mr. Van der Haer seems to think that all the resolutions taken in Friezland in consequence of the last tumults are set aside. I have my doubts whether it will be the case with those relating to the National Convention.

"The report that the military belonging to the Rassemblement had been ordered to leave Oost Friezland originated from a mistake. This is contradicted. However the Court of Berlin may act in other respects, they give every facility and assistance to the correspondence of Mr. Van der Haer, and other persons who may have the same object. Should that Court take a decided part in our favour, they certainly may shorten the duration of all the calamities that afflict the Republic.

"I hope your Lordship and Mr. Goddard have received all my last letters. I take the opportunity of Mr. I. Fagel returning to Hamburgh to enclose this to Mr. Fraser."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. WINDHAM.

1796, February 19, Cleveland Row.—"I received your letter yesterday evening. I do not enter into the particulars of what had passed respecting the communication to the Royalists, because I am much more anxious to assure you that no idea ever entered into my mind that the thing was any other than a misunderstanding, in the strict sense of that word. One impression had been left on my mind and a different one on yours. It seems immaterial now to enquire how the misunderstanding had been produced, because I can, with the greatest truth, assure you that I never had a thought of its being intentional on your part, and I flatter myself you entertain similar sentiments of me.

"What is much more important is that the business itself should be put into its proper train, and that we should realize the promises we are holding out. I believe you are not ignorant that some difficulties have arisen upon this point. But they are of a nature that ought not to affect the substance of the business, and I trust they will not. I saw the Duke de Harcourt yesterday, and received from him a note which I have put into circulation. I have requested from him some explanation as to the sum which they wish, and the manner in which they would employ it, and I hope the whole may be soon arranged. It certainly shall be so as far as can depend on me."

Copy.

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, March 3, Whitehall.—"I find from Huskisson that you have ordered a thousand pounds to be given at the same time with the last copy of the note, and that Canning supposes that an equal sum has been given with each of the others. If any part of this is meant as furnishing the persons concerned with the means of paying the expenses of their fitting out, it is probably much more than is sufficient; especially as the usual allowance, calculated indeed upon a footing of great economy, has been given to all those who have been destined for that service. A larger sum put into the hands of Serent or the Duke de Harcourt would even do harm, by enabling them to send over a number of persons not under the control of those who can best judge, perhaps, who are those that are likely to do good when they shall arrive in the country.

"If it is meant only to furnish them with a sum to be taken with them as an earnest of what is meant further to be done, and a supply of the immediate wants of the Royalists, it is much better that all this should be added to the common stock, and make part of a larger sum which has been ready since the day before yesterday to be transmitted to the Prince de Bouillon, the moment that Serent and his companions shall be ready to go.

"I suggested to Mr. Pitt the day before yesterday, that it would be desirable to give to Serent a power similar to that which was formerly given to Tintinnac, and the copy of which I was looking for in the Office.

"The paper was, I recollect, nothing more than a general assurance that the person entrusted with it was authorized to say on the part of the British Government that a liberal consideration should be had for any person who should render any service of the sort there described; to which might be added either a written or verbal instruction of the general extent to which such engagements, should they come to be specified, might extend. I cannot but think that this would be desirable, even with the prospect which we have of having soon there a person of our own. But there is no reason why Serent should wait for this, if there is any doubt about it; or why he should not set off, as he told me he intended, this very day. Indeed there is no reason that I know of, except his wish, I suppose, of having the money with him, why he might not have set off from the moment that you had spoke to him, or arranged with the Duke de Harcourt that he should go.

"I have sent you part of the above particulars by the desire of Huskisson, who was otherwise at a loss what to do about the 1,000*l.* which Canning had directed him to give.

"The moment Serent is ready there is a sum, part of 10,000*l.*, that will be sent to the Prince de Bouillon as the first payment of the 30,000*l.* that he is to have as soon as it is forthcoming. A part of the 10,000*l.*

had better be kept to be exchanged for a small sum in Louis (about 1,000) which Dutheil, I understand, has got, and more that he thinks he can get."

Postscript.—"I shall see the Duke de Harcourt this morning, and will tell him that Serent must get off without further delay."

C. BENTINCK TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, March 4, Varel.—"Want of time and of an opportunity will prevent my sending many details to-day of what passed in Friezland since the flight of De Beer, since the overthrow of the Committee of Reform and the return of the Representatives who fled, of which I took notice in mine of the 18th ultimo, and in former letters. These Representatives, having recovered their authority, had set at liberty all the prisoners taken up by orders of their Committee, and cancelled all the decrees passed during the time it sat excepting those relating to the National Convention, which they had indeed annulled pro forma, but passed afterwards in another shape. It seems now, by a letter dated Leuwarden, February 23, and by accounts we heard to-day, that the authority of the reinstated Representatives was of short duration. The French troops having again left Leuwarden on the morning of the 23rd ultimo, the Committee of Reform was re-established, and many of the Representatives and of the inhabitants had again fled. The confusion and disgust and alarms occasioned by these repeated changes of actors and of scenes amongst the partizans of the revolution themselves, are not likely to give it strength or stability. It is more likely that they will aid those who wish to destroy their work. It is impossible not to be very anxious for those within who are exposed to so many risks, and are forced to be the inactive spectators of proceedings they disapprove of, and of all the calamities of their country; and it is more than ever to be hoped vigorous and decisive steps may soon be taken to put an end to all their sufferings."

LORD GRENVILLE TO SIR MORTEN EDEN.

Most secret.

1796, March 8, Downing Street.—"I have received your letter marked private, on the subject of Count Starhemberg; and I shall certainly endeavour, as far as possible, to conform myself to Baron Thugut's wishes on that head. He must, at the same time, be sensible that this is not without its difficulties from the knowledge which Monsier de Starhemberg has of the intimate concert now subsisting between the two Courts, and from the means which he possesses of learning through various other channels what has passed, or is passing, in communications between them.

"While I state this difficulty, it is a justice I owe to Count Starhemberg to say that, in what I have seen of his conduct here, I have always found him apparently disposed to promote the objects of the union of the two Courts, and of the success of the great cause in which we are embarked."

WILLIAM WICKHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, March 17, Berne.—"Inclosed I send your Lordship a second letter of Bayard's as a supplement to the one that I sent the other day in sympathetic ink. If this young man arrives in time I shall send him to England as a messenger with the answer from Mr. Barthélemy. All his friends are alarmed for his safety and I have had letters from several quarters requesting most earnestly that I would not suffer him to return into France at least for some time. Your Lordship will learn more from him in a day upon the points with which he is really acquainted than from any other person I ever yet had the luck to meet with. He will besides entirely supply all the information of which you have been deprived by the misconduct of M. D'Artez."

Enclosure.—An unsigned letter in French from Verona, giving an account of the writer's movements.

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, March 17, Berne.—"Let me earnestly entreat of your Lordship to throw these letters into the fire as soon as you shall have read them. You will readily divine that they are from B.

"If the Directory have really confidence in their troops, or only hope to be able to strike a blow in the first moment, they will give an evasive answer to your proposals. If not, they will accept them; but I do not think that they will dare to refuse them altogether unless they should have some hope from this intrigue of M. de Poterât at Vienna, which I cannot believe.

"I should wish to reason upon the subject just now, but I am really so completely worn down with fatigue that I feel I am not equal to it."

Enclosures not preserved.

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, March 17, Berne.—"I have some satisfaction in sending your Lordship the enclosed letter from the Chevalier de Contye one of the best persons attached to the Prince of Condé. The person alluded to by him is General Danican."

Enclosure.

1796, March 10, Buhl.—"La personne que vous m'avez adressé m'est arrivé ici. Avant hier, elle a vu le Bourgeois et causé avec lui, il m'a paru qu'il en avoit été très content; cette personne, monsieur, a eu raison de se réclamer de moi, car il y a 25 ans que je la connois, et je dois lui rendre la justice de dire qu'au commencement de la Révolution, elle se montra fidèle à son roy, et qu'aux journées du 5 et 6 Octobre, 1789, elle fût à Versailles, et se mit dans le rang, avec les gardes Suisses, pour y défendre le roy, contre les brigands conduits par M. de Lafayette; voilà ce que je sais. Il m'a dit vous avoir mis au fait de sa conduite depuis qu'il a joué un plus grand rôle, que celui dont j'avois connoissance. Le Bourgeois l'a gardé fort peu de tems, car il est parti hier à deux heures pour continuer sa route.

"L'on attend des nouvelles de votre ami Baptiste ce soir ou demain. On a annoncé que le banquier avoit vu son correspondant." French.

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, March 17, Berne.—"The inclosed letter from M. Pelin seems to me to merit a great deal of attention. This man, if I am rightly informed, gains every day a stronger hold upon M. Thugut, particularly with respect to the affairs of France. All that one can learn with certainty from this letter is that he wishes people to write to Vienna in a certain sense. But, if I am well informed from elsewhere, he is constantly meditating upon the project of a compensation to the Court of Vienna for the Low Countries. That some such project exists, and that the war against France is only now considered as subservient to other purposes I am myself most entirely persuaded. There are so many little facts that tend to prove it, that I have not now the shadow of a doubt remaining on my mind. I wish I could bring your Lordship better proofs than my own intimate persuasion. Your Lordship, however, must have remarked that that persuasion has not been taken up hastily, or without much attentive observation."

Enclosure.—A letter in French dated February 8, 1796, expressing high esteem for the courage, character, and ability of the person to whom it is addressed in Switzerland; and suggesting that he should, after the example of Mallet du Pan, develop in a series of letters to any one of the leading Ministers of the allied Powers, his ideas in regard to the means of concluding peace with France.

Endorsed.—Copy of a very private and confidential letter from M. Pelin, at Vienna.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, March 23, Windsor.—"In consequence of the letters the Princess of Orange has received from the King of Prussia both she and the Prince think they cannot longer decline the hereditary Princess of Orange and her child going to Berlin. As they are the proper judges of what part they should act on this occasion, I could not but tell them the natural steps that they should take if such was their decision; on this ground Nagel has written to you for a packet boat, as no frigate would conveniently carry so large an assemblage of women, and to Earl Spencer for a frigate to convoy the packet."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, March 25, Hamburg.—"I left Varel last Friday, and came here at the request of Mr. Tagel that I might pass a few days with him before he sets out for Switzerland. I shall return next Sunday, and take the opportunity of my being here to write a few lines by Mr. Fraser.

"It has been our singular good fortune that, during the commotions and changes that took place in Friezland at the four different periods of the 13th and 26th January, 12th and 23rd February, which I took notice of in former letters, our friends have not been discovered, or I believe even suspected. They have been able to pursue their object with unwearied assiduity. They have gained strength by the divisions of the partizans of the revolution; and they were so confident of the fidelity and prudence of the persons with whom they act, that not one of those we placed most dependence on has fled; and one of them who had been taken up from the personal animosity of some of his adversaries, in the conviction that no discovery could be made, had the resolution to resist the wishes of the populace who had collected to rescue him from prison, advising them to disperse, to be under no apprehension on his account, that he was sure of being cleared and set at liberty. This man is again out of prison, and now loudly complains of the injustice done him, and continues to exert himself. By Mr. Van der Haer's means we have obtained a new correspondent in the province of Groningen, and now we may depend upon the Ommelanden as much as upon Friesland. This friend of Mr. Van der Haer passed a few days with us, and is gone back to Groningen to make some stay and to instruct our friends; and it is to this person, who was a member of the old government of Friesland, that we are indebted for the acquisition of the additional correspondent at Groningen, who is a man of property, very much beloved in his own province, and not easily intimidated. Our friend left us the 9th March, and the 12th we had letters from him, and from his friend at Groningen, giving very favourable statements of the disposition of the people who, in Ommelanden, are nearly to a man well-disposed. I shall not send many details of all this unless it is wished, or any more ample information was required. We can at any time obtain this, and find guides if wanted. And, under the data of former letters, I will answer for what I have said in those letters, and for our being able to extend our plan and the operation of the party I have spoke of, though somewhat slowly without the means I have asked for in mine of March 1st to be put into the hands of the two persons I have there spoke of, who, in that case, will I am sure make no difficulty of accounting to me for the use of them. I therefore beg, if more dispatch is thought necessary, or if it be thought of consequence to give every degree of strength and effect to the activity of our friends in the provinces I have alluded to, that I may be enabled to give them the assistance I have required in the firm persuasion that it will be of the greatest service at this moment; and that, at any rate, an offer of this sort coming from England will strengthen our interest. I beg to know what your lordship's intention is upon this point. We shall pursue our object in the meantime to the utmost of our ability."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, March 26, Hamburgh.—“After I had closed mine yesterday I received a long letter from Mr. Van der Haer, the friend of ours I have so frequently mentioned before, expressing in very strong terms his anxiety for his friends within under increasing dangers and oppressions, and insisting strongly upon the necessity of speedy and effectual assistance from without to prevent the total ruin of the country. Our friends continue firm and united, and determined to come forward and to act the moment they receive orders, and are assured of the support they have now so long been led to expect. Mr. Van der Haer and his friends are only afraid they will not be allowed quietly to lay bye for an opportunity; that their adherents will be forced and exasperated by ill usage into a fruitless resistance, or obliged to fly the country. One of his friends in consequence of a quarrel, being lately set upon by some of the armed revolutionists, was forced to leave the country. Fortunately it is not material this man should be there. Those who will be most wanted, should things require vigour and decision, have kept their ground, and have hitherto escaped all discovery. At the same time it appears that the revolutionists at present do entertain, or pretend to entertain, suspicions of their enemies being at work. But by the hints they throw out, and by the persons they name, it is evident they do not know anything of the proceedings of our friends, as we have no communication with the persons they allude to. A circumstance very much in our favour, at the same time that all the letters Mr. Van der Haer received since I left Varel from every one of his correspondents contain the strongest proofs of their activity, resolution, and perseverance. It is to be observed that, though this party has no doubt been increasing in strength for these many months, it has existed and acted above a twelvemonth; and it will be fortunate indeed under the present suspense and difficulties if no discovery is made, as the impatience of our friends increases daily. We are afraid that, by so many repeated delays, they will place less confidence in the assurances they receive, or despond entirely; and, in that case, it will not be easy to wind them up again. The correspondence is daily more narrowly watched and more hazardous. Under all these circumstances Mr. Van der Haer begs I will again press upon the attention of my friends that, however necessary the means should be proportioned to the end, dispatch is no less so if England, whose object is avowedly as it is her interest to expel the French out of the Netherlands and the United Provinces, wishes to recover them and re-establish the House of Orange before the French have completed, in the total impoverishment of the country, the system of rapine and extortion they are carrying on with so much method, and under so many pretences. Mr. Van der Haer eagerly wishes that, should the Austrians advance to the Meuse, the Powers who have guaranteed the institution of the Seven Provinces under the auspices of the House of Orange should march a force considerable enough to carry the point, and to strike the decisive blow under the general disgust and disunion that prevails at this moment on one part, and the avowed embarrassment and perplexity of the leaders of the Batavian Convention in consequence of the lamentable statement they give themselves of their finances, and the disorganised or inefficient state of their military force. The arrival of the two Princes of Orange in these parts, and the journey of Prince Frederick to Vienna, raises great expectations; and, if followed by any decisive and well combined measures, these expectations will not be disappointed. A considerable force, and dispatch, combined with any vigorous measures of the Austrians towards the recovery of the Netherlands, will afford every probability of success. It is high time to rescue the Seven Provinces from the situation they have been thrown into by a delusion and an infatuation unfortunately too general at the time to be resisted by those who foresaw the consequences, in order not to leave the cat a chance of strengthening themselves by being much longer in possession of the Government.

“Fortunately for the tranquillity of society the political distempers that have done such incalculable mischief carry along with them the principle of their cure, and men, however at variance formerly, not only wish for a change, but loudly express their wishes from all quarters to see the sudden and pernicious innovations of the revolutionists, French and Batavian, give way to that order of things established under the auspices and protection of the House of Orange; founded upon experience, adapted to the habits, customs, and attachments of the country; and, if not a model of imaginary perfection, which no human institutions can be, at least practicable in the execution, compatible with the tranquillity of society, mild in the practice as well as the theory, and affording security to the lives and property of individuals, and encouragement and protection of every branch of industry to every source of national prosperity. I have stated the purport of Mr. Van der Haer’s letter, and of the communications he has received. If further details are wanted they may be had at any time, as well as any information of the changes that may take place from time to time; and, by furnishing Mr. Van der Haer and his friends with the means, the operation of the party I have so often spoke of may be shortly extended, I have no doubt, out of the two provinces they influence. But I hope to receive further orders on the subject. In the meantime we shall endeavour to keep that party together ready at all events, and to strengthen it as far as lies in our power. We shall keep them, if possible, from acting openly till we receive the necessary orders and assurances of support. We shall ever remind them if necessary, and I trust with effect, that they are never to lose sight for a moment of the joint views of England and of the House of Orange, whose union is as essential to our ultimate success as that of the individuals of that House amongst themselves. It is only as far as the conduct of the Court of Berlin is compatible with these views that we can expect or wish for support from that quarter. We shall endeavour not to put ourselves in the power of that Government any further [than] we can help. I put the necessity of this sort of caution in as many points of view as I can with prudence. If they will not do us any good they may still do us great harm in the present state of things; and I most sincerely wish we might, by an unexpected turn of affairs, succeed without that Court, if they are determined at Berlin not to take a decided unequivocal part consistent with former engagements, when they might so easily and so powerfully contribute to draw the Seven Provinces out of their present calamitous and ignominious situation."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, March 1, [April 1] Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has the honour humbly to acquaint your Majesty that the Count de Zeppelin is arrived in England, with letters to your Majesty from the Duke of Wurtembergh and the Hereditary Prince.

"When Lord Grenville first saw M. de Zeppelin, he opened to Lord Grenville no other business than that of a negotiation about the Wurtembergh troops at the Cape, which the Duke was desirous of offering for your Majesty's service there; an offer which Mr. Dundas seems to think it would not be advantageous to your Majesty to accept.

"Yesterday Lord Grenville received a note from Count Zeppelin saying that he had only opened to him a part of his commission, and desiring to see him again to execute the other orders which he had received. Lord Grenville having accordingly seen him again this morning, Count Zeppelin put into his hands the copies of letters from the Duke and Duchess of Wurtemburgh and from the Hereditary Prince which Lord Grenville has now the honour to transmit to your Majesty.

"After this Count Zeppelin read to Lord Grenville a letter addressed by Count Zeppelin to some other person on the subject of what had passed respecting the Prince's former marriage, and tending to exculpate the Prince's conduct in that respect. This letter, together with some other papers of the same tendency, he requested Lord Grenville to lay before your Majesty.

"Lord Grenville judged that the only fit line for him to pursue on this occasion was to take the papers, assuring Count Zeppelin that the whole should be laid before your Majesty, to whose decision Lord Grenville had only to refer himself without expressing any opinion or intimating any upon the subject. He only thought it right to mention it to Count Zeppelin as his opinion that, as the subject was not entirely new to your Majesty, it would be both more respectful to your Majesty, and in all respects better for the Hereditary Prince himself, that the demand of a formal audience to deliver the letters should not be pressed until your Majesty had considered the papers which Count Zeppelin was charged to submit, and which he had delivered to Lord Grenville.

"Count Zeppelin agreed in the propriety of this, but said that, if your Majesty should not be disposed to give a favourable answer in the first instance, his master was desirous of obtaining your Majesty's permission to make a journey to England, in the hopes of removing any unfavourable impressions which your Majesty might have respecting him."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, April 3, Windsor.—"I have this instant received Lord Grenville's note accompanied with the copies of the letters Count Zepelin has received, and the request when the Count may deliver the letters to me. I thought I had already explained fully to Lord Grenville my disinclination to enter into any conversation on the proposal that has been entrusted to that gentleman; but that I had sent abroad for information whether my opinion on the Prince of Wurtemberg is well founded; which, if it is, no power on earth can get me to admit of his marrying any daughter of mine. That information I cannot receive for some weeks as yet, therefore I must decline for the present receiving the gentleman; and I cannot help fairly expressing that the opinion of the Duke of Brunswick will certainly have no weight with me on so serious a matter, his ideas and mine being in no degree similar."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, April 5, Windsor.—"I am much pleased at Lord Grenville's having selected part only of the papers arrived yesterday for my perusal this day and keeping back the rest till to-morrow. I confess when the load is too great I find that I cannot retain in my mind any part of the contents, and therefore am always better pleased when the contents are not so voluminous; indeed the whole mode of carrying on public correspondence is so much more diffuse and undigested than thirty years ago, that I do not think it has made public subjects of discussion so clear as when foreign ministers thought the matter of their dispatches and not the length of them their true merit."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, April 10, Windsor.—"I cannot see any objection to the proposed draft of an answer proposed to be transmitted by Mr. Wickham to M. Barthélemy on the subject of the insolent paper received from France. I confess I am not in the smallest degree surprised at the tenor of the French paper, as I had when the measure was proposed thought it would in effect not be in another style; and I should have hoped the courage of this nation had not been so sluggish as to require this insolence to bring it to its proper tone.

"The printing these three papers and delivering them to the foreign ministers is very proper; I should suppose no time will be lost in communicating them through Sir Morton Eden to the Court of Vienna."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, April 11, Varel.—"I inclose a letter (Number 1) Mr. Van der Haer received from a person of his acquaintance, whom he has employed in sounding the disposition of the inhabitants of the neighbouring provinces; and a paper (Number 2) with some reflections upon this letter, with very satisfactory accounts of the increase of our strength, and with a project for putting the islands of Vlie, Ter Schelling, Ameland, and Schermonnik-Oog in the possession of Great Britain. Mr. Van der Haer not writing either French or English, I have translated these papers word for word as nearly as I could, and forward them thinking they are entitled to some attention.

"The well intentioned friend alluded to in the letter Number 1 is Rammel the French Minister of Finance. The writer of the letter has been acquainted with him these many years. They had many conversations at the Hague, soon after the entrance of the French, on the subject of the Stadholdership. Rammel professed himself to be for the re-establishment of that form of government in Holland, and of the monarchy in France. Both Mr. Van der Haer and Mr. Humalda have seen a number of letters from him which are too strong if he is not in earnest, as they put him, Rammel, in their power; the acquaintance who has the letters being ready to give them up at any time if he found he was deceived by Rammel. One of these letters contains strong expressions of his wishes to see the Monarchy and Stadholderian government restored; and besides the writer of the letter saved him by his presence of mind from a scrape he had got in by one of their letters having been intercepted. At the same time we are well aware how little dependence should be placed on persons who act under the present government of France, and of the caution required on this head. But we thought it right to mention Rammel, with these circumstances relating to him, that it may be of service to those who are in a situation to judge of his sincerity, and how far he may be useful, which we are not called upon to decide. I have underlined the most material passage in this letter, and must leave it to your Lordship to determine how far this communication may be of any service. The whole, as Mr. Van der Haer says, may be a fiction to excite mistrust between parties whose concert is apprehended; though we have so many reasons to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the Court of Berlin, and to suspect many parts of it.

"With respect to the plan for taking possession of the four islands, we wish it chiefly to be combined with any effort that may be made from the land side by a military force to support our friends within, and in such a manner as to give more effect to this. At the same time it may be very practicable to obtain possession without waiting for this co-operation on the land side.

"I am very anxious to receive some communications from England in answer to this and to former letters, to enable me to encourage the exertions of our friends still further. They have now kept together a very considerable number of persons near 14 months. They have, in the course of that time, been gaining strength. They now form a strong party, who may be depended upon in case of an emergency. Under these circumstances it is not surprising they should every moment be asked 1, what the object of their activity is to be; 2, whether and when they will be called upon to act; and 3, how far they may depend upon pecuniary assistance (if wanted). These questions I have been asked. Upon the former, the paper I received in England has supplied me with a general answer; upon the third, I have still to beg I may know what your Lordship's intentions are, as I could wish to transfer to Mr. Van der Haer and Mr. Humalda his friend, the two persons I have mentioned in mine of the 1st March, some part of the discretion reposed in me, which they are not acquainted with. It is of no use to me, but will be to them, as everything goes through their hands; and hitherto they have gone on at their own expense.

"It is now above a twelvemonth since your Lordship gave me the paper on the assurances of which I have gone on. Until I hear to the contrary I shall think it right to persevere in hopes of receiving some communications on the subject which, by enabling me to give Mr. Van der Haer greater certainty as to the time he is to expect support, and the assurances he may venture to give his friends, may put it in his power to direct them according to the joint views of England and the House of Orange. Any communication from England will in his idea answer this end; and, if he is enabled to give these assurances positively, his friends place confidence enough in him not to require he should disclose the quarter from which he has them, any further than he may think proper. At the same time to support his influence, and to preserve this confidence, he should not advance more than he can reasonably hope to fulfil; and some further communications become very necessary in the very hazardous and critical situation of our friends within.

"In the mean-time we shall supply as well as we can the want of more positive information, and we shall exert ourselves to the utmost to keep up the hopes and incite the activity of our friends, in the persuasion the moment may come yet to derive some advantage from their efforts. We only regret our influence is hitherto limited to these few provinces.

"The faction supporting the National Convention (one and indivisible) have recovered their ground in Friesland. That province however had not yet sent any deputies to the Hague, though I think they will soon. But I hope some favourable event may take place before the leaders of the Convention acquire any considerable strength by being in possession of the Government.

"I should not forget mentioning that I think the passage in the letter, Number 1, relating to the restoration of the Stadholderian Government in the person of the Hereditary Prince, with more limited authority, scarce deserves any comments. There no doubt may be persons who have entertained such an idea. But I am convinced the Hereditary Prince is incapable of coming into a compromise of this nature, or of separating his interests from those of the other individuals of his house; and I should be surprised if such a project should come into the head of any person at all acquainted with the disposition of the Seven Provinces. Notwithstanding the Prince Stadholder's inactivity, want of decision, and jealousy of all those who acquire influence and popularity however firmly attached to his cause, that Prince is a great favourite with the people at large by his affability and his popular manners. This is by no means the case with the Hereditary Prince. But, were it otherwise, I am convinced the idea of excluding his father will never come into his head.

"The best understanding seems to prevail between the Hereditary Prince and Prince Frederick. When the latter left the Continent on his return to England, he named a person to whom Mr. Van der Haer was to send the information he had to communicate, and this person had orders to send duplicates of the letters to the Hereditary Prince and to Prince Frederick himself; and we have observed with pleasure that the language of both these Princes in their letters is the same.

"What the intentions of the Court of Berlin may be I will not pretend to determine, nor do I believe they would be very scrupulous about any measure they thought might suit their political purposes. But, if their project is entirely to detach the Seven Provinces from Great Britain, and to throw them into the arms of France, and to make the Hereditary Prince their instrument to bring this about, I can only say, if we have any certainty on this point, if we are told so from England in the name of the Prince Stadholder or the Princess of Orange, or by your lordship, or any of his friends, we shall not only be on our guard, but we shall think it right to interrupt all communications with Berlin, and even with the Hereditary Prince if he is not proof against the artifices of that ministry. If I am told so from authority, I will answer for Mr. Van der Haer and his friends breaking off all correspondence, particularly if the Prince Stadholder wishes it. And though Oost Friesland offers many advantages for the correspondence, other channels may be found as expeditious. What the Prince Stadholder's intentions are Mr. Van der Haer cannot know, as that Prince has never answered any of his letters. Mr. Van der Haer wrote to the Prince Stadholder that he came to Varel, at the request of M. de Rhoon, to be of service to the cause soon after the French entered the country, and before M. de Rhoon was imprisoned. But unless we receive positive orders, we shall not take any hasty step of that sort, nor give credit to all the rumours that are spread. At the same time Mr. Van der Haer and his friends will not put themselves in the power of the Court of Berlin any further than they can help. They now see and feel that they have placed too much dependence on that Court, as all that comes from that quarter falls so short of what they expected."

Postscript.—April 13.—"Since I wrote the above we have had a visit of some of our Friesland friends. The Deputies of Friesland to the Convention at the Hague are now named. We are not advanced in the plan I mentioned in mine of the 18th February respecting the use we should endeavour to make of some of the Deputies when at the Hague. Mr. Van der Haer thinks still it will be very feasible, and we shall not give it up. We are only concerned that, from many circumstances, we are forced to proceed so slowly. One of our Friesland friends assured us, in case of an enterprize, of the support of an officer in that province who has above 400 men of the cavalry of the present Government at his disposal; and will declare for the Princes if an attack should be made, or if he should receive orders. This man has frequently insisted upon taking his demission, but our friend has persuaded him to remain contrary to his wish, that he might not become useless. Our friend is going back to Friesland to day."

VAN DER HAER VAN CAMPERS NIEUWLAND to C. BENTINCK.

1796, April 10, Varel.—"I will not delay communicating the enclosed letter to you, which I beg you will transmit to the English Government.

"It is a letter I have received from a person of my acquaintance who has been in correspondence for many years with Rammel, who is at present one of the French ministers. He has the original of many letters of Rammel in his possession, which will oblige Rammel for his own safety and preservation to be more tenax propositi than could otherwise be expected from a Frenchman.

"It is unnecessary to request secrecy with respect to Rammel's name. The English administration will be sufficiently convinced from the nature of the case that all the use to be derived from the man must depend on this secrecy. In this persuasion I shall confine myself to observe upon this letter that, whether it give a true statement of the conduct of Prussia, or whether it be a French artifice to excite suspicions and mistrust between England and Prussia, the communication appeared to me to be of consequence ; in one case as a caution to England, in the other that we may prevent the bad effect it may have upon our friends in the Seven Provinces.

“ In the first supposition, England and the Emperor may perhaps safely conclude a peace with France on condition that, if France does not interfere in the government of the Seven Provinces, England will not meddle with the internal Government of France. In this manner the Republic of the United Provinces may be emancipated without the interposition of Prussia, and English gold may perhaps produce greater effects in France than foreign armies have done hitherto.

“ My attachment to England is known to you by my consistent conduct ever since the year 1780, when I first came into the states of Friesland ; and by the steps I took when I was forced to leave my country, that I might have a chance of being of service, conformably to the principles I have ever persevered in. You may therefore easily imagine how happy I am to inform you that M. Van Viersen (a member of the late Supreme Court of Justice of Friesland) has offered himself to me to forward my views for the deliverance of our country by the help of England. He offers his own personal services and 4,000 people to join our party in the country, which amount in Friesland alone to about 5,500 people, ready on the first signal to support an enterprize from without. I cannot help noticing the advantage of this increase, independent of numbers, arising from these 4,000 men occupying the frontiers of Friesland towards Groningen, where they may act, whilst my strength chiefly lies on the South of the Province along the seacoast. In this manner the enterprize may be supported on both sides of the Province, and the measures of resistance will be divided and weakened.

“ The violent proceedings to which the well-intentioned within the country are exposed, particularly in Friesland, will not admit any longer of the state of uncertainty and inactivity they are in ; and it is for this reason I have formed a plan with my friends to give England an opportunity of supporting those who look to the re-establishment of the union between the two countries with impatience, and with hopes it may never be again interrupted.

“ The project is, that England should take possession of the islands of Ter Schelling, Vlie, Ameland, and Schiermonnik-Oog ; which would be the more practicable from my being able to give assurances of the favourable disposition of the inhabitants, of the good will of the garrisons, and of the bad state of defence of these islands.

I.—“ If England wishes it, but is not inclined to send any troops for this purpose, we only wish to be allowed to take into English pay 500 men of the Rassemblement at our choice, who shall land them in these islands from Costfriesland in small boats. Being landed there at the time to be fixed, they should find two English cutters, and, for each island, five pieces of cannon and the necessary ammunition.

II.—“ As soon as possession should be taken of these islands, they should be declared a conquest of Great Britain.

III.—“ The provinces of Friesland and Groningen should immediately be declared to be in a state of siege, which will prevent any neutral ships from passing through the passage called the Wadden, between the islands and the coast of Friesland and Groningen, without being exposed to the batteries of the islands.

IV.—“ That Great Britain should send some cruisers at the same time before the entrance of the Texel, in order to interrupt the whole navigation of Amsterdam, Groningen, and Friesland.

V.—“That Great Britain should send a squadron before Zealand when Groningen, Overysse, Friesland, and Drenthe are attacked on the land side, in order to divide the attention of the enemy and encourage still more the well-intentioned in their project of insurrection.

VI.—“That the forces to act on the land side on entering the territory of the Republic should declare that they act in support of the ancient constitution, in virtue of the guarantee of Great Britain.

VII.—“That the passage between the islands and Friesland is not only within gun-shot of these islands, but that it is nearly quite dry at low water. That the dominium eminens of this passage belongs to Friesland.

VIII.—“That by the Treaty of Neutrality of Russia, Friesland and Groningen being declared in a state of siege all neutral ships are excluded from passing.

IX.—“That the Court of London, the moment the islands are taken possession of, should give official notice to the merchants at Bremen and Hamburg that the navigation through the passage called the Wadden was interrupted for the reasons above mentioned.

X.—“That one of the cutters should be placed at the entrance of the Vlie, the other above Schiermonnik-Oog.

XI.—“In order to account for the seeming contradiction between the articles II. and VI., I should observe that the islands should be provisionally declared a conquest of Great Britain in order to block up Friesland and Groningen as an enemy, and to interrupt the whole commerce of Holland upon the principles of the Treaty of Neutrality; but that on the land side the troops should act in virtue of the guarantee, in order the more to animate the well-intentioned in their efforts.

“This is what I wish you to submit to the English Government, with my request that they will give it some consideration, and with assurances that it is a plan of friends of England who offer it only as an expedient, highly advantageous to both parties, which seems to deserve some attention; upon which it is their request to receive offers from England by which they may be governed.”

Extract.

1796, April 7, Leer.—“I have to inform you that I am advanced far enough in the execution of our plan within the provinces of Friesland, Groningen, Overysse, and Drenthe, to bring about at a moment's notice a counter-revolution in favour of the Stadholder, and the writing to be circulated is ready for the press. But I am at a loss from what quarter I am to lead the well-intentioned to expect with confidence that external support which will be required to give effect to these efforts, and which must determine and direct them. This uncertainty makes me the more anxious at this moment from the following expressions of a letter I have received from my well disposed friend in the Directory at Paris; ‘assured of the support of the well-intentioned in our country, my friends and I are convinced that peace must be concluded with England and the Emperor, notwithstanding the consequences it is expected will follow within this Republic (France), and we are ready to conclude, not looking upon the fate of Holland as of consequence enough to stop us. My opinion on this last point is known to you. But the Prussian Ministry are exerting themselves to the utmost, by means of our party in the Directory, to prevent the conclusion of this peace without the interference and approbation of Prussia.’ I think it right to send you the sense of this passage word for word, and to add the most material parts of my answer, namely this. I desired my friend to be persuaded that the Prussian Court had expected to find in the power of France, supported by the resources of Holland, the means of humbling Austria; and had accordingly not scrupled being faithless to the coalition. But that seeing Holland was now lost, and forced to submit to the ascendancy of Great Britain, whilst France was exhausted, and not a match for Austria powerfully supported as she is, the Prussian Ministry had no object but to prevent by their interference in the negotiation for peace that the alliance of Great Britain, Austria, and Russia should entirely preponderate, and make the Constitution of Holland subservient to their views; which would not only break the connection between Holland and France, but make France a useless ally for Prussia. Lastly, I added that the French would not find Prussia a more faithful ally than the other Powers had found her.

“Many of the Anti-Stadhouderian aristocracy in Friesland and Holland are advising the present patriots with great eagerness to restore a Stadholderian Government, with more limited authority, in the person of the Hereditary Prince of Orange, as being more attached to the Prussian Court, in order to maintain the connections with France and Prussia. I need scarce observe to you that this conduct of those persons is very wide of the true object to be attained.”

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, April 12, London.—“Je viens de voir M. Boyd. Il sortait de chez M. Pitt. Le résultat de leur conversation relativement à l'emprunt a été qu'on ne pouvait pas encore prononcer la promesse de la garantie, mais que d'ici à quelques semaines, la chose serait peut-être possible. Monsieur Pitt a dit au banquier qu'il serait à propos que je fusse muni des pouvoirs de ma Cour pour terminer immédiatement dès que la chose serait décidée, sans perdre de nouveau le temps à la postillionnade éternelle d'ici à Vienne. Il serait donc à propos que vous eussiez la bonté d'écrire à M. Eden pour qu'il les demande pour moi de votre part au Baron Thugut. J'écirai dans le même sens de mon côté, mais, comme notre bureau a toujours l'air d'avoir peur d'acheter chat en poche, ou d'être trompé, j'ai imaginé un moyen pour prévenir tous leurs scrupules. La maison Boyd me donnera, vendredi prochain, sa soumission et son plan pour l'emprunt, en exposant distinctement ses conditions, et exprimant la latitude qui pourrait résulter en plus et en moins dans le prix selon l'époque où il se ferait. Ayant une fois ces conditions sous les yeux, on n'aura plus qu'à me mander, signez dans tel ou tel cas, nous approuvons les conditions, ou les réjettons entièrement; et alors ils seraient obligés de renoncer à l'emprunt. Du moment où je serai instruit de leur dernier mot on pourra conclure dès qu'on annoncera la garantie. Il serait à propos que vous eussiez la bonté de prévenir également sur les conditions politiques que vous exigeriez, au cas que vous en exigiez. Je crois que vous approuverez mon idée; elle mène promptement au but qu'on se propose. J'espère avoir l'honneur d'en causer avec vous avant Vendredi, mais je désirerais que [vous] voulussiez bien donner dès aujourd'hui des instructions à ce sujet à votre Ministre à Vienne.”

French.

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, April 14, War Office.—“As the objections are thought to be so strong against the permitting, however negatively and indirectly, the coining of Louis in this country, I have endeavoured, as the only means remaining, to obtain a supply from Hamburg ; and have for that purpose caused a letter some time ago to be written to Walkiers the banker, and obtained an order to Sir Richard Strachan who is going with the Princess, to receive on board whatever quantity Walkiers may have been able to collect. But I doubt lest some difficulty should be made, unless your Lordship will let Mr. Fraser be written to, in order to satisfy M. Walkiers that the proceeding has the sanction of Government ; as the only security of Walkiers for the delivery stands at present upon a letter which he has received from Woodford, backed by the instructions which he will find given to Sir Richard Strachan.

"May I beg the favour of you to let such a letter be written to Mr. Fraser as may recognize, at least, the connection between the instructions given to Sir Richard Strachan and the letter which he has received by my direction. I shall take care that the sums which he shall be required to remit, shall not exceed what has been allotted to the service in question. I shall be very glad if it prove near as much, and unless it does so, I fear it will be necessary to signify to the Royalists that the engagement which we have made, is one which cannot be carried into execution, and must be retracted.

"The distress in which they are at present for powder, and every thing else but zeal and numbers, is so great that, unless some more active means are taken for their relief, the fate of their leaders and of their party must be same (and from the same causes) as that of Charette and the Royalists of the Vendée."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. WINDHAM.

Private.

1796, April 15, Downing Street.—"I have received your letter, and am anxious to explain to you the difficulties which seem to stand in the way of the mode which you propose for transacting this business. By the Civil List Act, which regulates the issue and account for secret service money, all sums for that purpose must be issued by the Treasury upon applications from one of the Secretaries of State or the First Lord of the Admiralty, whose receipt is filed in the Exchequer in order to render them accountable for the money so received, and who must discharge themselves by oath in the manner prescribed by the Act. Whatever relates to the mode of procuring the money seems to belong much more properly to the Treasury than to the Secretary of State, except in the single case where he is obliged by circumstances to authorize the drawing bills from abroad.

"But, I apprehend, it would be a step liable to very just exception if, in a concern of so much delicacy as the issue and application of secret service money, I were to step so far out of the regular official course as to authorize one of the King's Ministers to make himself, and through him me, responsible to Mr. Walkiers for the expense of procuring this coin, on terms of which I am necessarily ignorant, and for purposes the detail of which cannot properly pass through me ; although if I charge myself with the money I can only discharge myself by swearing to its application.

"The regular mode seems to me that the Treasury, being informed by Mr. Dundas that such a sum will be wanted in Louis d'or at Hamburg for his Majesty's secret service, should authorize some person to contract in their name with Mr. Walkiers or any one else as shall be thought right, for the expense of procuring the Louis d'or on terms to be previously settled ; and that this expense, whatever it may be, should be issued to Mr. Dundas as foreign secret service money, and the money afterwards received on board and applied under his orders to the purposes for which it is destined.

"I hope it cannot be necessary for me to say that all this is stated not for the sake of any question of etiquette, but on account of the obvious necessity of not departing from the ordinary forms established by practice and by law, in matters so very delicate as those which concern the issue and application of public money ; where the particulars of the expenditure cannot be brought forward, like all other public expenses, with regular vouchers, but must be accounted for upon the oath of the persons to whom alone by law the money can be issued in that form."

LORD GRENVILLE TO WILLIAM WICKHAM.

Private.

1796, April 15, Cleveland Row.—Original published in the Correspondence of the Right Honourable William Wickham. 1870, Vol. I., p. 342.

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, April 22, Varel.—"I have not anything very material to mention this day. I have received a report from Mr. Vau der Haer, whom I have frequently mentioned, which two of his friends have sent him relating to the forts of Couverden and Bourtang, and the approaches towards Munsterland. By this report it appears that these forts are not in a state of defence, that the works are in a ruinous state, the approaches quite open, and that the garrisons in those forts and districts do not amount to above one thousand men (French), that these troops are dissatisfied, and there seems even to have been some desertion amongst them ; the writers of the report, who relate chiefly what they have seen and heard themselves on the spot, having met 35 of these French deserters. This is the abstract of this report, which I have not time to translate to-day. Further details may be had at a moment's notice by those it may concern, as well as the necessary guides if wanted.

"We are more impatient every day to see a chance of some advantage being derived of the favourable disposition of the country."

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, April 27, Somerset Place.—"I return you Sir Charles Malet's letter, together with one from Mr. Scott, by which you will perceive that I have had communication with him on the subject. I agree with Mr. Scott that Sir Charles's letter to you is childishly and peevishly wrote, and, if I had not other proofs to my own mind perfectly satisfactory, I should be disposed to doubt his abilities to the extent I have supposed. I am not, however, at all hurt personally, as Scott seems to suppose I should be. In truth, he has not the shadow of a pretence for being out of humour, but a very useful and meritorious servant ought not to forfeit the benefit of his services by allowing himself, in an unguarded hour, to get out of humour. I have therefore seen Mr. Scott this morning, and have suggested to him the propriety of appointing him one of the Council at Bombay ; but, at the same time, to write out a handsome paragraph respecting his services at Poonah, and, if he would rather choose to remain there during the present unsettled state of Mahratta politics, to express an approbation or rather a desire that he should do so, and, in that case, to make his emoluments at least equal to what they would be if he was a Member of Council."

C. W. MALET to LORD GRENVILLE.

1795, August 8, Bombay.—"This is purposely to relieve you from any trouble that you may have been disposed to take in promotion of the objects which I took the liberty of submitting to your Lordship's adoption, in a letter that I had the honour of writing you under the 30th June, via Bussorah, assuring your Lordship of my willingness to benefit by an option of succeeding to this Government, to the Chiefship of Surat, or to a seat at the Supreme Council, or the Council of this Presidency. But least so early a change of opinion on points of so great importance should subject me, in your Lordship's opinion, which I highly respect, to an appearance of levity, I will not hesitate to confess that, on a further consideration of the late appointment to this Government, my feelings are so much hurt, and that zeal with which I have hitherto pressed forwards to hold the most honourable place amongst my contemporaries, so depressed by the humiliating appointment of a junior, drawn from another Presidency, that my repugnance to become a suitor to the authors of what to me appears so unjust a degradation is invincible.

"It is true, my Lord, that, by this dereliction of your powerful patronage in pursuit of the above objects, great inconvenience and prejudice to my interests may ensue, but I cannot hesitate to sacrifice such considerations to the public respectability of my character, established on the official records of the three Presidencies in every Department of Government during the long period of twenty-five years' service, distinguished by the most flattering approbation of the Court of Directors and crowned by the honourable distinction of our gracious sovereign. In a word, my Lord, I feel my degradation proportionate to what, in my eye, appears the undue exaltation of another, and I apprehend that, with chilled affection and frozen zeal, my services would in future rather be measured by the treatment they have experienced, than by that energy with which hitherto I have, and should in future wish to exert myself. A certain reciprocity of attention is due even in the relation of servant and served; and, though obedience at all events is incumbent, as long as the relation subsists, yet the more delicate energies of zealous attachment are generated only by the genial warmth of liberal confidence and generous protection. Those withdrawn, mutual estrangement will, I apprehend, ensue; and, though not frequently acknowledged, must be attended with the most pernicious effects to public service, by introducing on our part a narrow spirit of reserve and self-interest, on the other of vexatious jealousy and coercion. My principles of action will, I hope, enable me to combat the obvious tendency of such a predicament during my further stay, which the critical posture of affairs may, on public and private grounds render necessary in this country; which will not, I trust, expose me long to the danger of losing the consolatory reflection that, though my employers have been unkind, my services (merit out of the question) have been irreproachable."

D. SCOTT to HENRY DUNDAS.

2796, April 27, London.—"I return Lord Grenville and Sir Charles Mallet's letters. Sir Charles, I think, reflects more upon you than any person, indeed so much that I don't think he should have any further mark of favour. He has had most uncommon marks of favour, far beyond any person so situated before; and, in return, he ascribes the whole to his own merit and gives ingratitude for what he has received. If the Court were to see some lines of the enclosed letter, they certainly would never offer him a place in Council. I shall, however, as you seem to think it right, propose tomorrow Mr. James Stevens and Sir Charles Mallet as Council and James Rivet as provisional Council."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, April 29, Varel.—"The accounts of our friend, whom I have so often mentioned, has received to day from the person who is authorized to correspond with him, are more favourable than they have been yet. The march of a corps of troops, Prussians, Hanoverians, and Brunswickers, to cover the line of demarcation, the concert that seems to subsist at least upon this point between Courts supposed to be at variance, the hopes given our friend that we shall see the Duke of Brunswick at the head of this corps, and the reputation this gives to many of the suspicions and rumours spread with respect to the views of one of these Courts of which I have taken notice in my letter of the 11th and 13th instant, all these circumstances lead us to expect a change in our favour; and I am happy to think that, though I judged it right to state what I heard of those rumours and suspicions, I have not given an implicit credit to them, but, on the contrary, observed great reserve upon that head, and even lately discouraged them; and so I shall continue to do unless things turn out very differently from what there is reason to expect at present, and I heard to the contrary, as I have mentioned in former letters. The instructions our friend received with respect to the use he is to make of the information sent him will be strictly attended to, and not a step of consequence will be taken without orders being given, to prevent the mischief that might result from anything hasty or premature.

"The turn affairs are taking is a very satisfactory answer to many parts of my letters, but is not to some points I have touched; and I cannot help observing that I have not had any answer from your Lordship to any of my letters, nor indeed received a line since last April; and yet I have written very regularly for the last six months. I still think it right to persevere, if I do not hear to the contrary. But it cannot be expected I should go on with the same confidence and the same effect if I receive no communications whatever from those to whom I have uniformly looked for them, and if I do not meet with that support I have been led to expect. I offered before I left England to speak to two other persons, one of whom is still there, with respect to my intentions. They are nearly related, and highly interested in the events I allude to. I beg to remind your Lordship I was told in Dover Street, before I left town, it was not necessary, nor have I done it. I have not lost sight of my object, which was to act in such a manner that, in case my brother should obtain his liberty, I might go to the Hague if he wished it. I shall persevere in the line I have taken. In the meantime I am not apprehensive that my friends will suppose I have lightly advanced more than I can justify; but I should be concerned to appear to them to be totally forgot, or to have lost the confidence of those whose good opinion they know I set great value upon, and whose support will enable me to be of greater use to the cause, and to my friends, than I can otherwise expect to be."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1796, April 28, Cleveland Row.—“J’ai reçu hier de la main du Roi l’incluse, avec l’ordre de la vous renvoyer. Le contenu ne m’a nullement surpris. J’avais toujours cru que M. l’Ambassadeur se trouverait infiniment mieux là-bas qu’ici. J’espère cependant que Madame la Comtesse ne s’empressera pas de profiter de l’invitation, puisque je doute qu’elle trouverait autant d’agrémens à la société Parisienne que M. del Campo.

“Ces nouvelles d’Italie sont affreuses par les conséquences qui peuvent en résulter, à moins que le Directoire n’ait fut exagéré les choses. Il faut que je vous vois pour dix minutes ce soir. Pouvez-vous passer chez moi sur les huit heures ?”

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, April 30, Fribourg.—“In obedience to your Lordship’s commands, and I have seldom received or executed any with more pleasure, I have shewn to the Greffier Fagel every civility and attention in my power.

“I had known him many years since at Geneva ; I am besides very particularly attached to his uncle, M. de Salgas, with whom he is now going to stay, and I had actually written to him at Hamburg before I received your Lordship’s letter to request that he would take up his abode with me on his passage through Berne. I have obtained from the Secret Council, to whom I thought it wiser to make my application than to the Senate, that he shall be exempt from the jurisdiction of the Comité des Etrangers during his residence in the canton.

“I have also to acknowledge your Lordship’s very obliging letter of the 15th instant. I will take care in future to attend to the hint you are so good as [to] give me with respect to inclosures that I may wish to have destroyed. Your Lordship must no doubt be reminded from time to time that you sent me abroad without giving me the smallest time to inform myself of any one particular regarding the regular routine of business. In that respect I have however always made myself perfectly easy in the assurance that, whilst the main part of my business was well and carefully attended to, your Lordship would not only overlook such little errors yourself, but that you would explain and excuse them to others.

“I am most seriously alarmed about this miserable business in Italy. Its consequences will be very extensive. If the Piedmontese would continue to fight, I should rather consider it as an advantage, as much so as the passage of the Rhine proved to be last year. The French would find their grave in Italy, and the interior would be free from troops. But all hopes of that kind seem unfortunately to be over. Your Lordship will perceive that Mr. Trevor’s No. 32 is wanting. It was sent by a courier of M. d’Hauteville’s and has never reached me.

“Your Lordship will perceive by my public dispatch that I had not neglected the department of Cher. I will do my utmost to distribute the money I may send into the interior so as that it may produce effect, but there will be no end to the expense if every partial insurrection that may take place this spring and summer must be separately supported. I see M. de Précy will do nothing but upon a great scale, and that he will require his operations to be preceded by a much more considerable expense than the one proposed last winter ; but, as the die is now fairly cast, I presume that it would be thought right not to adhere too rigidly to the old proposals, provided he will make an attempt fairly and bonâ fide.

“What are we to think of the Directory suffering Pichégrou to come to Strasburgh ? And what are we to think of this delay in his arrival ? And what are we to think of the King’s arrival at the very moment that the other was expected ? I assure you I am half disposed to be superstitious about this business since the rencontre at Riegel. This project has always been my favourite one, though I never deceived myself with respect to the difficulties by which its execution must necessarily be accompanied. I presume, of course (if I perceive any reasonable hope that an attempt will be made), that I should be unbounded in my offers of money.

“Cochon, the new Minister of the Police, was the person from whom I received the papers that I transmitted to you last year (I think) by the messenger Schaw from Mulheim containing the general view of the then projects of the French Government, most of which have been fully realized. He was then member of the Committee of Public Safety. I cannot prevail upon the person who procured them for me to return to Paris. Cochon must be paid high, but he will do anything and betray anybody for money.”

THE EARL OF ELGIN TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, May 1, Berlin.—“May I beg to recall to your Lordship the hopes you very obligingly gave me while in London, of having permission to be absent from Berlin a part of the summer, in case no particular business required my attendance here. I can assure your Lordship that I have no disinclination to be employed here, or any where else. But foreseeing no prospect of business where a Secretary of Legation would not be equally useful, I should be much indebted to you for leave, if not to go to England, at least to make occasional excursions from hence. I have been near two years much of an invalid ; and though greatly recovered, still my physicians recommend strongly the use of sea bathing or mineral baths this summer. And it would be a very particular mark of kindness if your Lordship could enable me to execute their directions, provided no material objection occurred.

“I enclose an official application which may be useful, in case your Lordship approves of my request.”

THE EARL OF ELGIN TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, May 1, Berlin.—“Having at present a safe conveyance to Cuxhaven, I beg leave to state to your Lordship some observations which I have collected on the conduct of business here.

“At this moment, Count Haugwitz is the only minister capable of forming, or carrying through any system of politics. But, even in matters where the Foreign Department is exclusively concerned, he cannot act independently of Count Finckenstein, and Baron Alvensleben ; hence, that degree of caution, that wavering, and occasional variations which are to be perceived in every plan of this Cabinet. Besides Count Haugwitz is excessively artful, and knows perfectly where his interest requires that he should yield to circumstances. In affairs, on the other hand, connected with the internal administration of the country, the Grand Directory (composed of twelve Ministers) necessarily comes to be consulted. And the strange opinions of some, and the secret influence of which others are susceptible, often throws very unexpected obstacles in the way of business. But in all matters, General Bischoffeswerder's weight is felt, and in most M. Rietz also interferes. The influence of the former is what it long has been. Perhaps since his marriage he is more liable to receive impressions; and no doubt, the French have, in some instances of late, conveyed partial ones. But he does not attempt directing or carrying through any extensive plans. All he does is giving or keeping up ideas in the King's mind. M. Rietz, formerly valet de chambre, and now Private Treasurer, has very great weight with the King. He is much attached to the person of the King, and to the interests of the country; and anxiously opposes every measure which he considers contrary to either. Hence his uniform opposition to every recommendation given in favour of the exportation of corn from the Prussian territories. At the same time many matters naturally occur where his notions must be very defective; and of course, he is open to the impressions which may be thrown before him.

"It will readily occur to your Lordship that, under circumstances where it is not meant that the British Minister should act the part which Mr. Ewart carried on here, or attempt establishing a directing influence at Berlin, public character is not what is most useful either towards procuring information, or conveying with effect any occasional impressions. On the contrary, much benefit would be derived from habitual intercourse with the society and connexions of M. Rietz, and persons in similar situations about Court. Many instances might, I am confident, be found for applying money to purpose. But this can only be by persons of a rank in the line inferior to that which I hold. On these grounds in particular, as well as from the general advantages of such a person, I should venture strongly to recommend to your Lordship the residence of a Secretary of Legation here.

"As to sources of secret intelligence I beg to mention a circumstance which has lately happened. Among the offerers for exporting grain to England a man of the name of Lentze (partner in the house of Hammer and Company at Magdebourg, and brother to the Deputy-Steward of the Household), struck me by the accuracy of his information on all matters connected with his object. He gave me an opening to suggest his undertaking to furnish me habitually with intelligence here; but he told me that, being of respectable connexions, and in a respectable line, he could consent to nothing of the kind unless he was vested with some ostensible character which would screen him from all persecution from this Government. He pointed out the situation of a Consul to Magdebourg and Stetin, with permission to reside chiefly at Berlin; a situation for which we would ask no appointments, considering that the advantages which the nomination would give him in the line of his profession, and the allowance which I should make him for his secret services, a full compensation for all his time. He accordingly gave me the enclosed memorandum.

"I should be happy to know your Lordship's wishes on the subject. I do not really conceive much use in the naming a Consul as long as there is a Minister here, and all commercial business is transacted at Berlin. But whether in the case of M. Lentze, or of any other substantial merchant here, such a nomination (even if, in itself, indifferent to England) might perhaps be turned to great advantage under the present circumstances of this Court. And it is in that view that I convey M. Lentze's suggestion to your Lordship."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, May 2, London.—“J’ai écrit ma Cour dans le sens dont vous m’avez parlé, et conformément à ce que je vous ai promis. La dépêche qui a rapport à l’objet dont nous nous sommes entretenus, est entièrement écrite de ma main, et personne dans le monde, exceptez celui qui l’adresse et celui à quelle est adressée, n’en aura connaissance. Permettez que je profite de cette occasion pour vous remercier de la confiance que vous me témoignez, et de la délicatesse de votre procédé. Croyez que rien de tout cela n’échappe à mon cœur et à ma sensibilité. Je tâcherai de mériter de plus en plus les sentimens flatteurs dont vous m’honorez. Les miens pour vous ne varieront jamais. Respect, estime, et amitié la plus tendre sont ma devise envers vous.

“Oserais-je vous demander s’il est survenu quelque changement dans vos projets? Vous m’aviez fait l’honneur de me dire Jeudi que votre courrier partirait le lendemain; je me suis hâté de finir ma besogne, et vous ne l’avez pas expédié. Je ne suis nullement pressé, mais je vous supplie uniquement de daigner me faire avertir du jour de l’expédition pour que j’envoie mes paquets au bureau. Permettez aussi que je vous demande un moment d’entretien pour un de ces jours; j’ai quelque chose à vous communiquer dont on pourra peut-être tirer quelque parti.”

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

1796, May 6, Dropmore.—“My brother has mentioned to me the conversation which he had with Lord G. Cavendish, and afterwards with your Grace, on the subject of a county meeting in Buckinghamshire which it is in contemplation to call with a view to ascertain the disposition of the county towards Lord Tichfield. I hope you will excuse the liberty I take of troubling you with a few lines upon the subject from the motive which leads me to do so, which is no other than the most anxious desire to prevent, if possible, anything that could have the appearance of contest, or opposition of sentiment or interest, between your grace and those with whom I am most nearly connected; and that most particularly on an occasion where the difference, if any, would be confined to the manner of conducting the business, and would not, I am certain, in the smallest degree apply to the main point itself of Lord Tichfield’s re-election.

“Although from his former engagements with the county, it would not be proper for Lord Buckingham to take any active steps in supporting the choice of any person whatever as a colleague to Mr. I. Grenville, yet I am sure I speak his sentiments when I say that he is sincerely desirous that the representation should continue as it now is, and that, by that means, all danger of contest or uneasiness in the county should be avoided; and I think I know the county well enough to be able to say with confidence that if Lord Tichfield contents himself with renewing the offer of his service, in the same form in which he first made it, not the slightest opposition is to be expected.

“But your Grace cannot but be sensible that there have, on former occasions, been great differences of opinion as to the propriety of county meetings in Buckinghamshire for the nomination of members. Any such meeting has been, as I believe, invariably opposed by our family; and we have been successful in establishing the contrary practice. The last time that there has been any question of such a meeting was in 1779, on the death of Lord Temple. The meeting was then not called by the sheriff (whether he refused it or not I really do not recollect), but by some of the gentlemen of the county. Lord Buckingham and my brother Mr. Grenville (who attended the meeting) opposed, not the particular candidate who was in view, but the idea of nominating a candidate to the freeholders at large by a meeting which must necessarily be (in so long a county as our's) a very inadequate representation of the opinions of the county. And in fact no nomination was made.

"Whether our opinion in this respect, or the practice of other counties is best seems hardly worth enquiring now; but I am confident Lord Buckingham would conceive that both his honour and his interest are concerned in opposing any alteration of the established practice of this county in that respect. If it were any common case I should say that, in this situation of things, the matter must take it's course. Lord Tichfield's friends, thinking a meeting the best course for his interest, if they do think so, would try to call the meeting. Lord Buckingham, consistently with his uniform conduct and declarations, would oppose it. But it is impossible for me not to feel that, however the opposition might, and I am sure would in Lord Buckingham's intentions, be confined to that point only, the impression it would create universally would be that of hostility to Lord Tichfield's election; and I hope I do not do wrong in judging from my own feelings of the desire which your Grace must have to avoid giving any such impression. At all events, I thought I should not do what was right either towards you or to Lord Buckingham if I did not bring the matter under your consideration in that point of view in which it may possibly not have struck you.

"Although, of course, it does not belong to me to suggest any mode of proceeding to Lord Tichfield's friends in this county, I cannot help adding that the objections I have stated do not, as far as I can judge, appear to apply in any degree to any discussion as to Lord Tichfield's standing which might take place at a meeting of his friends, whether called for the purpose, or such as they are in the practice of holding from time to time."

C. BENTINCK to C. GODDARD.

1796, May 6, Varel.—"I enclose an abstract from a letter of a very well known and wealthy merchant at Embden, to a friend of his who lives in this neighbourhood. The letter contains a strong confirmation of many details I have sent, and is worth reading in many respects. What makes it still more curious is that both the writer and his correspondent are connected with the Dutch Patriots of 1787, as is easily seen by some expressions of the letter. It was sent us by the person who lives in this neighbourhood, who thought the letter might deserve our attention; and this shows how much the minority of that party is cooled, our sentiments being so well known and so uniformly and openly avowed. I shall be obliged to you to give it to Lord Grenville. The latter part of the letter may perhaps be thought to deserve more attention than all the rest. The writer is just returned from Holland."

Enclosure.

ABSTRACT OF A LETTER FROM EMBDEN.

1796, April 28, Embden.—"I arrived here last Tuesday in the afternoon. In Holland, and in Friesland in particular, things bear a strange appearance. The divisions between the Moderate and Jacobin Patriots are increasing into the most violent hatred, and are more inveterate than those which took place before between the Orange party and the Patriots. The Moderate Patriots whilst they were in the Government, did not find the task so easy as they had expected. They saw they could not get through it without the assistance of the deposed members of the ancient Government who were attached to the House of Orange. They accordingly made overtures to them from time to time, wishing for a union, and would willingly have shared their authority with them. In this manner some reasonable plan might have been adopted; but, now the Jacobins hold the reins, in my opinion all is lost. In Friesland this set are completely masters; the Representatives are all notorious Jacobins. They depose in all the towns and villages all those who were employed under the ancient Government, and those who are well-disposed. They choose others in their room by elections of the inhabitants, or rather of the Jacobins. From these elections the Orange party and the well-disposed Patriots are kept away by the oath required from those who vote. The oath is such that neither of these descriptions of persons can take it, the former on account of their attachment to the Prince, the latter from fear of the consequences. Of course none come to these elections but Jacobins of the worst sort. It is easily imagined that the persons they choose are very unfit for the situations. For instance at Harlingen, where the election took place at the time I was there, among other persons named for the municipality were a baker, a man who keeps a pastry-cook shop, a tailor, a wood-merchant's journeyman, two shop-keepers of the lowest class. One of them had been servant to a Jew, and sold cakes about the street at a farthing a piece; another was a bricklayer; and one of them could neither read nor write, who was afterwards displaced on account of his gross ignorance. In this large town not above 70 of the lowest inhabitants met in the church, and, supported by the Declaration of the Rights of Man, chose these respectable persons to govern them; the remainder of the inhabitants, kept away by the oath required, were obliged to submit. In Leeuwarden the Capital, the hangman's son, a worthless fellow who had fled the country for thieving, and another man who carries turf about the town, are now among the municipality. All persons of any character are dismissed from their offices, and may think themselves fortunate if they are not thrown into prison, as has already been the case with many good patriots. If the choice in other provinces turns out as it has here, I foresee some Marat et Robespierre as the consequence. The hot Jacobins are partly patriots of 1787 who left the country at the time of the revolution, and are mostly hot-headed aventuriers, and being at that time deranged in their circumstances, and since totally bewildered, have dissipated what little they had left. These fancy they have now a claim upon their country and are entitled to all offices of profit, under the supposition that an office and the capacity to fill it go together. They wish to drive the Prince's friends out of the country, and to dispose of their property to pay the 100,000,000 to France, and for extraordinary expenses which they expect to run very high; and no doubt they will not forget their own purse whilst the Administration is in their hands. The best patriots meant to forget the past, to divide equally the extraordinary burdens which they were forced to impose whilst in power. The Enragés made use of this as a handle against the Modérés to bring about their fall. They now wish as much as the Orange party that the Revolution never had taken place. They are persuaded the French deceived them, take their money with great politeness, and, when done, will leave Holland to its fate. The French, on the other hand, see that nothing is to be done with the phlegmatic Dutchman but to take his money; which I have from French officers when no Dutchman happened to be present. Most of the new-appointed officers are dissatisfied, nor is much to be expected from the Navy. The sailors on board the ships, who had received promises of better treatment, find themselves disappointed, ill-used, and starved, desert on all occasions, and even endeavour to carry their ships into English harbours. There is an end of commerce and of manufactures, even a want of the raw materials to carry them on. Peasants and citizens must learn the use of arms, which first amused now tires them; and punishments become necessary to force their submission in this instance. At Amsterdam they were at first punished with fines for not appearing; their non-appearance is now punished with imprisonment, which does not please the free Amsterdammers. All are dissatisfied, the rich as well as the middling classes. The poor never suffered more. All hope for a change, though no one sees where it is to come from. The French they wish out of the country, were they even to be driven out by the Prussians; so some of them speak. The opening of the Scheld gives great discontent; and with the loss of the East-Indies, it is the death blow of Amsterdam. Here is a rapid sketch of what I have seen and heard. Some respectable merchants have more than once expressed their wishes to me rather to be under the government of the King of Prussia than to continue under such a government. I have been three times in the gallery of the National Convention, strangers must be quiet with their hats off. Mr. Bicher of Amsterdam was President, which he went through tolerably well. Applications for offices were nearly all I heard, and a project for the education of children, which was well enough. Good speaking I did not hear. They discuss slowly, and do not interrupt the speaker. Van Zon an attorney, a fat but active man, has great influence over the National Convention. He has obtained a permission to sell ships. When he wishes to get any request or memorial of his to be favourably received in the Convention, he goes the evening before he presents it to the President in order to explain it, and to show the legality of what he asks; and, when referred to any of the committees, he knows how to instruct the leading members in those committees, and in this manner to obtain his ends. I believe he gets rich in this employment. I shall be glad to know whether he will get my ship, detained at Harlingen, released, as he has strongly led me to expect."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, May 13, Varel.—"I enclose the last accounts we received as I had them from our friend, the person I have so frequently mentioned, who has sent them to the person authorised to correspond with him. These are confirmed by all we hear from other quarters, and we have every reason to believe that in Guelderland, Arnheim alone perhaps excepted, in North Holland, in South Holland, and in all its large and populous towns not excepting Amsterdam, the disgust and discontent are carried on as far as in the provinces to which I have chiefly directed your attention. I have confined myself to these provinces because the information we had through the channels I have mentioned, from our vicinity and other circumstances I have noticed, was as direct and authentic as I could wish; and what relates to other parts of the country I knew would be communicated more fully than I should be able to do, where it would be requisite, and would of course reach you. I can with confidence repeat all I have said with respect to the provinces I have alluded to. Far from losing, we are gaining ground daily; and we have frequent proofs of the perseverance and resolution of our friends, whose hopes and confidence the person I have so often mentioned in preceding letters succeeds in keeping up ; and whose activity I have no doubt he will be able to suspend till a time comes to direct it with safety and effect to the object we may have in view. We beg to know whether it is wished that the principal members of the ancient Government of the provinces I have chiefly noticed should follow the example said in the enclosed to be set them, and apply to the Courts of London and Berlin, or either of them, to put the guarantee in force and give effect to the Treaty of Loo. We should not wish this to be done without being assured of receiving a satisfactory and ostensible answer of some sort ; as such an application would hurt those who might propose it and get it signed if it did not meet with the reception expected, or was left unanswered. But a syllable from you, or from persons authorised to write to our friend, and he has no doubt of obtaining such an application, in due form and at a moment's notice, from a considerable number of the most popular and best disposed members of the ancient Government of the provinces I have chiefly spoken of.

“Not having heard from England, I console myself with the hopes that what I have mentioned has been thought to deserve some attention from many of the communications our friend has received ; and what he received by the last post in particular supposes the knowledge of a few circumstances he transmitted to England only. We observe, with great satisfaction, the language held and the hopes given to bear the appearance of a regular and well digested plan of conduct, in which all the most material transactions find their proper place ; and which all the different persons employed forward, as far as it is intended they should, without knowing of each other any further than required. From this we expect the best result, and some parts of the plan may fail, some of the persons fall off, without endangering the rest. At the same time I am no further apprehensive at this moment of anything of this sort than from the accidents to which all situations of this kind are liable. I shall drop these conjectures, however convincing in my mind, in hopes of receiving more positive information from England. I earnestly request an answer to the points I have touched in former letters. What I have suggested, though not wanted by the persons I have named themselves, who are far above any considerations of this sort, will at this moment be of essential and immediate service. Not having any answer, and wishing to go on to the utmost of my power, I have desired our friend to hold out promises of reward and gratifications wherever necessary to insure success ; that I would be answerable to him for being enabled to fulfil them sooner or later ; and that those who desire the end must desire the means ; that, at any rate, we might expect some time or other to find it amongst our friends. I had the less scruple to say this as I know from all I have seen I shall have no reason to repent having advanced so far. At the same time what I have suggested is very necessary at this moment, and will enable the parties concerned to use more dispatch. It has been mentioned to me lately how necessary it was, and it cannot be put in better hands than those I mentioned. At the same time we are happy to think that the further perseverance and activity of our friends do not depend solely or chiefly upon any support of this sort ; though, no doubt, they would derive great advantage from it.”

ABSTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

“A letter dated May 1st says that the National Convention of the Batavian Republic has again decreed that the tax of one sixteenth throughout those provinces should be levied; that one of the Groningen Representatives writes that the situation of the finances, more particularly of the province of Holland, is quite hopeless and offers no prospect of redress; that the principal of the debt indeed was still to be considered as mortgaged on that province; but that the other provinces must pay their share of the annual interest, and Groningen in particular that of 24,000,000 as her share, and the whole produce of the land-tax, the chief source of revenue of the province, would be absorbed for this purpose. He adds that the second term of the 4 per cent. was fixed for the 26 instant, but that many persons had not yet paid their share of the first, as has been said before; and that they will delay and resist to the utmost of their power in order to embarrass the finances still further, and in hopes of being rescued yet, without which they feel all these efforts must be fruitless.

"A letter, dated May 5, states that the committees of the National Convention demand 60,000,000 for the expenses of this year, without knowing as yet where these are to be found owing to the general distress of the finances. That, having made a requisition of horses, they are now to make a requisition of men, and preparatory exhortations for this purpose are circulating.

"A third letter, dated May 5, from a person likely to be well informed, mentions that all the reports of the members of the National Convention insist upon the deplorable state of the finances, and contain open acknowledgments of this truth; and that the general wish is the restoration of the ancient Government; and there is every reason to expect that many wish eagerly to tread back the dangerous road they have taken, feeling now the impossibility of attaining their object. The province of Groningen had sent up complaints to the National Convention against the oppressive quartering of troops, there being 5,600 French and 3,300 Batavians in that province; that Delfziel has been lately provided with a great many cannon, most, if not all, of iron. On the other hand it is confidently reported that all the French and Bavarians will be encamped together near Zutphen, and in other places; and no other troops remain in Groningen but the Chasseurs of Trip amounting to about 600. That money is so scarce in the public coffers that the Representatives themselves do not receive their salaries; and that, in Friesland, the Receivers in the particular districts had orders to pay in what they had partly collected of the 4 per cent. tax. Such was the scarcity of money that, at Amsterdam, the merchants went to Change to hear the news, and from habit, but not for the sake of business; that the accounts spread with so much industry of the successes of the French army in Italy did not meet with all the credit and produce the effect expected, and the heads of the Government were very desponding. That they had seen a very well drawn up paper with an application to England and Prussia as guarantees, and signed by many Hollanders of distinction, which they had not ventured to send to their correspondent."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, May 14, Somerset Place.—"Lord Camden is not aware that Colonel Craufurd is your correspondent and not mine, but, in place of writing to him that answer, I have told Mr. Stewart that I would transmit Lord Camden's letter to you, and that I was persuaded I would meet with the same disposition of your part to attend to Lord Camden's wishes, as he could have met with on my part, if the business had rested with me."

Enclosure.

EARL CAMDEN to HENRY DUNDAS.

1796, May 7, Dublin Castle.—“I have prevailed on Mr. Pelham to make an application to Colonel Crawford, with whom he is upon the most intimate terms, to admit my nephew Major Stewart to belong to his suite, whilst he remains with the Austrian army; and I have just seen a letter from him, in which he is so good as to say he will receive him if he (Major Stewart) was allowed to come under the sanction of the English ministry as attached to his mission, (though without pay) otherwise the Austrians might make difficulties. I venture to hope that you will assist this object with your influence, as it is one which, from the regard and affection I feel towards my nephew, I am particularly desirous of accomplishing. I have desired him to call on you and to deliver this letter to you, and you cannot oblige me more than by promoting the object of it as much as you can, and by giving him the Ministerial sanction which may be necessary for his joining Colonel Crawford.”

LORD GRENVILLE to the EARL OF ELGIN.

1796, May 17, Cleveland Row.—“It is probable that Parliament will be dissolved on Friday next, and I have therefore thought it right to transmit to you the forms of a proxy and of a signed list, in order that you may make use of either of them, as you shall think best, for voting at the election of the 16 peers for Scotland in the ensuing Parliament.

“I send the list of those who seem to me, as far as I am at present informed, most likely to be supported by the major part of the Scotch peerage, but this list is of course liable to variation from different circumstances. If you should prefer voting by proxy (to the sending a signed list) I should imagine that either Lord Glasgow or Lord Moray would be peers on whose attendance you might rely.

“I expect to be able to write to you more at large by another opportunity as to the question of your absence from Berlin. I will only say at present that it appears to me very doubtful whether, under the existing circumstances, the business of that mission can with propriety be left to any person in an inferior station to that of the King's Minister there.”

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR MORTON EDEN.

Private.

1796, May 24, Cleveland Row.—“I am much embarrassed what to do in the present circumstances respecting Count Starhemberg, as I do not think myself at liberty to apprise him of the intention, which I suppose to be entertained, of charging some other person than himself to negotiate the convention, which, for the reason I have stated in my public dispatch, must inevitably be reserved to be concluded here. I confess it does not appear to me that there is any great difficulty or delicacy in the arrangement of the business on the side of Austria, and I should therefore much prefer to have to treat with him than with a stranger. I am not blind to his faults, but as long as he is continued Minister here, it is surely better that he should be treated with the usual marks of confidence due to his station than that these should be withheld from him. His father is certainly a frondeur as to all that is passing, but I have no reason to believe him much attached to his father's politics; and, if the thing can be done without too much difficulty, I should wish to see him entrusted with this business, rather than to have to encounter the difficulties and jealousies which would arise from any competition with him in this respect.

"I cannot conclude this letter without repeating what is said in my public dispatch about the possibility of separate negotiation. I am seriously alarmed on the subject, not doubting that, if the Milanese is thought irrecoverable by force, M. Thugut would willingly sacrifice the Netherlands to regain it by treaty. The great object is to make him feel the infinite advantages which he will have in treating jointly rather than separately; and to this I am confident you will direct your utmost attention. I trust the thing will not happen, but, if it did, the early knowledge of it would be of the utmost possible importance."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, June 10, Varel.—"I do not know whether I may consider the answers the person I have so frequently mentioned has received as being at the same time answers to my letters. If so, I have some reason to be satisfied for the present, notwithstanding the silence observed with respect to me, which I can assure Lord Grenville, though I should be extremely happy to receive a line to clear up the obscurity I am in, will not prevent me from pursuing my object, as far as opportunities may offer. I have only to regret they are not more frequent and more important. My brother returned from his tour last Thursday week night. All the accounts he brings from the frontiers of Utrecht and Guelderland are as favourable as can be, and confirmations of what you heard before. At Utrecht, in the province of Utrecht, all is well disposed, the clubs of that city alone excepted. These are armed. We heard again to day that General Bournonville had again insisted upon the Representatives of the same province giving up the idea of obliging the members of the ancient Government to refund all the emoluments they had derived from their employments since 1787; General Bournonville saying it was contrary to the capitulation. M. de Schubart, the Danish envoy, is said to have obtained the French general's interference, Madame de Schubart's father being a member of the late Government of that province. I mentioned in mine of the 31st ultimo that two members of the late Government of Friesland, M.M. Scheltinger and Basseleur, were summoned before a committee of the Representatives. They appeared on the 20th May before that committee, and, being questioned with respect to the mode of indemnifying the fugitives of 1787, they answered with great firmness and decision, declining most positively and in a high tone any interference on their part, or any assent whatever to a measure they thought so unjustifiable; avowing the share they had in the judicial proceedings against the fugitives, and in bringing them to their trial; and asserting that, in the whole of their conduct, they had acted in conformity with their oath, the laws and constitution of their country. I think it right to mention this circumstance I had forgot amongst many others which shew there is some spirit left in the country. By our last accounts few volunteers offered to march to the frontiers of the Seven Provinces; not much above 250 had offered in the whole province of Friesland. We have not heard any more lately of the project of drawing forces and encamping them towards this side. On the contrary some of the troops had been marched away; but they are continually marching and counter-marching. Our friend who was to go to D——, as I mentioned in my letter of the 17th May, and had been delayed, set out on the 28th following.

"We have received an account of the state of the navy, by which it appears that not a ship has been built or launched since 1794, one very small vessel excepted; and they had about 2,500 seamen less than in 1794. I do not send the list, as I take it for granted it is needless, and I expect something more accurate of the kind from the person I have frequently mentioned. We could get a man who has been three months on board the fleet, who is still in Holland, and has offered himself. We heard of him very lately. This man has no acquaintance with any one I mentioned in former letters. I think it right to mention it; if he could be useful I beg to be told so, or if I am referred to any one with whom our friend is in correspondence we will leave it to him. I need scarcely say again, by our friend I mean the person I have so frequently mentioned."

SIR MORTON EDEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, June 13, Vienna.—"The instructions carried by Baron Muller, and by the messenger that followed him on the 18th, will, I trust, have nearly anticipated your Lordship's wishes on the subject of the negotiation for the loan. I fully feel the unpleasant situation in which your Lordship is placed with regard to Count Starhemberg, and it is my great aim to remove it. I despair however of being able to restore him to that degree of confidence with the Austrian Minister which is so much to be desired. I see many of his dispatches; they are in general very trifling; but I must do him the justice to say that they contain nothing contrary to the system existing between the two Courts.

"Of M. de Thugut I have spoken so fully in my dispatch of this day, that I have only to add that he has, at times, not been without apprehensions of our making a separate peace; and, besides the public detriment, he has more than once intimated the distress and embarrassment and which such an event must reduce him personally. Should the calamities increase to such a degree as to force him from his post, I do not know who might succeed him. It is generally allowed, except by his immediate enemies, that it would be difficult to find any person of sufficient abilities and experience to discharge the duties of the office. If M. de Thugut quitted in quieter times, which I believe has long been his intention, Count Cobenzl, now at Petersburg, would probably be his successor.

"I will not further intrude upon your Lordship's time, but will only add that, however melancholy the prospect is, M. de Thugut does not despair; and that my utmost endeavours shall be unremittingly exerted to retain this Court steady to the principles of the coalition."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, June 14, Varel.—"I enclose abstracts from two letters containing the last accounts we have received from our neighbourhood. The letter dated the 7th June is chiefly military. Of late I have either suppressed entirely, or noticed but very shortly, all details of this nature; and having once given your Lordship ample statements, and mentioned that it was in our power at any time to obtain further information, if wanted, as far as related to the strength and movements of the French and Bataves on this frontier, I take it for granted that, if the accounts we receive might be of any service at any time, we shall be told so, and instructed how to dispose of them. I have thought it the less necessary to say much about military details as, by the time any of them get to England, the last details we receive here often make the former perfectly useless. It is sufficient your Lordship should know how far our information extends.

"All accounts of this sort besides (excepting the plan relating to the four islands enclosed in mine of the 11th April) have been regularly transmitted to the person named by Prince Frederick, who has orders to forward them to the Hereditary Prince.

"Having no information whatever, and no hopes given from England of any immediate assistance, however convinced we are she will not lose sight of us, and however desirous of her co-operation in any plan that may be formed, it is not surprising the attention of the partizans of the House of Orange, at least on this side, should be chiefly directed to the Court of Berlin since the arrival of the Hereditary Prince at that place. M. Van der Haer receives the strongest hopes from the Hereditary Prince of a powerful interference, notwithstanding all public reports to the contrary; with so many positive assurances as leave no doubt of its being the intention to act the moment a favourable opportunity offers. The person who is authorised by the Princes to correspond with M. van der Haer has been at Brunswick frequently, and some of the letters are written from that place; and, by many circumstances which have come to our knowledge, we flatter ourselves the Duke of Brunswick is not only consulted, but even that he often directs the Princes and those who act under them. For some months past the communications M. van der Haer receives are very regular, bear all the marks of a plan being formed, and are in many respects very satisfactory. We observed some questions were asked at different times within a fortnight or three weeks subsequent to some of my letters to your Lordship, particularly after I had mentioned the plan relating to the four islands; a circumstance, whether accidental or not, which struck us, as we had not mentioned the plan to any one but your Lordship. I wish I could flatter myself I might look upon the answers M. van der Haer receives as being at the same time answers to what I have communicated to you at different times.

"However that may be, Mr. van der Haer is told that 40,000 men will be collected on this side, mostly Prussians and Hanoverians; that the Duke of Brunswick will command them; and that, whatever may be the ostensible language of the Court of Berlin, these troops will be employed for a very different purpose from covering the line of demarcation. At the same time he is desired only to say for the present to his friends within the country, that they are to march for the purpose first mentioned; with assurances that, however things may apparently turn out, the interests of the Republic and of the House of Orange will not be forgot.

"From what I have been saying your Lordship may easily imagine we are insensibly becoming as Prussian as we were in 1787; being again led to expect, in a great measure from the Court of Berlin, our deliverance from a situation implicitly worse than all the calamities we were threatened with at that time. I hope some concert has taken place between London and Berlin; that we shall not be disappointed in our expectations; and that, either a sufficient force will be brought together to act upon this frontier and keep its ground at all events, or such a force as may, in case the Austrians should penetrate into the Netherlands, seize the opportunity of coming to the assistance of our friends within. The moment never was more favourable from all we hear of the disposition of people of all ranks and descriptions; which leave no room to doubt that those who may come to drive the French out of the Seven Provinces will so far meet with great facility and be received with open arms; even if they were not so sure as we are that they may depend upon the co-operation of numbers within, and more than indifference on the part of many members of the new Government towards their new friends and allies, as they call themselves.

"We have great hopes from the firmness displayed by England and by Austria, and the efforts they appear to be making to retrieve the losses in Italy. But they will have their hands so full at Vienna with the exertions required to recover the Netherlands and Lombardy, that we look with anxiety and impatience to the assistance that may come on this side from Berlin, or from any other quarter, at a moment when the efforts of the French will no doubt be chiefly directed against the Austrians.

"Whatever may be the event of the campaign, a time seems again to be approaching fast when it will be of consequence to have ascertained precisely the disposition of the people in the chief places of the Republic, secured the co-operation of as many of our friends as may be willing to run some risk, and to have the means of giving them notice of any steps which may require their co-operation or keep up their hopes. I mentioned (in the postscript dated the 13th of mine of the 11th April) a visit we had from some of M. Van der Haer's friends; and, in mine of the 17th May, I mentioned that one of these persons was to set out for Amsterdam. He was stopped by the riots from going. We have heard from him since, and he set out from Friesland for that place on the 28th May as I mentioned before. Having every reason to think that there is a regular plan of active interference for the emancipation of the United Provinces, and to expect M. Van der Haer, that he may execute the part assigned to him, will be informed of the details as it becomes proper to divulge them, I was very anxious his friend should go to Amsterdam to speak to as many of our friends as he might think advisable when there. The person in question is gone accordingly. At my particular request, we have given him the same data we are going upon here. I have sent him letters for three of our friends, which will not expose them to any inconveniency should they fall into the wrong hands, and which contain a sufficient hint if they choose to take it. The person in question is very well acquainted with Amsterdam; is not easily dismayed, having given proofs of it by his stay in Friesland during the late disturbances; and all that time sent us regular communications of all that was going on. I do not know how far the persons I have directed him to, or his own acquaintance, will choose to enter into our views. A shock so violent as the one we have experienced does operate so differently, and sometimes so strangely, upon men's dispositions; and it is so long since I have seen any of my acquaintance at Amsterdam. If they choose to take a part, I am confident they may depend upon the prudence and resolution of the person we have sent to them, who is firmly attached to M. de Rhoon, has given strong proofs of his loyalty, and may be particularly useful at this moment from being in the habits of intercourse with all classes of people, having lived most in a province the nature of whose Government requires more popularity of manners than any of the seven. He has taken a man with him who has been in the habits of corresponding and of mixing with the lower orders; and, whether or not our friend finds means of gaining sufficient confidence to secure the co-operation of any considerable number of people to be ready at the moment it might be wanted, at any rate I flatter myself we shall get accurate information of the temper and spirit that prevails at Amsterdam; and, I hope, secure regular communications of what may be going on there. We can depend upon our name or M. de Rhoon's not being imprudently made use of; and upon his running no risk from this person's journey, whose own anxiety for M. de Rhoon's situation will make him observe all possible caution. This we have recommended to him, and had I not been perfectly easy upon that point I would not have ventured so far. I have told our friend I would willingly defray the extraordinary expenses his journey might put him to; and, indeed, as he went at my request, I cannot expect, though he is very much interested in the event, that he should be alone at that expense; or at the expense of returning here, which he will if practicable, or if not attended with too much risk, as he will be under the necessity of returning to Friesland some time hence. There are a few persons whom I could wish to have it in my power to give pecuniary aid to; one, amongst others, who has great influence over the Jacobin clubs in Friesland, who has rendered great service, and has been the means of preventing mischief, and may prevent still more. He has been partly gained by promises, he seems able, and I could wish to put it in M. Van der Haer's power to give him pecuniary aid; the more so as he influences, or is like to influence, some of the Friesland members of the National Convention. I now beg to refer your Lordship to what I said of my wish to be enabled to offer M. Van der Haer and his friend as far as one thousand pounds, if they want it for purposes similar to those I have mentioned. I still request to know to whom I might apply for any part of that sum, for the use of which M. Van der Haer will account to me; as I wish of course not to appear in any transactions of this nature any further than I can help; and that it should pass through M. Van der Haer's hands, and be known to him and to his friend M. Humalda only, that I have given any assistance of this kind. I earnestly request I may know your Lordship's intention on this point. Though M. Van der Haer is not at a loss for himself, the hopes of a change in our favour being delayed from day to day, some assistance of this nature will be required to carry on the correspondence, and for other accidental expenses; and it is but fair our friends should expect it from us. He has desired me to suggest it, and I hope I shall be enabled to give him a satisfactory answer, or to refer him to those who will.

"I take the opportunity of a relation of ours going to England to enclose this to the Duke of Portland, and am more anxious than ever of receiving a line. April 22, 1795, is the date of the only letter I have received from your Lordship since I left England. I hope I need scarcely add that, unless I hear to the contrary, I shall persevere and try every chance of forwarding any plan that may promise success, and that I may, to the best of my judgment, suppose consonant with the views contained in the paper I had the honour of receiving before I left London."

Postscript, June 15.—"A letter from Groningen, dated the 9th instant, confirms the accounts I am sending, with the addition that the French were quitting entirely the provinces of Friesland, Groningen, Overijssel and Drenthe."

Enclosure.

ABSTRACT OF A LETTER FROM THE PROVINCE OF GRONINGEN.

1796, June 6.—"In consequence of the violent tumults at Amsterdam, General Bournonville has made use of the unlimited command given him lately, and has sent a corps of Hussars and about 1,000 infantry to that city to put an end to all further commotions. This measure has occasioned severe debates in the National Convention, and has been noticed by some of the members as no less violent than the march against Hattem and Elburg in 1786. The step taken by the French general, and the vast power given him, has indisposed the Patriots to such a degree that the arming of the nation will not take place; and Bournonville is suspected, and even openly accused, of acting the part of the Rhingrave de Salm, and of being corrupted by English gold. It is a matter of fact that, in this province, not 300 volunteers have offered themselves to the new Government since the plan for arming the people has been made known, and these are daily falling off, and expressing their disgust. The last payment of the 4 per cent. has been levied with an unexampled rigour by military execution, which occasions the greatest resentment; the more so as another 4 per cent. is to be levied, which will no doubt be raised with no less violence than the former. All this, though it costs us dear, is attended with this salutary effect, that some of the most considerable Patriots, and all those who have anything to lose, complain bitterly of the present Government, and openly express their wishes for the return of the old Government, lately so hated by some of them. These are no hazarded expressions of mine, but truths I can vouch for from my own certain knowledge. Nor is it the language only of malcontents who have failed in dividing the places amongst themselves. It is so much the general cry that, in case the province was freed from French troops, the revolution might (would is the expression in the letter) be effected of itself. The Dutch soldiers are so well disposed that, when the festival for the French victories in Italy was celebrated, all the cavalry here and the whole battalion of Bataves, notwithstanding the efforts of some of the officers, and amongst others Captain Starke, to animate them with different sentiments, refused to dance round the tree of Liberty, and turned their backs upon all the rejoicings; a few chasseurs only excepted of the corps Trip, who were mean enough to join in the dance, and have by their behaviour incurred the contempt of their fellow soldiers. What regard are these honest fellows not entitled to, as a common soldier seldom gains or loses by a change. What the intention of the French may be in thus leaving this province entirely, is a riddle. It seems certain that all the French troops have quitted the posts from the Zout-Kamp along the Dollard, and Eems, the Nieuwe Schans, the whole Westerwolde, and even the Beurtang; and that, in this manner, the whole frontier from the Zout-Kamp to the Bourtang is intrusted solely to about 500 chasseurs of Trip, Dutch; and that even a company of artillery, the only artillery in the province, which was chiefly distributed along the frontier, has already received orders likewise to march out. The French general, they say, has given assurances that, within six days, all the French should leave the province. This seems to turn out so, as they are all gone excepting two squadrons of Hussars; so that there were no troops remaining in the town of Groningen but a battalion of Bataves. They all march towards Zutphen where a camp is to be formed. Others are of opinion that some of them will direct their march upon Coeverden to take possession of a height of some importance in that neighbourhood. It is singular enough that the province should be thus entirely abandoned, and I have my doubts sometimes whether it may not be intended to leave us to the mob, as has been done in Friesland."

Postscript.—"12,000,000 of paper money are to be put in circulation in Holland."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, June 15, Berne.—"I cannot sufficiently thank your Lordship for your attention to the affair of the regiment at Watteville. I fear it is now too late to think any further about it. D'Erlach has been summoned to appear before the C.C.; this was a matter of course, but it should not have been done till half the regiment had followed him. I own that my zeal to accomplish this object was not without a sentiment of vanity. As an Englishman, I enjoyed with real satisfaction the idea of getting from France at the same time with her colonies, her very best regiment to assist in defending them against her.

"I am not afraid of the offers made to the Court of Vienna; if she makes war ill, she has generally made peace worse, and always the last. I am still less afraid of the final event of the campaign in Italy, but the recall of the Austrian troops from the Rhine has proved a most fatal business, and will still I fear be productive of infinite mischief. Before that event I think the affairs of the allies never stood upon so solid a ground. I speak of the day that the Austrians broke the truce.

"If the successes of the French should continue, I should submit it to your Lordship very seriously whether I might not, under pretext of a leave of absence, remove somewhere nearer home; to Frankfort for instance, or Mannheim. I have little doubt but that a demand respecting my residence here will soon be made. I know that individuals of this country resident in Paris have written to that effect here; and should the demand take place, though I have not a doubt but that it would be resisted, yet the private wishes of individuals would be conveyed to me requesting me to consider the unpleasant remonstrances to which my residence here exposes them. The people at Paris imagine that I have ten times better correspondence than I really have.

"I cannot help sending you the enclosed that I have this moment received from M. Imbert. It will convince your Lordship how wholly unmanageable these people are, and how impossible it is to do anything with them. M. Imbert and M. de Pr  cy have been repeatedly threatened to be denounced to the King as his enemies counteracting the efforts of his loyal subjects, and at the same time to the Directory as counter-revolutionists.

"The enclosed extract of a letter from D'Antraigues to Duvergne du Praile is so curious that I cannot help sending it to you. D'Artez is D'Antraigues' correspondent, and the Swiss he alludes to are Saladin and Divermois. Saladin wrote to his friend here some time since that my credit had been materially affected by the Spanish peace of which I had given no information. He even cited the Duke of Portland as his authority. I should wish your Lordship to show D'Antraigues' letter to his Grace."

Two enclosures. Of little political interest.

THE EARL OF ELGIN TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, June 16, Berlin.—"It is impossible for me to convey to your Lordship to what an extent my situation is irksome in regard to the subject of my this day's despatch. On the one hand, the information has come to me from six or seven channels which, as far as I can conjecture, could have no combination together, nor any interest in deceiving me. I have even had sums of money given to the persons in M. Caillard's family; and from them have obtained full confirmation of the general proceeding. On the other hand, I have only found one among those of the Foreign Ministers who are the best informed here, at all apprized of there being anything of the kind in agitation. And the unfortunate impression under which Sir M. Eden acts (that this Court can be turned to no use, will in no case act otherwise than against us, and will never be applied to by Austria) this fatal impression has carried him so far as not to keep me at all au fait of what might have proved highly beneficial to my situation here, particularly in this conjuncture. Had it not been so, I might readily have got at the truth of this matter.

"Still however the confidence I am led to place in what I have learnt makes me feel it incumbent on me to send it to your Lordship; for, even should the proposals of this Court have been kept secret at Vienna, the mission of the Marquis Gallo to Basle, and the retrograde movements, and present situation of Prince Charles's army on the right of the Rhine, will alone be sufficient to satisfy your Lordship's mind in regard to the doubts which I have no means of removing.

"Your Lordship may rest assured that I shall not lose a moment in communicating any further material intelligence I may be able to collect on this matter."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, June 18, Windsor.—"Monsieur de Luc having received intelligence from Geneva that the French meditate attempting an invasion of this island if they succeed in obliging the Court of Vienna to make peace with them; and thinking it improper he should keep this information to himself; I have advised him to go to Dropmore and communicate what he has received to Lord Grenville. I own I do not give great credit to the account, as I am convinced, however the idea may be adopted, that whilst we are masters of the sea, if attempted it will not succeed."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, June 23, Walmer Castle.—"In addition to the extracts of Crawford's dispatches, I have received Paris papers to the 19th, which speak (though vaguely) of an Austrian peace, and there are verbal reports to the same effect from Calais and Dunkirk. They are however as yet very little worthy of credit, though after all that has passed, one cannot hear them with indifference or with total disbelief. If such an event has really happened, it will simplify very much our plans, although it will leave upon our hands a very arduous contest. We must know in a few days whether there is any foundation for the report. Should it turn out otherwise, and Austria not have taken any steps for separate negotiation, I think it clear that we must execute with the utmost expedition our intention of advancing money as far as the first three hundred thousand pounds, but not agree to go farther without receiving an explanation as to the Austrian plans for their defensive campaign, and still more particularly and precisely as to their plan of peace. I am also clear that (unless there happens some unexpected turn in the state of things) any idea of our enabling Austria to act with any effect beyond the present year is out of the question. In this situation it would be inexcusable not to try any chance that can be tried, honorably and safely, to set on foot some decent plan of pacification; and I can conceive no objection in the mind of any of our colleagues to see whether the arrangement to which you have pointed can be made acceptable both to Austria and Prussia. But though I think it should be tried, I do not flatter myself with much chance of success. On the whole my notion is that most likely, either now or a few months hence, we shall be left to sustain alone the conflict with France and Holland, probably joined by Spain, and perhaps favored more or less openly by the Northern powers. But with proper exertion we can make our party good against them all. If however there should be any appearance of this situation taking place soon, I believe it will be right to meet Parliament as early as possible. Austrian loan will, on such a supposition, be out of the question, and strong measures must be immediately taken to procure a large addition of seamen, and of fencible troops for home defence. Such steps cannot be taken too soon, in the event I am supposing, in order to prevent the impression of danger gaining too much ground, before preparation is made to meet it."

LORD GRENVILLE to the EARL OF ELGIN.

Private.

1796, June 23, Cleveland Row.—"I have postponed answering your private letter of the 1st of May till I could see a little more clearly into the turn which things were likely to take, particularly with respect to the army of observation and its effects upon French and Austrian measures. It is true that precisely in the present moment you have no active employment at Berlin beyond that of watching the strange scene passing there, but the circumstances of the times are so critical that every hour may bring forward business of importance to be transacted there, and I really should think that it would be very improper that the King's Minister to that Court should be absent from it under the present circumstances, on any other ground than that of the most urgent and indispensable necessity.

"I have reason to believe that I shall very shortly have the means of sending you a Secretary of Legation who will, I trust, be acceptable to you."

LORD GRENVILLE to the EARL OF ELGIN.

Private.

1796, June 28, Cleveland Row.—"The important subject of your dispatch of the 16th is certainly one to which too much attention cannot be paid, and every information which may tend either to confirm or to remove your suspicions will be highly interesting to us. For my own part I confess that, in putting different circumstances together, I believe the scheme to be rather desired by Prussia than as yet adopted by Austria. Gallo's mission has certainly the Neapolitan peace for its principal object, and I do not think he would have been chosen by the Austrians to treat for them; and the movements of the Arch-Duke's army are sufficiently explained by the step taken of sending troops from the Rhine to Italy without looking for other reasons.

"It must however be observed that if this conjecture is right for the present, yet the circumstances in which the Court of Vienna is now placed may vary their decision in this respect from day to day. I consider the currency of this report at Berlin as a strong indication of the desire of that Government to bring about such an event; and when that desire exists there, the impression favourable to it may soon be created at Vienna, notwithstanding the natural reluctance which the Austrians must feel to any plan which supposes a confidence on their part in the good faith of Prussia.

"This is all mere speculation; for any practical purpose my despatches by this messenger contain all that we think can be done, and I am very sure that no attention will be wanting on your part."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, January–June.—"The result of our deliberations last night having rather disturbed my slumbers, I have taken the opportunity to read the enclosed paper which was left with me yesterday by M. Botterel, and which it will be desirable to send to-morrow to the Duke Harcourt, in order that he may read it and forward it to Monsieur. I wish you may be able to find time to read it over, and I shall send it accordingly, so as that it may reach you by the time you are up. You will see by this how perfectly limited in its extent the party is that has acted against Puisaye, and how perfectly unwarrantable their conduct has been.

"If it were of any consequence now, as I am afraid it is not, to think what should be done upon this occasion, I should certainly be of opinion that not only great injustice would be done, but great injury to the cause, by substituting anyone in the room of Puisaye, though I see no disadvantage, but on the contrary benefit, by a person's going over who should assist on the part of the Prince, in enforcing the measure which, as you will see at the end, Puisaye and the council have very properly recommended."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, July 4, Berne.—"I had intended to have written to your Lordship more at large upon the subject of M. D'André's proposals and the various points with which they are connected, but I was yesterday taken so ill that I was not even able to finish my more important dispatch respecting the naval armaments in Holland. I must therefore reserve the subject for another occasion. After all, I believe I could say little upon it that will not present itself immediately to your Lordship when you shall read the articles themselves.

"With my original instructions in my head it is impossible for me to mistake the intentions of his Majesty's ministers, and it will be no difficult matter to apply them to any new circumstances that the present, or indeed any future situation of things can well present.

"I think that the period we have all to look to now is the renewal of the third portion of the Legislature. The part that the Directory has to play is so extremely difficult that I cannot well foresee how it can possibly keep a majority in the two assemblies after the new election shall have taken place. It certainly cannot without having recourse to some violent measures. If the opposite party be prudent, quiet, temperate, and above all silent, it seems to me possible that they may succeed, but not otherwise.

"I am not quite sure that our own situation will be much bettered by the change; but upon that point I mean to write much more fully when my head shall be more clear.

"The memoire enclosed in the same dispatch certainly came from some of Tallien's friends. It is extremely curious, and the whole turn style and manner of the thing is clearly Jacobin. The Duke de la Vauguyon declined receiving it as a proposal, but desired the person who had brought it from Paris to give him an account of what he had seen there, and, in the course of the conversation, the subject of the memoire was introduced and fully commented on.

"The Abbé Brottier seems at last to have been roused by my repeated complain's and reproaches on the subject of his negligence in procuring me no intelligence from Paris. He has taken as his associate a M. Ville Hamin, an active and intelligent man thoroughly acquainted with Paris, and disposed to do whatever he can to serve us. Since this association has taken place I have begun for the first time to receive something in the shape of information from that quarter. I will not be sparing of money as soon as I see that it is likely to be well employed. If your Lordship really wishes to send any money to Paris, I can undertake to send as much as ever you please, but it will always cost very dear.

"I wish your Lordship would say whether there is any objection to my writing in white ink; if there be not, I shall continue it; as it would be often impossible for me, with what I have to go through, to finish my letters in time for Flint to reduce them to cipher. I shall of course never use that method but in a private letter, and it seems that it never can be suspected from a Minister writing to his Court, especially where there is something written in cipher in the body of the letter.

"Mallet Dupan has just been here to inform me that he has received letters from Paris assuring him of two points; the first that the Directory are determined to undertake the expedition against England at all risks; and that they are purging the armies to get together a collection of the most determined brigands whom they hope to sacrifice in the attempt. The second that all well-disposed persons are indignant at the conduct of the Cabinet of Vienna, and are determined to rally round the Directory. He added that he was himself persuaded that the French had some person sold to them in that Court who had influence enough to direct the greater part of the measures that were adopted. I know not what to think of it, but one would be often apt to believe that he is not mistaken."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, July 5, Varel.—"I mentioned in my last (of the 14th June) that one of our friends was gone to Amsterdam at my request, and for what purpose. He is since returned, having found no disposition to take an active part with us in the persons I gave him letters for, one of them excepted. This person, who is a particular friend of my brother's, was already, as I thought, in regular correspondence with England, and his information has of course reached your Lordship; and I have no doubt all my brother's friends at Amsterdam will have been sufficiently informed and instructed by this person. It is quite enough for me to say that it appears from the accounts we received that the disposition of the inhabitants is as favourable at Amsterdam as in those parts of the Republic I have chiefly noticed in my letters; and that, for want of money and materials, and from the party animosities amongst the crews, and ignorance of the officers as to the military part of the service, the navy, in the actual state of things and in the hands of the usurpers, will not be the means of their doing any great mischief, or of their operating any very great diversion. This has turned out as I always thought it would. At the same time I hope and trust the few ships they have will be narrowly watched, and not be suffered to obtain any advantage whatever. The person who has been at Amsterdam for us would be ready to go there again at a moment's notice, if he could be of any service.

"In the provinces we have chiefly directed our attention to, things go on as well as we can wish; and since the French have withdrawn their troops, some of our own friends became so impatient that they insisted upon rising against the usurpers, and declaring for the House of Orange; and I have no doubt that they would have succeeded in these provinces. But, as effectual measures are preparing for driving out the enemy and delivering the country from the state of oppression to which they have reduced it, it would have been the height of imprudence to risk all the probable consequences of a hasty attempt, however successful, unconnected with the powerful support we are so strongly led to expect from without. M. Van der Haer, being determined not to leave anything to chance, and to abide strictly by the orders he receives from the person authorised to correspond with him, wrote in the strongest terms to all his friends to represent to them the consequences of their precipitancy ; to say that he would not be answerable for any steps taken without positive directions from him in the manner agreed upon. He wrote thirty letters by one opportunity, all adapted to the temper and dispositions of the various persons to whom they were directed, all tending to raise their hopes and expectations, but to connect their efforts with the measures taken by our friends without, and with the orders he may at any time receive. The answers he has had to these letters are perfectly reasonable and satisfactory, and promise the best result should the events of the campaign bring on the favourable moment we have now been so long expecting with impatience and anxiety.

“The communications M. Van der Haer receives from the person authorised to correspond with him, continue to be dated from Brunswick. One of the letters, dated June 22, says, ‘there seems to be no appearances towards the line of demarcation, the French having left the frontier on that side ; and yet the Duke of Brunswick’s time seems very much taken up, and he appears very seldom in public. His activity at this moment, and his having taken the command of the army said to be intended for the protection of that line, and other circumstances of the same nature leave a fair presumption of that army’s having been collected for a very different purpose from what it is given out to be. In Holland the Prussians are expected in consequence of an agreement between Berlin and Paris. The anxiety of the usurpers appears in their countenances, and the conduct of Bournonville towards them confirms this notion. From all this we may soon expect a change in our favour.’ Some of the letters from the same person speak still more positively as to the intentions of the Court of Berlin of acting in our favour, but say little or nothing positive as to the time or manner. Letters of the 24th and 28th June, from the same quarter, continue to speak of the march of Prussians and other troops, mention their impatience of hearing that the Dutch West India colonies had received the English succours they expected before the arrival of the fleet which sailed from Holland in February. These letters likewise speak with exultation of the late successes of the Austrians between the Lahn and Sieg, which have amply made up for the defeat they met with on that side on the opening of the campaign. They add that the accounts from Italy were much better and gave great hopes. Other letters and circumstances all bear the appearance of the operations of the Duke of Brunswick’s army being combined with the movements of the Austrians, and the events of the campaign. I cannot help observing the regular information M. Van der Haer has received for a long time past, which indicates a well digested plan being agreed upon and steadily adhered to ; and the change of language with respect to England which struck him as well as myself, having been very much surprised at one time at some of the expressions used in letters to him, whose opinions with respect to England are so well known, and so constantly avowed in the most explicit manner. Some of these expressions appeared very strange to us, and did raise suspicions as to the source from which the information of his correspondent might come, and as to the object in view, which did not seem consistent with that of the paper I received before I left England. M. Van der Haer expressed his surprise and dissent pretty strongly at times ; insisting on the impropriety of some of the passages in question at a moment the House of Orange had found refuge and the strongest support in England, where he thought they would not continue so long had they not a well grounded hope of being of use to the Republic by prolonging their stay. Whatever may be the reason, the language with respect to England is changed, and is now as different and as satisfactory as can be; and, happily for us, our suspicions will, we hope, prove unfounded, as the Court of Berlin seems determined, though somewhat late, to act in concert with England and Austria, and to give effect to the guarantee.

"Since I wrote last, M. Van der Haer has had a letter, dated June 29, from the acquaintance of his who is in correspondence with the person in France I have named in mine of the 11th April last. The letter contains the following passages—

1. "In answer to your's of the 23rd instant, I have to say that my last from Ramel is dated the 11 Prairial [29 May] which a lawyer from Arras left with me. This lawyer was going to Hamburgh. Ramel lays great stress in this letter upon the bad state of the finances, the 100 livres in mandats being already fallen to 14 in specie. He says that the evils arising from this cause could not be remedied. The operations in Italy were all intended to obtain ready money for the necessary payments of the contractors, who refused supplying the armies in the least if not paid in specie; whilst the Republic was forced by the Decree to issue the mandats at par. The deficit of millions, which it was impossible to raise by any methods, entirely unnerved the administration, left them without strength, and would inevitably enable the Jacobins to carry through their plan of a constitutional King of the House of Orleans. He thought this event would certainly take [place] in the month of Messidor (by the end of June or beginning of July) with the usual scenes of cruelty, which induced him to be upon his guard. The villain Siéyès was the head of this plot.'

2. "I think it right to inform you that the change of Representatives in Friesland, the secret direction of the French influence in the National Convention, is so far in my favour that it is at my option to get the sentence against me cancelled as contrary to law, and to take a leading part in the National Convention, having yesterday received explicit propositions on these points. I need not say to you I had rather go to Egypt than that my activity should be of service to these rebels. But I must at the same time assure you that, if it were wished, I should be ready to risk my head. I am willing to approach the helm in order to steer the vessel in that stormy sea to the satisfaction of the House of Orange. I think the above communication the more pressing as it is possible I might in this manner be of great service in forwarding the plans of Great Britain and of the line of demarcation; unless it was thought I might be better employed with the influence I may have within the Republic, at the head quarters of the latter or in any other way. I shall wait for the information you may choose to ask upon the subject; and you may freely take upon yourself to say that I shall think myself bound to the execution of what may be required of me. No one but yourself knows the least thing of what I have been mentioning, as it requires the utmost secrecy with respect to every one but the persons concerned.'

"This offer comes from a very able man, perfectly versed in all the intrigues that may make him fit to deal with that description of persons who compose the majority of the Batavian National Convention. He is a very dangerous man, and, had he been disposed to take a part with the Revolutionists of the Seven Provinces, he might have done great mischief; not being very scrupulous as to the means, and being very corrupt. But he is too clever and too well informed not to see that the work of the Revolutionists cannot stand; and that there are greater hopes of rewards from the resources of the Allies than from the bankrupt anarchy of Paris. M. Van der Haer employed him with success in 1787, and he served him (M. Van der Haer) with fidelity. By the letters M. Van der Haer has from him, he is entirely in his power; and were he, when in Hoiland, inclined to play a double game with his employers, M. Van der Haer might soon make him repent his having ventured there. In Oostfriesland, where he is, his person might be secured at a moment's notice by saying a word to one there who knows him, so that there are checks enough upon him if wanted. Knowing this man as I do, I have been very careful of avoiding any correspondence or any interview with him. He once sent me some plans and projects, which I gave back to M. Van der Haer, desiring him to be told it was not in my power to be of any service to him, however desirous I was to see his talents employed to serve the cause, and however highly I thought him entitled to attention; and that I did not doubt but what those who knew him would put it in his power to make his activity servicable, as they ought. In my brother's situation, I less than ever choose to put myself the least in the power, or to trust to the discretion of persons of this description; and much less to commit myself with a man of so dangerous a character, whom I cannot pay better than anyone else may. At the same time I am well aware that, at a moment like the present, and in the internal state of the Republic, such a person may often be of the greatest service. He knows the world, writes and speaks well, is of the most active mind, full of resources, and of great presence of mind under difficulties; and, with his versatility, will take up any part he may think most likely to be of service to his employers. I agreed with M. Van der Haer that he should continue to correspond with him in order to have him at his disposal should he be wanted; that he should employ him to write and to get intelligence for him, and give him assurances of rewards should a change take place. He certainly may be usefully employed, though prudence requires he should not be trusted too far; and M. Van der Haer took care he should know how confident he was of the ancient Government being restored, but not from what quarter he (M. Van der Haer) expected the assistance to come. Had I had the means of paying the expenses required, I should certainly have made use of this man; and though I should have avoided seeing or being named to him, I should certainly have taken upon myself to have desired M. Van der Haer to have sent for him to come here, and to have settled some plan of conduct for him to connect still more the work in Holland with that of the other provinces, in such a manner as not to have counteracted other measures that may already have been taken to facilitate the great work. But this would have required a greater command of money than we have at our disposal. Had I known where to apply to for the sum I wished to be enabled to dispose of in case M. Van der Haer might want it, I should have desired him to have applied a great part of it to this purpose. All I have been able to do has been to tell M. Van der Haer, a good while since, that I had a hundred pistoles at his disposal at any time he might want them for his correspondence; and these I have accordingly advanced him lately at his request. Promises of favour, in case of the ancient Government being re-established, will go a great way, and will no doubt be easily realized as they ought; particularly as M. Van der Haer is as sparing of them as possible, and his chief dependance is not, as it ought not to be, upon persons influenced in this manner. But, in the case I am alluding to, and with this man, these promises are not sufficient if it is wished to employ him in the manner he offers; and the situation of the country deprives those who know him of the means they might otherwise have found for the purpose.

"Under these circumstances I submit the proposals of this man to your Lordship, begging to know whether it may be of service to let him go to the Hague and to become a member of the National Convention, furnishing [him] with the means of paying his expenses and of transmitting intelligence ; and, in case your Lordship declines the offers, that they may be referred elsewhere, or at least some satisfactory answer given.

"I beg to refer to the letter dated April 22, 1795, the only letter I have received from your Lordship since I left England, and to my project of going to my brother's estates, and to the Hague, where I foresaw many difficulties and delays, though I did not know at the time M. de Rhoon would be so long deprived of his liberty. And I can assure you that, independent of that reason for going on with the utmost prudence and reserve, I have often felt the greatest impatience at being under the necessity of proceeding so slowly, and of confining our efforts within such narrow limits. As it is, I do not think myself at liberty to leave this place, flattering myself more from day to day I may receive letters which might require my being here ; M. Van der Haer relying upon my staying, and being more or less under an engagement to him not to go as long as he thinks I may be of service to him and to our friends.

"The communications from Brunswick give me hopes our proceedings, as far as they go, will not have been quite useless. In many instances they serve so perfectly to answer what I have transmitted to England at different times that I should be happy to hear from your lordship I may consider them as such. However that may be, having received the assurances I have, which I am sensible I ought to rely upon as firmly as if they had been given within these few days, it is right for me to go on even if I was less concerned than I am personally for the defence of the rights, rank, and situations of so many of my friends and near relations, and to show there were men within the Republic who continued struggling through every difficulty with the hopes that help might come yet before it was too late.

"When I first came here I was forced to own I had no authentic information ; but I mentioned my intention of persevering as I was situated, though I have been left so long without communications from my friends in England. It was right I should say all I thought might be of service ; and if I have unnecessarily taken up your Lordship's time, it is not because I attach any very great importance to what I may have sent over at different times, which may very likely be lost amidst the multiplicity of more important transactions which your Lordship is engaged in, but because it was a duty incumbent upon me after the assurances and encouragement I had received. The war with England, the detention of some of my friends, the absence of others, their dispersion which had not taken place when I left London, are all circumstances, amongst many others too many to enumerate, I have to lament ; and which have deprived me of the opportunities and support I might otherwise have found, and will, I flatter myself, apologize for my not having done more. I think myself as much as ever answerable to the Prince of Orange, and to your Lordship, and the Duke of Portland, for the faithful discharge of the duty I have imposed upon myself ; and I am convinced that, sooner or later, the adherents of that illustrious House will get the better of a set of men no one can trust or respect, and of a system incompatible with the habits and character of the inhabitants of the Republic, and ruinous in the extreme to the dearest interests of the country. This persuasion, and the perseverance which is in some measure the result of the former, no one ever has taken, or even can take from me ; and I flatter myself I may soon find I have not been too confident.

"I have not lately thought it necessary to send over many particulars which have been sent regularly to Brunswick. I can confirm again in the strongest terms what I have said in former letters of the dispositions and temper of the people. A general animosity prevails throughout the United Provinces against the usurpers and the French; and in many parts of the country a plan exists, to my knowledge, for directing this spirit to a salutary end.

Postscript.—"Lestevigor and Pasteur are gone to Paris, some say with orders to complain of Noel and Beurnonville; others say it is to accede to a treaty of alliance between France and Spain. I cannot vouch for the truth of these reports. I send this to Mr. Bouwens the agent at Cuxhaven, which is only 7 German miles from Varel."

to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, July 11, Altona.—"I trust that your Lordship will speedily and safely receive this letter with Mr. Frazer's despatches, for I shall leave it with him. Its object is to say that I have not forgotten my promise, and that I should have dated it from Berlin (for which place I set out tomorrow morning) if I had not been detained by the necessity of breaking in my young horses. This is, you know, particularly urgent before committing one-self to them in order to traverse a sandy desert. Your Lordship is well informed of what passes in France. It is therefore impertinent to tell you that amidst a plenty of other things (horses excepted) there is a plentiful scarcity of money. This is sensible to a degree you can scarcely believe; but I learn from a man of credit, whom I am well acquainted with, and who is just arrived, that the first bankers cannot, in less than two or three days, furnish as many thousand Louis. He himself lately lent Perregaux on such an occasion 20,000. The greater part of the coin is in the hands of the husbandmen from whose grip the Government is not strong enough to wrest it. And whatever may be said, do not believe that the taxes are paid. They are not, neither is it practicable to collect them. The Treasury is empty, and every day brings with it the difficulty of the day; more especially in providing pay for the troops. You know the Directory had asked 20 million banco from Hamburg. The impossibility of paying has been demonstrated to them, and also that they are equally interested with others in the neutrality of that city. You will know also the success of Mr. Sieveking's mission. He has I am told prevailed on the Directory to mitigate the amount, and change the form of their demand. It is, I understand, reduced to two or three millions banco, which the commerce of Hamburg is to supply by discounting drafts on Holland. These last are in part of the balance due on that contribution which you recollect to have been imposed as the price of Batavian liberty. Sieveking has, I am told, undertaken that if the merchants in general decline to contribute, the business shall be done by himself and his friends. But it seems that neither the commerce of the city, nor yet the particular connections of her Ambassador, are disposed to make that sacrifice; and therefore the termination of the present squabble may meet with difficulty and delay. I am inclined to think that an Order of the King in Council directing all officers of ships in his Majesty's service to afford protection to the Hamburgheezee, would have considerable effect, not only by encouraging the merchants to resist demands like the present, but also by stimulating the French Directory to a more wrathful conduct. Their first step would probably be to confiscate the ships they have detained, which (whatever harm it might do to others could do them no good) and would totally deprive them of all resource in this quarter. Moreover the high tone taken by France might strengthen whatever steps you may hereafter direct at Berlin, because the Prussian Cabinet will hardly be pleased with such overbearing interference in the affairs of Lower Saxony."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, July 19, Berne.—"Whatever confidence you have reposed in my opinion of the situation of the interior of France may be very safely transferred to M. de Précý. I recommend him therefore most earnestly to your Lordship as a faithful reporter of almost all that I could have to say upon the subject. I am sure that he will be found highly worthy of your protection and good offices.

"The season of partial insurrections is over. I am persuaded that they can no longer be attempted without certain destruction to their authors, and great mischief to the common cause. Nothing is now to be expected in that quarter, but from a return of the whole body of the people to their senses, and above all, an union of parties against the Jacobins. When that great event may be expected to take place God only knows; certainly not whilst the Directory can find such immense sums by stock-jobbing, and by the plunder of their neighbours.

"The conduct of the French Princes, their Ministers, and agents affects and afflicts me more than all the rest; when one has seen them so nearly, and so much behind the curtain as I have done, one is really tempted to believe that God has willed this tremendous revolution among other purposes for their particular correction as a national example, and that it will not be terminated until they and their wretched system shall have in great measure disappeared. I am led to make this exclamation (among other reasons) because I have very lately had communication of instructions given to the Royalists in Brittany, to M. de Précý, and the agents at Paris to beware more than ever of giving an implicit confidence to the Ministers and agents of the British Government, as there was every reason to be mistrustful of their real intentions, and because I have the certain knowledge that the Prince of Condé has been very severely reproached since I left Riegel on account of the confidence he appeared to place in me.

"All this looks so like a preternatural infatuation that I tremble whenever I think on it. It is neither sense, ability, knowledge (excepting knowledge of the Revolution) that is wanting, and yet they do precisely every thing that they ought not to do.

"I fear in my communication with your Lordship that I have not dwelt sufficiently on the force and the number of the difficult obstacles that always opposed themselves to anything in the shape of a counter-revolution, but the dread of becoming tiresome by frequent repetitions of the same thing, joined to the immense detail with which I have been constantly charged, and the rapidity with which the most interesting and important events have succeeded each other on every side, has often rendered it impossible for me either to say what I wished, or to know exactly what I wished to say.

"My situation here becomes every day more critical. I shall send by M. de Précý a great number of my papers, and shall provide for the security of the remainder. I am now endeavouring to prepare matters, in case of my departure, in such a way as that I may keep a correspondence open with this country.

"The presence of Baptiste has produced an excellent effect in the neighbouring provinces. M. de Précý will communicate to your Lordship some information on that subject."

Postscript.—"The chiefs of the Clouans are arrived here, as it is said, with abundance of bank notes. I send your Lordship enclosed a manuscript account of M. Précy's retreat from Lyons, which you will find to the last degree curious and interesting."

— to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, July 28, Berlin.—"The object of this Court is to possess the King's electoral dominions, and they will accomplish it unless you can reduce their power to a second order. The German Empire still exists in name, but in fact it is annihilated; those who calculate on former establishments, neglecting present circumstances, will be the dupes. They may slumber behind the entrenchments of mouldy records, but the point of a Prussian bayonet will awaken them. Events in Italy and on the Rhine have thrown everything into confusion at Vienna. France may derive every advantage from it. Perhaps she will. This Cabinet now holds the fate of Europe in its hand. If you mean to have their cordial assistance, you must give them a consideration of permanent value. If France dictates peace to Austria, Prussia may perhaps risk taking Hanover, and holding it under a French guarantee. That will depend on the occupation which can be found for the Empress of Russia. She is not immortal. I believe it is possible to make an arrangement which will bring you to a solid and useful peace. If Prussia receive the King's electoral dominions on condition that you get the countries lying north of antient France and west of the Rhine, including Dutch Flanders with Flushing and Berg-op-zoom; if Prussia give Cleves and Prussian Gueldres to the Stadtholder, creating Holland into a monarchy, and receiving the Dutch American possessions; if the Emperor receive Bavaria, and the Elector of Bavaria in lieu of it the German territory along the Rhine in possession of France, the Emperor leaving (for the present at least) his possessions in the Milanese to the King of Sardinia, you surrendering to France her possessions in the East and West India's, but keeping the Cape of Good Hope and Trincomalee; if these things be done, Prussia becomes your friend from the double tie of interest and apprehension. Once get her at sea and you will know how to deal with her. The same thing may be predicted as to France, so far forth as you would hereafter work upon her fears. If on the contrary you possess yourself of all her transmarine dominions, from that moment she, confining herself to a marine merely military, you are reduced to that dependance in which hitherto she has been held to you, because in a marine war you may lose much and can gain nothing. I am persuaded that this Court may be brought to concur heartily in such a plan, which, by the bye, Russia will certainly dislike; unless indeed an exchange could be made as a peace-offering to the Empress, giving her Finland for Norway, to be taken by Sweden at the expense of Denmark, which would suit this Cabinet so much the better as a dispute with Denmark would favour projects against Hamburg, Lubbeck and Mecklenburg; reserving the entry into Holstein for the moment when Denmark should be sufficiently embarrassed in her affairs to render it a mere parade instead of a campaign. Should a proper understanding take place between the Courts interested, on the matters above mentioned, it seems to me that Prussia might come forward and offer her mediation on the following conditions. 1st. The status quo in Europe at a certain day past, and in Asia and America a certain day to come. 2nd, the full acknowledgment of that form of Government which the French may think proper to adopt, and a renunciation of all claim to interfere in their affairs.

3rd, the inviolability of the rights of property. The first point would cut off all claims and clamours of retribution by merging precedent dominion in the rights of conquest. The second, indifferent in itself, and coupled with the first, would serve as a lever to raise the army and people of France against the Government, if the mediation should be refused, and the force of Prussia be in consequence once more exerted, or (if you please) once exerted against France. The third point would enable this Cabinet to draw on the negotiation into length, so as to exhaust your enemy in and through his finance; because new points of discussion might continually be raised, and would serve as the ground of retribution to many emigrants, perhaps to all; and even obtain some valuable compensation to the Bourbons for the Royal Domain. Among the many circumstances which seem to call for decision, that which may principally interest you is the desire of France to preserve to herself one enemy, and that you should have that unpleasant preference; also the necessity which the Government lies under of employing its armies until they shall be reduced to safe insignificance. Your fleet may preserve you from invasion, or, cutting off all supplies from the desultory corps thrown on your coast, may operate their destruction. In so doing you would not deserve the Directory. At the same time I cannot but think that forty to sixty thousand victorious Frenchmen preaching Republicanism in Britain would be very troublesome. But although you would preserve the kingdom from injury, perhaps from attack, I do not see how you could protect His Majesty's German dominions. If peace be dictated to Austria, France and Prussia will find employment for Russia in Turkey, in Poland, and in Sweden. Denmark will be awed into acquiescence or be robbed of her Holstein. You are cut off completely from all means of communication with your allies. In short you must depend on the goodwill of Russia, where her interest is only secondary, and even as such remote. If I were to dwell longer on these subjects I should write a dissertation instead of a letter, and weary you with the details which will readily suggest themselves without my meddling."

The EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, July 28, Berlin.—"My conversation this morning with M. Alvensleben was most confidential. He is (I am aware) suspected of strong prejudices against England; and he is certainly not of weight to carry any opinion of his own in opposition to Count Haugwitz. Still, however, I should conceive his good will not immaterial; and, if I am to credit what I heard and saw today, that would not be so difficult as might be imagined. I have known him many years; and, independent of any general good opinion he professes to entertain respecting me, he has, further, a belief that I am a well-wisher to Prussia. On this tone he spoke much today. He dwelt much, and with tears in his eyes, on the private conduct of the King of Prussia; and said, with warmth, that it was shocking to foresee to what dangers and mischief his country may thereby be exposed. He told me that he was miserable from the moment he had heard of this excursion to Pymont. That it was by no means connected with business. That, on the contrary, business would be much retarded by it, and that the motives (those I formerly wrote to your Lordship) which had given rise to it, and the attendants the King took with him, every thing concurred in making it in the highest degree impolitic.

"I am sorry to have to say that some very unpleasant circumstances have already taken place here since the King's departure, strongly characteristic of the whole matter. A principal actress had during the winter been mistress of M. Rietz, and, of course, constantly in the King's private society. Madame Rietz, on her return from Italy, persuaded the King to give her an order to banish this woman from Berlin, which was done on the evening after the King left this. Accordingly M. Rietz, who attends the King, only learnt it by express from Madame Baranives (the actress), and he, before his wife's coming to Pyrmont, obtained a counter-order from the King in virtue of which Madame Baranives was recalled and brought back to Potsdam. Now a third order is arrived; and the woman is set out again on her travels. In a small place as this is your Lordship must be aware of the effect of this tyranny and indecision. I feel ashamed to trouble you with similar anecdotes, but really they are the leading occurrences before me.

"Your Lordship will receive a letter by this conveyance which Mr. G. Morris has very particularly recommended to me. From previous acquaintance with him, I was no ways astonished at the ability, extensive knowledge, and observation, with which he discussed the great political questions of this present crisis. At the same time I confess that, having had occasion to hear a good [deal of] reasoning (as I once mentioned to your Lordship) from persons whose taste leads them to attend to such enquiries, I did not pay very particular attention to Mr. Morris; the more so as I found his reflexions were more weighed than his information on the existing relations between different courts; and as he did not seem to have calculated difficulties any more than he was called upon to encounter them in his theories. But I perceive, that he has created much more impression here. Count Haugwitz has listened to him much. Count Kalitcheff and Prince Reuss have conversed with him repeatedly. Several other Ministers of the country have entered into discussion with him, and it is evident that his observations and statements have staggered them much. He has probably written your Lordship his views, at all events, they are far too general and extensive for me to state them. I am at the same time convinced that the strong opinions he holds forth in regard to France, and his superior abilities will give great weight to any impressions which your Lordship may wish to convey through him. I have been somewhat at a loss in not knowing whether he had any authority to speak in behalf of England. I sincerely wish he had.

Postscript.—"In the hopes of the arrival of a Secretary of Legation, I have delayed going, as I much wished, to some baths in the neighbourhood which were prescribed for me. I can assure your Lordship that I have suffered very severely of late from rheumatism; and although I have used violent remedies, they have afforded me but a partial and momentary relief. Where I am advised to go is within 30-hours journey of this, and, independent of the facility I consequently shall have to be here at the shortest warning, I have put things now on such a footing as to render it very simple, for a person of attention and judgment, to learn every material transaction that can be got at. I, therefore, earnestly trust your Lordship will enable me to improve this season, in order to remove what may otherwise be a most unpleasant companion to me through life."

LORD GRENVILLE to C. BENTINCK.

1796, July 23, Cleveland Row.—"Mr. Hammond will probably have the pleasure of seeing you, and of expressing to you the circumstances which have prevented my writing to you in the unsettled and doubtful state in which public affairs have been placed by a course of events which has materially altered our situation and prospects since you left England.

"It appears to me that it would still be very useful that you should have the goodness to procure such information as may be within your reach respecting the state of the Dutch Provinces. But I should strongly dissuade any attempts to act in the interior there, unless combined with the movements of an external force. Nor is it possible that any assurances can be given from hence respecting the final issue of affairs, beyond those of our wishes for the restoration of the Stadtholder, if the course of events should render it practicable."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, July 29, Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has the honour most respectfully to submit to your Majesty a minute of the meeting of your Majesty's confidential servants yesterday evening, together with the draft there referred to. If your Majesty should be graciously pleased to approve of Mr. Hammond's journey, the credential letters and full powers may be submitted for your Majesty's signature tomorrow evening, and Mr. Hammond would be ready to set out on Monday or, at farthest, on Tuesday next."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, July 30, Windsor.—"I have just received Lord Grenville's note, accompanied by the copy of the Minute of Cabinet of the most serious kind ever deliberated upon, as it contains no less than the outlines for a treaty of peace by which, without in the least explaining what sacrifices this country is to make of its conquests out of Europe for obtaining that object, we offer that in Germany the dominions of the Princes may be given up for the advantage of Austria, and consequently rendering that power more dangerous to the various small Princes of which the German Empire is composed, to tempt her to yield the Netherlands to Prussia, which she has often said she looked upon as a burthen not an advantageous possession. I am certain no one of my Ministers can be surprised that I feel great repugnance at the idea of giving up any conquests made by this country, and still more when it is so vaguely stated that the King of Prussia may suppose this goes to any extent to obtain the object of an immediate peace; but unpleasant as that may be, that is a point that is for the consideration of this country, and necessity may oblige one to submit; but what right England has to give away the rights and interests of other Princes, who have either by England or Austria been brought forward into a business their own inclinations did not covet, I cannot either see a shadow of justice or the pretence of interference; and whether the violence of France or the encouragement of Britain effect this, I must look on it as equally hard on the individual, and subversive of every idea that ought to actuate the stronger to support not oppress the weaker.

"If Vienna looks on the Netherlands as a burthen she may, on a peace, yield those Provinces to Prussia, and that Court may accept it; and, should the King of Prussia be wise enough, he might in return give his new acquired Margraviates of Anspach and Bareuth to Austria, provided for the county of Sayn, which on the death of the present

Margrave comes to me, I should be indemnified by getting the Bishopric of Hildesheim whenever the present possessor shall die or resign; these are reasonable exchanges which the necessity might authorize; and if the two Margraviates do not in value equal the Netherlands, as the support of them would be less expensive than ought to be taken into the calculation; but, should that not do, the King of Prussia might make up the difference by some addition from his Polish acquisitions being given to Austria.

"I have here stated very roughly but with the frankness that I think it right on all occasions ought to accompany the opinions of an honest man, my sentiments; what I fear is that too general a language will raise the demands of both Austria and Prussia, that therefore we ought to be explicit as to the interest of the smaller Princes, and indeed of the Elector of Bavaria, whose situation is the more to be attended to as there is no power that has not sooner or later declared his and the interests of his successor the Duke of Deux Ponts should be attended to. I certainly as well as this country must lose for ever all character in Germany if I could enter into such a bargain; and in my more particular situation as a member of the German empire I certainly must at the Diet protest against so unjust a measure.

"Lord Grenville must easily acknowledge that my having seen two negotiations for peace, and on both occasions the treaty fall so far short of the first project, that such loose ideas as far as regards the foreign possessions of this country and, in my mind, such unjust as to the concerns of every one on the Continent but the two great powers of Austria and Prussia, cannot but alarm me.

"I desire Lord Grenville will show this to Mr. Pitt that the instructions for Mr. Hammond may be drawn up conformable to this; I am certain it must be felt that I am going as far as possible without giving up all claim to that uprightness which I trust will ever attend my conduct.

"I should have mentioned the Prince of Orange, but I trust every one feels his dominions must be secured to his family, and, if not restored to his situation in Holland, that we are bound out of the advantages gained over the Dutch to grant him for himself and his successors an ample equivalent in money."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, July 31, Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has had the honour to receive your Majesty's note of this date which, in humble obedience to your Majesty's commands, he has communicated to Mr. Pitt.

"It is with the deepest concern that they have seen that any part of the ideas which they have felt it their duty, in common with the rest of your Majesty's servants, humbly to submit to your Majesty as most conducive to the interests of your Majesty's kingdoms, has not met with your Majesty's full approbation.

"They beg leave humbly to submit to your Majesty that there appears no probability that peace can be concluded with France without the sacrifice of some part of the conquests made by your Majesty's arms out of Europe, and that the shewing a disposition to reasonable concession in that respect is necessary with a view to a general concurrence at home in such measures as may become indispensable for the further prosecution of the war. It had been felt by your Majesty's servants that any attempt to particularize those sacrifices in the present moment might commit your Majesty too far in the first instance, without giving any security against the enemy's urging higher demands in the sequel of the negotiation.

"The same consideration may perhaps afford a sufficient reason for abstaining in the first overtures to the King of Prussia, from entering as much into particulars as had been proposed. But it appears to Mr. Pitt and Lord Grenville that whatever may be the steps of such a negotiation, the ultimate result must probably be the same.

"They beg leave humbly to submit to your Majesty their opinion that the manner in which the Netherlands shall be settled at the peace, and particularly the keeping those provinces, if possible, out of the possession or dependence of France are so important for the interests of this country that they ought to form the primary objects of attention in any discussion respecting a continental peace.

"They now see little hope of obtaining this point, either by negotiation or by force, without the intervention of the King of Prussia in concert with your Majesty and the Emperor "And it is not to be expected that such intervention can be procured without securing to that sovereign power a considerable acquisition of territory in the Netherlands, or in Germany.

"In whatever way this acquisition is arranged it seems almost certain that Austria can be reconciled to it no otherwise than by the accomplishment of the views which that Court entertains respecting Bavaria.

"It does not belong to your Majesty's servants to judge especially, in the first instance, to what degree, or in what manner the Elector of Bavaria should be indemnified for this sacrifice. But it should seem that the restitution of the Palatinate, which has been lost in great measure by his want of energy and zeal in the common cause, and which he could never recover but by the assistance of the more considerable powers, ought reasonably to be taken into the account.

"It seems, however, probable that the means of indemnifying that Prince, and any other of the Princes or States of the Empire from whom any sacrifices might be required, would be found in measures similar to that which has naturally presented itself to your Majesty's mind on the subject of Hildesheim; measures by which the tranquility of Europe was restored at the peace at Westphalia and the foundation laid of the present system of the Empire.

"Mr. Pitt and Lord Grenville have submitted these points to your Majesty as affecting the interests of this country, and affording perhaps the only means by which France can be prevented from acquiring at the peace a preponderance that may be fatal to Great Britain.

"But even if your Majesty's servants could so far overlook these considerations as to recommend it to your Majesty to abstain from all intervention on this subject, it still appears highly improbable that the complicated interests which must come in question in the negotiation of a Continental peace can ultimately be settled in any other manner than by arrangements of the nature of those proposed in the minute submitted to your Majesty. It seems indeed certain that this could not be the case except in the single event of an unqualified submission on the part of all the powers on the continent to any terms which France might dictate.

"Mr. Pitt and Lord Grenville humbly submit these considerations to your Majesty as the result of the fullest and maturest deliberation on this important subject. If your Majesty should condescend to require any further explanation upon them, they humbly hope to be honoured with your Majesty's commands for attending your Majesty, or for furnishing such explanation in any other manner that your Majesty may be graciously pleased to direct; only begging your Majesty's permission to add that the exigency of the present crisis appears to them to press in the most urgent manner for the adoption of measures calculated to give effect to the ideas above stated."

Draft.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, July 31, Windsor.—"As I cannot say either the letter from Mr. Pitt or the paper from Lord Grenville in the least remove my objections to an unexplained diminution of the conquests made by this country, or to consenting to the giving up Bavaria to Austria, whose conduct by the dispatches I now return appears highly blameworthy towards the whole German Empire, I desire if both are at Dropmore that they will be here by two this day; if not that Lord Grenville will come at that time."

LORD GRENVILLE to the EARL OF ELGIN.

1796, August 2, Downing Street.—"Mr. Hammond will communicate to you the object of his journey to the Continent, and the result of what may pass between the King of Prussia and him. I hope that when he comes to Berlin he will find you well enough to be able to act jointly with him in the execution of that part of his commission which is to be executed there. I have, however, sent a provisional leave of absence, because what I heard of the state of your health made me think that it might be absolutely necessary for you to avail yourself of it, but it will be much more satisfactory to me, as I know it will be to your own feelings, if you can remain at Berlin while this business is pending; conceiving it as I do to be one of the most important objects, and in the most important crisis, that perhaps ever fell to the lot of public men to conduct."

Copy.

— to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, August 5, Berlin.—"They tremble here at the knout, so that could they persuade themselves the Autocratrice would live 10 years, her wishes would be their law. The success of the French excites apprehension, and if vigorous counsels prevailed, you would probably hear of an army in Saxony under Moellendorff, as the prelude to an offer of mediation, without consulting any of the belligerent Powers. As far as I can judge, they have hitherto sought for little things by little means, but now wait the proposals which may be made to them. Whatever these may be, the adherence of Russia will greatly facilitate the adoption of them. They try to persuade themselves that France, from internal divisions, the defect of finance, or pure goodwill, may leave them unmolested. It has been suggested to them that if she keep possession of Flanders, give up her Colonies, and preserve a military marine, she will fear nothing from Britain, who can never afterwards be considered as a weight against her in the general scale of Europe. It would seem that this idea had not before presented itself, for it excited serious reflection. On their hope of quiet, either from the interior quarrels or exterior goodwill of France, it has been observed that the former would (as in ancient Rome) become the constant motive to foreign war; and that France, like Rome, the enemy of all nations, (especially those under kingly Government) would grant to this as to any other monarch the blessings of her friendship, till the moment marked for his destruction. On the finances a great deal has been said, which may, however, be compressed into the maxim that a country may have much iron though it should have little gold, wherefore the French, by imitating the institutions of old Frederick, may from their great population maintain a numerous army, even supposing the climate and soil to be as ungracious as those of Brandenburg. In effect, I have no doubt but that France, whether she fall under the dominion of an usurper (the natural termination to her present state) or whether she form herself into some tolerable shape of Republic, may become dangerous to the liberty of all Europe. Should military despotism take place, that cheap, simple, and severe Government will find abundant resources in the soil, climate, and industry of so fine a country. If, contrary to all expectation, a vast and outrageous Democracy should prolong its existence, the defence of each citadel may be confided to its inhabitants, and, by the aid of customs and excise, a sufficient revenue may be collected to maintain an offensive army of at least one hundred and fifty thousand men. The appetite for contributions must grow by what it feeds on, and the seducing illusions of equality will enfeeble, if not destroy, the resistance of other Governments; especially of this, whose people seem anxious for the opportunity of revolt. This has been represented to the Ministers here; and moreover that France, having no lever but Poland to move the north, a re-establishment of that country must become a leading object of her policy. That the possession of Italy, which when covered by her arms against the inroads of Austria, is in its natural state, and the derangement of the Emperor's affairs will leave the new Republic full room to turn her arms northward. In this case her ally the Turk would gladly contribute some purses, and make a powerful diversion; not to mention that one harsh condition dictated to the Emperor may be the surrender of Galicia, with the breach of his engagements to Russia and England. That this last, should France be able to effect a change in the administration (a thing which seems to be concerted with your Opposition), might join in wishes, if not in act, to wrest the dismembered parts of Poland from the present possessors, and unite them under some practical Government. These and other such considerations have excited here a desire to put matters on a better footing; but, in weak minds, vague hope and childish apprehension fill up the space allotted to the firm resolves of manly decision; so that, before they can be propelled to action, some greater counter-fear must be excited and some danger more immediate must threaten. A word from Russia will have great weight. It has been said to me that, however desirable a certain arrangement, France would not probably consent to give up her conquests, especially Flanders. I thereupon endeavoured to show, first, that she might be forced into it by a due train of political measures without firing a shot; and, secondly, that if a recurrence to force should become necessary, its effect would be prompt and efficacious; because negotiations having been drawn into length during an armistice, the mediator would be master of the moment and the means of impressive hostility; and because the disorder of the French finance would then be most sensible when, the resource of contributions cut off, they should be obliged to support their armies in procrastinated positions far from their frontier. I cannot say absolutely that it is in your power to decide this Cabinet, but I believe so. By the bye, the want of money has been mentioned, and thereupon a mode of getting it à la Française was pointed out. Moreover they have been led to suppose that you also would soon be distressed in your finances, but it has been observed to them that circumstances may permit you to diminish your expenses, and, of course, leave you in a situation to extend to your allies such pecuniary aid as shall be indispensable. I ought to have said somewhere (and will now say it here) that the character of this people, formed by a succession of rapacious Princes, is turned toward usurpation. The war with France was disagreeable to them because it melted down the accumulations of old Frederick, and did not present an immediate accession of territory. But the war with, or rather against Poland was not unpopular, because the moral principles of a Prussian go to the possession of whatever he can acquire. And so little is he the slave of what he calls vulgar prejudice, that, give him opportunity and means, he will spare you the trouble of finding a pretext. This liberality of sentiment greatly facilitates negotiation, for it is not necessary to clothe propositions in honest and decent forms.

"It is not impossible that the Imperial troops may be at length victorious, and, in such case, the French army, if hotly pursued, may be destroyed. Such at least is the opinion which common sense dictates, and which, in a conversation with old Moellendorff, he strongly confirmed. He went so far as to say that sixty thousand men well commanded could not fail to force the French back over the Rhine. With the weight of such an authority, I also am disposed to believe the same thing; but I do not believe in the well-commanded, and indeed had made up my mind to a part of what has happened when Prince Charles was appointed to succeed Clairfayt. These reiterated misfortunes may perhaps impel the Imperial Cabinet to the nomination of an abler chief with discretionary powers; and certainly the French, so far advanced without magazines, are in a critical condition. The fortune of war, therefore, may restore the affairs of the allies, but how far it may be prudent to trust that capricious Goddess is not for me to decide.

"I have said that this Court would accomplish their object unless their power could be reduced to a second order. I was impressed with the practicability of such a plan in the spring of 1795, and since I have been here my belief amounts almost to conviction; but the most favourable moment has gone by, and the difficulties are increased. Little can be expected from Austria, though everything may be hoped from the feebleness of the Prussian King and Cabinet. Is it to be attempted? On that question I may observe that you might count on the cordial aid of your Imperial allies, who will not so readily concur to aggrandize the house of Brandenburg, and may oppose the exchanges mentioned in my last letter. These however are, to the best of my judgment, most advisable for England, because they furnish the probable means of wresting the Low Countries from France, and securing the independence of Holland, so far at least as Holland can be independent. The plan I contemplated for reducing Prussia was to erect a new but hereditary kingdom of Poland, with a constitution as free and energetic as the moral state of the people may admit, such kingdom to consist of the country ceded by the last partition to Austria, and the whole of the Prussian acquisition, together with the Prussian Silesia, a corner of Lower Lusatia, the new mark, and that part of Pomerania lying east of the Oder. I have no question but that two hundred thousand Austrian and Russian troops would speedily have effected this, with the aid of Kosciuszko and his Poles. With this, as with every other arrangement for permanent peace, I couple the possession of Bavaria by Austria. But, under such hypothesis, there would result a solecism in British politics. While as Englishmen you must seek and seize the means of reducing French power and influence, you must, as Germans, wish for their increase, in order to secure your Hanover against the Imperial pretensions. Hence an oscillation of measures dependent on personal character. It is sufficient to present this idea, improper to pursue it. The arrangement suggested for Flanders would obviate such expensive inconsistencies, and present one clear distinct object. Indifferent to the fate of the German Empire, you might choose your allies according to your immediate interest. The aggrandizement of the two Empires on the side of Italy and Constantinople would be useful to you, by forming two naval powers in the Mediterranean to balance your constant enemies France and Spain; for Spain seems irrecoverably attached to her neighbour by the relation of weakness to force. Whether your population could resist through a long struggle the weight of a people spread out from the Alps and the Rhine to the pillars of Hercules, is a question I will not presume to decide. Experience has taught me a sincere faith in the fallacy of human opinions, and more especially of my own."

GEORGE HAMMOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, August 8, Hamburgh.—"I am extremely concerned to begin my official correspondence with your Lordship by so unsatisfactory an account of my present prospects; but really every exertion of Mr. Fraser's and mine has ended in nothing more than in the very scanty intelligence which I have been able to state in my public letter of this date. I, however, flatter myself that, for the reasons I have there assigned, your Lordship will approve of my seeing the Duke of Brunswick previously to my proceeding to Berlin. For various reasons I have preferred going to Nienberg. It is pretty nearly in the direct road to Brunswick, and if the Duke should have returned thither, I shall learn it immediately, or be able to proceed onwards to Minden. But, above all, I shall be certain of meeting at that place with one of the Mr. Boles, who receives some emoluments from your Lordship's office for his services in the Post Office there, who has written to me once or twice, and from whom, without entering into any unnecessary explanations, I can learn with certainty the places of residence not only of the Duke of Brunswick, but of the King of Prussia, should he have altered his intention of returning from Cassel to Berlin.

"Before I conclude this letter, I beg leave to express to your Lordship my sense of the confidence which your Lordship has placed in me by entrusting this important commission to me, and my hope that, if I fail in the execution of it, you will be persuaded that the failure is not to be ascribed to any want of zeal or exertion on my part."

GEORGE HAMMOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, August 11, Minden.—"I was in hopes to have had a secure opportunity of communicating to your Lordship the result of my conversations with the Duke of Brunswick, by recommending my letter to the particular care of Mr. Bode at the Hanoverian post office at Nienberg; but having been disappointed in my expectation of meeting that gentleman, I am under the necessity of deferring writing upon the subject until my arrival at Berlin, where I hope to be on Monday at the farthest. The détour I have made in coming hither has been amply repaid by the kind reception I have experienced, and by the interesting communications which have been made to me."

SIR MORTON EDEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, August 15, Vienna.—"Our situation becomes every day more arduous. I have long thought that the efforts of this country would be unavailing unless the Empress of Russia stood forward as a check on the Court of Berlin. I remain of that opinion, and think that no consideration can bind the Prussian Government to act with good faith, unless the Empress of Russia not only guarantees its engagements, but becomes interested in the execution of them by taking an active part in the war.

"The Foreign Ministers here are informed through M. Desandrouin not only of the pecuniary advances made by us to this Government, but also of the substance of Mr. Hammond's instructions, whose mission originated, he says, in suggestions made by M. de Jacobi of the readiness of His Prussian Majesty to return to the coalition, or to effectuate a peace that would be satisfactory to the allies, for the consideration of some territorial acquisition, and of a sum of money at the peace. M. Desandrouin received his information, as I am assured, from the house of Boyd. The facts were related to me by one of the foreign Ministers and confirmed by Baron Thugut, who earnestly requested me not to omit mentioning them to your Lordship. M. de Thugut wrote some time ago to Count Stahrenberg to apprise your Lordship of M. Desandrouin's being informed by Messires Boyd of the pecuniary advances."

COUNT STARENBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, August, York Farm.—"Je me suis acquitté dès hier au soir de votre commission pour M. de Woronzow. Il sent comme vous et moi combien le procédé de sa Cour est affreux et déplacé, et il en est peiné comme il le doit. Je lui ai fait part de vos désirs au sujet du retardement à apporter au départ de l'Amiral Russe et de sa flotte. Cet officier n'est point sous les ordres du Comte de Woronzow ; il a reçu directement de sa Cour l'instruction d'être rentré avant la mauvaise saison, et il ne dépend, en conséquence, que de lui de fixer le moment de son départ. Si M. de Woronzow s'en mêlait directement ou indirectement, il risquerait de se compromettre inutilement vis-à-vis d'un homme aussi bête que méchant, qui lui veut personnellement du mal, et qui ne manquerait pas de profiter de cette occasion pour lui faire beaucoup de tort à Petersbourg.

"Cependant comme notre ami Woronzow désire sincèrement le bien, et, par conséquent, d'ammener la réalisation de tout ce qui peut être agréable au Ministère Anglais, voici le moyen qu'il m'a indiqué, en me priant de vous en parler comme d'une idée venant uniquement de moi, et qui, par conséquent, doit rester secrète entre nous deux. Ce gros amiral bête et méchant est, néanmoins, brave, mais pardessus tout intéressé à l'excès. Il serait à propos que les subalternes de la marine lui fissent entrevoir la probabilité d'avoir incessamment plusieurs affaires et combats avec des frégattes Hollandoises qui seraient pour lui un attrait de cupidité et de gloire ; et il faudrait ensuite que Milord Spencer lui fit en même temps la demande polie de rester encore le peu de semaines pendant lesquelles il ne risque rien. Ces deux expédients, flattant également son avarice et son ambition, l'ébranleraient certainement ; et il serait bien aise de se faire un mérite de sa prétendue complaisance. Il ne manquerait pas dans ce cas de consulter M. de Woronzow, qui certainement lui conseillerait de se prêter à vos désirs. Voilà le résultat de ma petite négociation particulière. Votre bon esprit vous fera juger aisément de l'importance dont il est pour M. de Woronzow que ceci reste absolument entre nous."

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1796, August, Dropmore.—“Comme je ne suis retourné ici que très tard hier au soir, il m'a été impossible de répondre plutôt à votre lettre que j'ai trouvée sur ma table. Je ne puis guères vous donner la moindre espérance d'obtenir des secours plus étendus. Ce que nous faisons est déjà beaucoup pour la situation actuelle des affaires, et vous savez que nous n'avons pas même cru pouvoir prendre d'engagement positif pour la continuation de ces avances.

“J'aurai le plaisir de vous voir Mardi. Je crois que la déclaration sera approuvée conformément à votre minute. Votre courrier pourra fort bien partir Mardi. Avant cela, nous saurons le résultat de la négociation de Hammond, dont je ne me promets pas grande chose.

“La flotte de Richéry est sortie avec celles de Solano et Langara. L'amiral Mann n'y était pas, ainsi il n'y aura pas eu de rencontre, et l'on ne regarde pas ici la guerre comme déclarée, quoiqu'on s'y prépare comme de raison.

GEORGE HAMMOND TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, August 17, Berlin.—“I have very little to add to my public letter of this date, except to express my hope that your Lordship will have the goodness to overlook any inaccuracies that may appear in the statement of my conference with Count Haugwitz; but, really, the conversation on his part was, in general, such a mass of contradictions, that I have found it almost as difficult to reduce it to any kind of order as to bring him to any definite point. I, however, think it right to remark, as some justification for him, that he appeared to Lord Elgin and myself to be unprepared for the discussion, and that, consequently, his objections may have been as much the effect of embarrassment as of any hostility to the measure proposed.

“I hope your Lordship will approve of my reserve on the subject of the indemnification for Prussia, as I thought that, if the business should fall to the ground, it would be more honourable for His Majesty's Government for me to have confined myself to general insinuations, and that, if it should proceed, every argument of that nature could then be urged with increased effect.

“I cannot avoid repeating what I have said in my public letter respecting my inability to hazard any conjecture on the ultimate result of my mission here; since I am extremely anxious to receive your Lordship's instructions as to the course which I am to pursue in the event of that result being unfavourable, and since the situation of Europe is such that, unpleasant as my continuance here would be to me in that event, and anxious as I may be to return to that station which your Lordship's kindness has rendered so agreeable to me, I shall feel it an act of duty to remain here until I shall receive your Lordship's instructions, or permission to return to England.

“However different the issue of my mission here may be from the Duke of Brunswick's expectation, I have thought it but justice to him not to suppress any of his opinions, in the recital of my communications with him at Minden.”

W. PITT TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, August 19, Wimbledon.—“I find I could not without inconvenience come to you both to-day and next Saturday, and, as you may want me then, I think it better to put off my visit to-day. I went through our list of officers with the Duke of York yesterday, and I enclose the names which we extracted for service in Portugal; and which he seemed to think preferable to Germans. To these must be added some artillery and engineer officers, which we will desire Lord Cornwallis to select.

"I think it might also be useful to accept a proposal which I understand Jarry has made to you of going, in conjunction with some English officer (which last point seems necessary to prevent jealousy of him as a Frenchman) to visit the ports, in order to suggest his ideas of defence, and to report to us the state of the country. I have also conversed with Lord Spencer, on the subject of naval assistance. He thinks that more cannot be said in the present moment, than an assurance of our endeavouring to combine the protection of their ports and trade as much as possible with other essential objects, which it will be practicable to do in a considerable degree; but that we cannot tie ourselves down for any length of time to keep any given force at Lisbon, at least till some arrangement is made for withdrawing the Mediterranean fleet. On this last point nothing can well be decided till our present suspense as to the fate of Italy is in some measure removed, which it probably must be in a few days or perhaps a few hours.

"It would, I think be very useful to call upon Almeida for the farther details which he offers to state with respect to the application of the proposed loan. If that can be properly arranged, I see no difficulty in the measure."

C. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, August 19, Varel.—"Since I wrote last I have had the pleasure of receiving the letter Mr. Hammond left for me, which flatters me with the hopes of seeing him; I have accordingly wrote to him to say, that pressed as he might be for time, he may not find it convenient to come here, but that I could wish him in that case to appoint the time and place that we may meet on his return to England, as I must be anxious to see him from what is said in the letter.

"By the letter I allude to I am happy to be confirmed still more in my resolution of going on; as your Lordship will see it to have been invariably my intention by my last of August 12, as well as by former letters. I am perfectly aware from many circumstances how difficult it was to give any regular answers to my letters. It is encouragement enough for me to know that our endeavours, as far as they go, have not been thought quite useless. We have to regret that we are necessarily so slow and so limited in our operations. But our perseverance may be relied upon. We shall endeavour to find out and animate those who are least likely to be discouraged by delay and disappointments, that our strength may depend as little as possible on events, though no doubt they must always influence more or less the dispositions of the country. I am happy to say that, hitherto, under all the checks we have met with, we gain instead of losing ground; and, whatever may be the course of events, we shall, I flatter myself, keep a strong and faithful party together, who will wait with patience and with firmness for a favourable opportunity, which, in the present strange and unsettled state of affairs, may arise when it is least expected from the necessity the Continent of Europe will at last be under of resisting with vigour and unanimity the alarming progress of the republicans; or from the internal vices of the French Government, the principles of discord and of dissolution which it contains, and the ruined state of its finances; causes which may undermine it much sooner than may seem likely in the midst of their military successes. I beg your Lordship will excuse these few general reflections, which I am led into from feeling how much the situation of the Seven Provinces must ultimately depend on the final issue of the great contest; a circumstance, much as it is to be regretted that it may delay the term so much to be wished for, and leave that country yet for some time in a state of helpless subjection and suffering, carries along with it this consolation, that it seems scarcely possible any settlement consistent with the safety and independence of Europe should take place without the United Provinces being, at the same time, rescued from the ignominious yoke of the Revolutionists.

"By the annexed extracts your Lordship will see we have no reason to be dissatisfied with the disposition of the inhabitants, should the moment come which may be thought likely to lead to their deliverance. What is most difficult is not, as yet, to keep up their courage; but to induce them to wait with temper and patience, and to prevent the effects of idle reports of whatever nature, of apparent contradictions from the variety of accounts they receive from abroad. We latterly heard from our correspondent at Amsterdam that what they heard from England was not so favourable as what was sent from hence and from the East (as they express themselves). We agreed M. Van der Haer should answer that, whatever might be wrote to them from England by their friends, he begged they would be convinced they had very good reasons there for what they stated; that they should place implicit confidence on their friends in that country; that he had no doubt all would be cleared up to their satisfaction; that they should not enter into discussions with their English friends on the apparent contradictions of the accounts from different quarters: that they should not endeavour to penetrate further than it seemed the wish they should; but that it ought to be their endeavour, to the utmost of their ability, to reconcile in the most probable manner these various accounts, and use them to keep up the hopes and perseverance of the well-intentioned; and that they should rest satisfied that all would end well.

"Your Lordship will observe that most of our communications have been sent into the country by M. Van der Haer, and in his name. As it is known that he is in correspondence with the Princes, we have agreed that, on account of M. de Rhoon's situation, and for other reasons, my name and that of my brother (who is with us) should appear as little as possible where we could not trust to the discretion of our friends. At the same time it is but justice to M. Van der Haer to repeat what I have said in former letters, that, far from wishing not to share the responsibility with him, both my brother and I are willing to take the whole upon ourselves if any blame could possibly attach to M. Van der Haer's warm and honest endeavours to serve his country and his friends, and to the indefatigable exertion of his talents; even if we were not to set the value we do on his faithful and steady friendship for M. de Rhoon, at whose request he came here, and who has lately expressed his wishes from W—— that we should give him all the assistance in our power. You may imagine how cautious we wish to be that M. de Rhoon's name should never appear at this moment, and that he should not ever be supposed to know what we are about. We have therefore agreed that, excepting M. Van der Haer, no one should know exactly how far we (my brother, who is with us, and I) take a share in all this; or be acquainted with the particulars of my correspondence in England, whatever they may suppose, though we are sure of its meeting with the approbation of all our friends within the country; and we have agreed that every assurance and communication of a delicate nature should be forwarded by M. Van der Haer. Were M. de Rhoon here, and I wish he were, we should not be obliged to so much caution, though, no doubt, a great deal would still be necessary in the critical situation of the Republic. I shall be very impatient to see Mr. Hammond, and to hear the result of his journey.

Postscript.—"Since I wrote this we have received the accounts of the advantages the Austrians have obtained in Italy, and of the siege of Mantua being in all probability raised. This will not lessen the hopes and confidence of our friends. We wish they may yet be as successful on this side. I should not forget to say that M. Van der Haer has written two pamphlets lately, partly at my request. One of them is an abstract from a work entitled, Intérêts de la Monarchie-Prussienne, as far as relates to the United Provinces, which we thought would produce a good effect at this moment. The other is an answer to the charges brought forward by Messrs. Voorda and Valkenaar against the Prince of Orange, as far as relates to his residence in England, and to the orders there said to have been given to the colonies; which M. Van der Haer proves not only justifiable by every principle of the law of nations, but to have been the Stadholder's duty as head of the union, and in virtue of his oath."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE HAMMOND.

1796, August 23, Cleveland Row.--"I have received your letters from Hamburg and Minden, and wait with great impatience for the account of your arrival at Berlin, though I could have much wished that it had not been there that your negotiation was to be opened. Since you left us the prospect of affairs has been daily growing more gloomy, and I am sorry to see that, in proportion as it does so, the animosities between Vienna and Berlin are increasing. The day will unquestionably come when the latter will see its error, but that day will, I fear, be too late to remedy the consequences of it. I collect from your private letter that the Duke of Brunswick has at least given you good words and good advice, but too many obstacles are in his way to make it possible for him to give real assistance, unless at the head of an army, and that a victorious one. It is a comfort to me to know in this state of things that what can be done you will do.

Postscript.—"You will have found Morris at Berlin. I have received many letters from him filled with ideas not wholly dissimilar to those on which we are acting, though carried, as is usual with him, into a much wider field of speculation than I should like to see opened. Great use may, however, I believe be made of him there. His language and manners are well calculated to produce an impression there. His leanings are all favourable to us, and you are not ignorant how much they may be improved by attention and a proper degree of confidence. I write to him by this messenger."

THE EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, August 23, Berlin.--"Had Mr. Hammond determined on returning immediately to England, I should not have troubled you by letter with repeating my anxiety for the arrival of a Secretary of Legation here. Mr. Hammond's own observation has enabled him to judge of the benefit to be expected from the attendance of a person in that capacity at a Court where business is carried on as it is at Berlin. And he authorises me to say that he will explain to your Lordship on his return to London his concurrence in sentiment with me on that subject. In the meanwhile, the present state of affairs is such that I every day regret not having the advantage which I could hope to derive from the assistance of a Secretary of Legation."

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE.

MINUTE of LORD GRENVILLE. (Copy sent to the King.)

1796, September 2.—"It is proposed to write to Count Wedel Jarlsberg desiring him to transmit to the Danish minister at Paris a note to be by him communicated to the Directory, asking a passport for a person to be sent from hence to open discussions on the subject of peace. And in case of their agreeing to this, to desire that he will send over the passport to Count Wedel; or, if it should be refused, that he will enable Count Wedel to communicate here the answer which may be given him on the subject.

"If the answer is affirmative, it is proposed that Mr. Jackson should be sent to Paris with instructions to the following import.

"He is to be furnished with a letter to the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Paris, stating that he is authorized to discuss the means of terminating the present extensive war.

"He is, in the first place, to propose that, for the purpose of opening a negotiation to this effect, Ministers should be sent by Great Britain and France to any neutral place that may be agreed upon; where they may also be met by a Minister from the Emperor, if his Imperial Majesty shall think fit.

"If this proposal is objected to, he is to offer to discuss at Paris, conjointly with any person that the Emperor may think proper to send there for the same purpose, the means of concluding a general peace on just and honourable terms.

"Whatever answer may be given on the other points of these proposals, it is probable that an objection will be raised to the idea of a joint negotiation with Great Britain and Austria, and that the sentiments expressed by the Directory on this subject in their answer to Baron Degelman's note will be again brought forward.

"To this Mr. Jackson is to answer distinctly, that the interests of Great Britain cannot be so separated from those of the Continent. That no peace can be concluded between Great Britain and France, nor even any progress made in the negotiation, without constant reference to the manner in which it may be proposed to arrange the affairs of the Continent, and particularly the interests of Austria, to whom His Majesty is bound by a community of interest, as well as by the ties of good faith. That such a mode of treating has always been found to be the only effectual mode of restoring peace to Europe, when engaged in general or extensive wars. That if, therefore, the Directory sincerely wish peace, they cannot refuse acceding to the only proposal which can produce that object.

"It is indeed probable that France will find herself under the necessity of acting in the same manner with respect to Holland, in consequence of her engagements with that Republic. And although this point is not to be brought forward by Mr. Jackson in the first instance, it will be easy for him to put these with whom he treats under the necessity of explaining themselves upon it; and he will then make the obvious use of such a declaration, by contrasting it with the objection attempted to be raised against treating jointly with the King and his allies.

"He is to remark that the proposal now made does not preclude the possibility of direct and immediate discussions between Great Britain and France respecting their particular interests in relation to each other, in the same manner as took place in the negotiations previous to the peace of 1763, and at various other periods; but that such discussions can never be brought to their final issue unless as combined, in the manner above stated, with the negotiations with Austria; the terms to which the King might be willing to accede being liable to be materially varied both in their nature and extent by the different arrangements that may be made of the affairs of the Continent.

"If the French Minister should positively refuse to accede to the proposal of discussing the subject of peace of this footing, Mr. Jackson will endeavour to bring this point to as clear and distinct an issue as possible; and will be careful to reduce the proposal to writing agreeably to the principles here stated, and to require the answer of the French Minister in the same form.

"If the business should be brought to this issue, Mr. Jackson should suspend any further step till he has fresh instructions for his guidance.

"But if the Directory should not start this difficulty, or should not ultimately insist upon it, he is then to regulate his conduct according to the following instructions.

"If the Directory accept the proposal of sending Ministers to a neutral place, Mr. Jackson is to declare his readiness to accede on his Majesty's part to any such place that may be agreed upon by Austria and France.

"If the Directory express a desire that the negotiation may rather proceed in the channel in which it has been opened, Mr. Jackson is then to declare himself ready to receive from the French Government any statement of a basis for negotiation, or any other communication which that Government may have to make on the subject of peace, and to transmit them to his Court for consideration. And if any such communication should be so made, he is to dispatch a messenger with it to England.

"If the French Government should decline making any such communication, Mr. Jackson is to be careful to mark this, as well as the other stages of this discussion, by written memorials and answers; and having so done, and the negotiations being distinctly brought to this point, he is to deliver a memorial (which it is meant he should take with him from hence) and which will contain the general ideas of a basis for negotiation to be proposed on the part of this country.

"This paper will state that the interests of all the leading Powers are so intimately connected with each other that a general arrangement, at least as far as relates to all the Powers actually engaged in hostilities, must of necessity be resorted to, as it has always hitherto been, for the purpose of putting an end to an extensive and complicated war. That, as a part of such an arrangement, his Majesty is willing to restore such proportion of what his Majesty has conquered from France out of Europe as may, on fair discussion, be judged reasonable, in consideration of advantages to be procured to his allies. That the nature and extent of these must, of necessity, be varied by the result of the discussions which will take place on the other parts of such general arrangement. That, with a view to such discussion, his Majesty thinks that either of the two accustomed principles in such negotiations (the Status ante Bellum or the Uti Possidetis) might be taken as the first point from which the discussions might be commenced, making the deviations from it reciprocal, and, as nearly as might be, equal on both sides. But it is evident that, in either case, those deviations must in the present instance be very considerable, in order to reconcile the interests and engagements of the different parties concerned. And in proportion as any arrangement founded on these principles may provide for the interests and just claims of his Majesty's allies, his Majesty would be willing to compensate any concessions made for that purpose by France, by a proportionable sacrifice of the advantages which he has acquired during the war.

"Whatever answer may be returned to this offer, Mr. Jackson will transmit it home, waiting for fresh instructions upon it before he takes any further step; especially as some answer will probably by that time have been received from Vienna to the first intimation of the measure in question, and of the line intended to be adopted; which intimation it is proposed to make as full and explicit as possible.

"With respect to the effect and application of these principles, it is proposed that our offers may be as follows; namely, that Great Britain, in return for the adoption of the status quo, strict as with respect to Austria, should agree to apply the same principle as with respect to herself and France; reserving the Dutch possessions which have been conquered in the war as an indemnification for the alterations which have taken place in the political state of Holland. It would even not be too much to consent in the course of the negotiation to let France retain on these conditions the whole of St. Domingo, and to restore to the Dutch their West India possessions, keeping the Cape and the conquests in the East Indies. And as an ultimatum (though not to be offered without fresh instructions from hence) this restitution might even be extended to the Dutch Spice Islands, and all their East India possessions except Ceylon, the Cape, and Cochin.

"By such a peace France would keep Savoy and Nice, all the conquered countries on the Rhine not belonging to Austria and the Spanish part of St. Domingo, in addition to all her former possessions. Austria would recover all she has lost by the war. And Great Britain would retain the most valuable of her conquests.

"But France may perhaps absolutely refuse to restore the Netherlands to Austria, and the latter Power will be more ready to relinquish them than any other of its possessions before the war, especially if any prospect is offered of indemnification or compensation elsewhere.

"It is impossible to foresee the various projects that may be brought forward to effect this purpose. The different degrees of concession to which this country might accede with respect to her conquests can only be regulated by the consideration of such proposals as may come in question on this subject.

"The objects to be attended to in such discussions would be, the preventing the power of Austria from suffering material diminution, and the placing the Netherlands in a situation of as little dependence as possible on France. And in proportion as these points were more or less satisfactorily obtained, we might agree to yield more or less of the concessions above stated.

"Supposing the Uti Possidetis taken as the basis of negotiation, great care must be used to explain that this is no otherwise proposed or accepted by his Majesty than as establishing a ground for such reciprocal cessions, to be made by Great Britain and France, as would provide for the future safety of Europe, and particularly for the pretensions which Austria is justly entitled to form. But with that caution the negotiation might be regulated by the same principles, and brought to the same issue as in the other case.

"The other allies of the King would be provided for according to either of these principles of negotiation. But provision should be made for some indemnification to the Stadtholder for the loss of his situation in Holland; and this might very justly be annexed as a condition to the restoration of any part of the Dutch possessions."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 4, Weymouth.—"Yesterday I received Lord Grenville's letter forwarding the written project of opening a negotiation of peace at Paris by sending Mr. Jackson thither for that purpose. The avocations of the day prevented me from reading the paper in time to return it by the regular daily messenger, which I think rather advantageous as it enabled me to put it into Mr. Pitt's hands and permit him to communicate it to the Chancellor and the Duke of Portland, both of who approving of it, it has now been looked upon as equivalent to a minute of Cabinet. I certainly do not object to the trial; but should have liked it better if the preparations for an active campaign had been first prepared and this been the subsequent step, as it would have come with more dignity; but as perhaps others think the refusal which most probably will ensue may rouse men's minds and make them more ready to grant supplies of men and money, I do not object to the mode proposed being adopted.

"The conduct of the Spanish Ambassador cannot be more absurd; the answer to him highly proper."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 4, Weymouth.—"I am not sure that I shall not be at Dropmore before this letter reaches you, but, lest I should not, I wish to say that the King accedes readily to all we have proposed, and the Chancellor and Duke of Portland perfectly concur in it. The sooner the letter to Wedel goes the better."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 5, Wimbledon.—"I am just arrived here, having called at Dropmore in my way and learned that you are in town. I must be here early tomorrow morning to meet the Duke of York; and therefore should prefer remaining here in the interval, unless there is anything material in which time would be saved by my coming to town. In that case let me know, and I can be with you at any time in the evening. I conclude you will have received my letter from Weymouth this morning, and the King's answer, and will, in consequence, have sent your letter to Wedel. If I am not wanted, I shall go tomorrow to Hollwood to dinner, and from thence to town next morning. Perhaps, if you can not get so far as Dropmore, you can meet me at Hollwood.

"The Duke of Portland has taken a notion that he can persuade the Duke of Devonshire to be Privy Seal. I do not at all believe it, but have encouraged him to try."

The EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, September 6, Berlin.—“I am sorry to have omitted mentioning to your Lordship, by the messenger who left this on Sunday, that Captain Anstruther is now with the Arch-Duke Charles, and might be of use there, in case the melancholy account of Colonel Craufurd’s death should be true. I am in the greatest hopes that the account is false, because I have no confirmation or even mention of it in any letters which I have seen from the army. Should it however prove to be true, I beg leave to name Captain Anstruther to your Lordship as an officer whom Sir Ralph Abercrombie, and afterwards General Dundas, selected as their confidential aide-de-camp; both from his military talents and from his superior judgment and ability. His father’s apprehension of the yellow fever prevented his going to the West Indies with Sir R. Abercrombie, when Sir Ralph offered him the situation of Adjutant-General to that expedition. He has been with me all the winter, and been accordingly kept au-courant of affairs, as far as this Court put them in our way. He is in the 3rd Regiment of Guards; and very favourably known to the Duke of York as a military man.”

GEORGE HAMMOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, September 6, Hamburg.—“I cannot but hope that, for the reasons I have formerly stated, your Lordship will not disapprove of my determination to leave Berlin without waiting for farther instructions. But if any doubts could have remained in my mind as to the propriety of this measure, even after the uncivil conduct of Count Haugwitz at our last interview, they would have been effectually removed by my knowledge of the interesting overtures which Count Kalicheff was instructed to make to the Court of Berlin, and by the apprehension lest Count Haugwitz might endeavour to represent my continuance at Berlin in such a light to Count Kalicheff as to excite some sort of suspicion in his mind, or might use it as a pretext to delay returning that immediate answer to the Russian propositions on which the Empress has so peremptorily insisted. The conduct which the Court of Berlin may in any given case pursue is, from the contrariety of sentiment subsisting between the King and his ministers, so little capable of being predicted, that it is somewhat hazardous to risk an opinion on the subject; but I must confess that I am rather sanguine in my belief that the language which the Empress has employed in her letter to the King of Prussia, and the nature of the indirect menaces which she throws out, are most admirably calculated to produce the effect of bringing that monarch back to a participation in the coalition against France.”

P. BOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, September 8, Philadelphia.—“I have the satisfaction to inform your Lordship that the adoption of the treaty has had a very perceptibly good effect upon the minds of the people of this country. It [was not to be expected that the principles of men who aim at disorder and confusion as their only hope of aggrandizement, were to be reformed by this measure; but the Administration by a steady adherence to the spirit of the Constitution, has acquired an importance and energy which it did not previously possess; and many influential characters, who had been wavering and undecided, as to the political part they were to take, now zealously support the Government, as the best and most secure policy they can pursue.

"Though the treaty has not yet been called into full operation, considerate men, rightly, contemplate the benefits which are to flow from it, than which no one point seems to be of greater moment, than its tendency to retain this infant country in a state of peace with the most powerful empire in the universe, and to secure to it all those benefits, which to a commercial country must follow from a strict and tenacious observance of its neutrality.

"The only causes of complaint, which now exist, proceed from the capture of American vessels, and the impressment of seamen navigating them; inconveniencies to which this country must be liable, as long as the enterprising spirit of so many of its traders, forcing the prescribed channels of commerce, renders a rigid scrutiny indispensable; and until some mode shall be devised to correct those deceptions in respect to our seamen to which a similarity of language and of habits so seriously expose us."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 9, Park Street, Westminster.—"Upon inquiry today of Canning, I find that 7000*l.* is all the money that is expected. Unless this is exclusive of three thousand some odd hundred which I understand has been protested, the sum will fall short even of what is wanted in the first instance.

"When I spoke to Dutheil about the method of sending Tr[yon] over, he talked confidently of means that he possessed of sending him either by Calais or Havre, as often as he had a mind. But it seemed to me that this was the confidence of a man who was to try the experiment in the person of another, and not in his own. And I am convinced that the plan which I mentioned to you will be infinitely the safest, as well as the most commodious.

"For this purpose, however, we shall have occasion for at least 1000*l.* which, unless the sums advanced for the main object shall become hereafter more abundant, cannot well be deducted from thence. It is merely a question of getting the money, for the payment of it is but a very small advance beyond what is due or may reasonably be asked on another account, namely, the following:

"Tr[yon] in his last journey has laid out about 250*l.*, of which he brings a perfectly detailed and satisfactory account. In his former journeys also, which have been numerous though separately much less expensive than this, in which he travelled all the way post, he has laid out considerable sums beyond what have been advanced or repaid to him; and which, he says, have exhausted the little fortune which he brought with him out of France. Of these he has given me an account from time to time; though I have never had the means of doing more than to advance to him what was necessary for the outfit of the journey in which he was immediately engaging. The whole, if allowed, would amount to a sum of some 700*l.*

"It would be a very advantageous way of paying him to enable him to take a share in this commercial association, the profits of which would, at the same time, go a great way towards defraying his future expenses. The moment therefore that you can procure me 1000*l.* beyond what shall be absolutely wanted for remittances, I will establish him in the proposed situation, and take his receipt for all antecedent demands. I will also endeavour to effect it upon better terms, if I can.

"In talking to me of the details of his last journey, he explained incidentally one of the numerous occasions for which money is to serve, even in the present state of the Royalists.

"While he was at Rennes, the discovery took place of which much has been said since in the correspondence of the Prince de Bouillon, of one of the houses of correspondence in that city.

"The woman escaped for the time by a miracle, but her house and all her property is confiscated. Had he been possessed of any sum beyond that which he considered as appropriated, he would have allotted a part of it towards relieving the person in question in the ruin to which she was reduced.

"In case, too, of persons arrested, a sum reasonably applied is perpetually the means of saving them; and the knowledge that such means are in the Royalists' hands, besides the benefit in the instances themselves, is of great service generally to the cause. M. Cointre, who was suspected at Jersey of having purloined the money entrusted to him, but who, on the contrary, has been arrested and denounced for having delivered it, may have a chance of being saved by means of the very money which he has delivered.

"As I have no means at present of forwarding M. Tryon's mission by staying in London, I shall be absent for a few days.

"You will have the goodness only to ensure the payment of the three or four thousand pounds protested, in addition to the 7000*l.* promised, and, if possible, to enable Tr[yon] before his departure to establish himself as a partner in the projected association."

C. BENTINCK to C. GODDARD.

1796, September 9, Varel.—"I have not written since the 23rd ultimo, not thinking the intelligence we have received in the mean time worth transmitting. Our letters assure us however that the changes which may have taken place in the neighbouring provinces are more in our favour than otherwise; but they are trifling. Our friends express their invariable confidence on the efforts which they are led to expect from without, and their impatience to know whether any change is likely to take place in their favour before next winter.

"A report prevailed lately in the province of Groningen that the King of Prussia had acknowledged the Batavian Republic. This report did not seem to discourage the well-intentioned, as they observe, the conditions of the recognition could not be very favourable to the Revolutionists, who are very much out of humour with some part of the conduct of their own friends, which they conceal from the public, as well as the terms of the recognition, if it exists.

"There are few troops in the province of Groningen and on this frontier. The troops that were encamped near Zutphen and Zuidlaasen have been suddenly marched off to different parts of the country. I have not anything more material at this moment, not wishing to take up any of your time with the multitude of idle reports which we, of course, hear from day to day. It is right to repeat however that, as far as we know, the disposition of the country cannot be more favourable than it is; and I shall regret the winter's coming on again without an opportunity having offered of putting it to the test, though we are aware that at this moment we are, and must be from the turn affairs have taken, but a secondary object, till the very alarming progress of the Republicans on the continent of Europe has been checked in a decisive manner. I am very anxious to hear something of the person who brought the letter for me, and beg you will have the goodness to mention this to Lord Grenville."

BARON THUGUT to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1796, September 10, Vienna.—"Vous êtes déjà informé par l'Ambassadeur de sa Majesté résidant à Petersbourg de la résolution que vient de prendre l'Impératrice de constater son zèle pour la défense de la cause commune en fournissant un corps effectif de 60,000 combattants; M. le Comte de Cobenzl vous a instruit en même temps des arrangements pécuniaires avec l'Angleterre, dont la Russie fait dépendre l'exécution de ce dessein.

"En combinant ces déterminations récentes de la Cour de Petersbourg avec ce que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de me mander en dernier lieu, du rappel subit de l'escadre Russe, l'on serait tenté de penser que cette dernière mesure avait été employée pour préparer d'avance le Ministère Britannique, par l'appréhension de la perte d'un renfort non indifférent de ses forces de mer, à plus de facilité pour les propositions que la Russie se voyait sur le point de faire relativement à la marche des troupes destinées à co-opérer à la guerre de terre.

"Quoiqu'il en soit, nous ne pouvons nous empêcher de regarder comme un objet de l'importance la plus décisive, tant pour l'intérêt général de la coalition, que pour les intérêts particuliers de l'Autriche et de l'Angleterre, que les demandes de la Cour de Petersbourg soient accueillis à Londres, et que le Ministère Britannique s'y prête avec condescendance par les sacrifices qui sont en son pouvoir.

"Il est évident que, si l'on parvient à s'assurer de l'assistance franche et loyale de la Russie, il en résultera un nouvel ordre des choses, et un changement total dans la situation générale des affaires de la coalition. La triple alliance reparoîtra dans tout son éclat, et reprendra dans l'opinion publique le poids que les soupçons répandus avec tant d'art par la Prusse du peu d'accord entre les trois Puissances contractantes, avaient si fort affaibli. La prépondérance de l'union des trois Cours alliées réprimera les attentats des malveillants, elle encouragera les bien intentionnés que leur pusillanimité retient de manifester leur sentimens, et en considérant tous les effets qu'on peut attendre d'un concours réel et sincère de la Russie, l'on peut raisonnablement se flatter que la France, épuisée malgré ses prétendues victoires, trompée d'ailleurs dans son espérance de nous forcer à la paix pendant le cours de la campagne actuelle par la témérité de ses entremises, non seulement sera obligée à rechercher elle-même une pacification honorable pour les Alliés, mais que même sa détresse fera éclore peut-être des événemens à apporter des changements à son Gouvernement monstrueux, et à substituer un autre régime quelconque moins dangereux pour les autres Puissances, et qui promette à ses voisins un repos plus durable.

"Quant à l'Angleterre en particulier, il est impossible qu'elle ne sente vivement toute l'utilité qu'elle retirera de la co-opération effective de la Russie à la cause commune. La nécessité de se procurer cet avantage décisif devient d'autant plus urgente pour la Cour de Londres, qu'elle est menacée d'une rupture avec l'Espagne; que la connaissance seule de la détermination prise par l'Impératrice d'unir ses efforts à ceux du reste de la coalition arrêtera peut-être, s'il en est temps encore, l'explosion des projets iniques du Cabinet de Madrid; et que, dans tous les cas, l'accroissement que recevra la masse générale des forces de la coalition par la jonction de celles de la Russie, fournira même à la “Le Cabinet de St. James nous a fait connaître, à différentes reprises, la disposition où il était de sacrifier une partie des conquêtes faites par ses armes dans le cours de la guerre, afin de nous ouvrir, dans une pacification commune, la voye pour obtenir des conditions convenables. Sa Majesté a apprécié sans doute, comme elle devait, une pareille offre, digne de la loyauté de la Grande Bretagne, et de son fidèle attachement aux stipulations des traités ; mais, si les propositions actuelles de la Russie sont accueillies, tout permet d’espérer que les affaires prendront, sous peu, une tournure qui, dispensant l’Angleterre de la triste nécessité de restituer ses conquêtes pour procurer à ses alliés des conditions tolérables, ne la gênera plus dans le choix de celles qu’elle voudra garder à la paix.

“D’ailleurs il ne faut plus se dissimuler que, quelques fussent à l’avenir nos succès, il ne resterait guères d’espérance que l’Autriche et la Grande Bretagne à elles-seules réussissent désormais à rompre la monstrueuse intimité entre La France et La Hollande, ni à remettre le régime des Provinces Unies sur l’ancien pied par le rétablissement de la Maison d’Orange ; mais dès que l’on se sera assuré des secours offerts par la Russie, il existe la plus grande vraisemblance que l’énergie que nous serons à même de déployer dans nos opérations, fera bientôt la loi à la France sur cet objet également au quel la Grande Bretagne avec raison met tant d’importance.

“Je ne m’étendrai pas ici sur le besoin intime et extrême que nous avons nous-mêmes de l’assistance la plus active de la Russie. Nous ne saurions plus nous cacher que, sans cet espoir, la situation des choses ne présente nulle probabilité d’une paix qui, dans la supposition même la plus favorable, ne fût plus ou moins humiliante ; et qui, en rappelant continuellement la honte de nos défaites, et celle d’avoir reçu la loi du vainqueur, ne fut destructive de la considération de la Monarchie ; considération d’un prix inestimable aux yeux de la saine politique, accoutumée d’apprécier les objets d’après les bons principes, et non d’après le désir peu noble et irréfléchi du repos, des jouissances du moment.

mauvais état des affaires de la coalition à recourir une seconde fois à la Cour de Berlin, en hasardant même l'offre d'une acquisition territoriale considérable, offre capable d'entraîner dans ses conséquences des inconvéniens bien plus graves que des sacrifices en argent quelconques.

“Cependant, quoiqu'il nous ait été déclaré bien positivement que les sommes exigées par l'Impératrice ne soient pas susceptibles d'aucune diminution quelconque, nous sommes toutefois disposés à conserver l'espérance que, dans un cas extrême, la Cour de Petersbourg, convaincue d'une impossibilité absolue et réelle de la part de l'Angleterre pour satisfaire à ses demandes en totalité, se prêterait peut-être à des modifications, et à des arrangemens tendant à faciliter l'accord à établir, pourvue que le Ministère Britannique veuille bien entrer avec franchise en des explications amicales pour chercher des points de rapprochement, et pour démontrer au Cabinet de Petersbourg que les difficultés tiennent à la nature des choses, et non à aucun manque de bonne volonté ou d'une juste appréciation des secours proposés.

“Si, comme nous aimons à le croire, la manière de voir du Cabinet de St. James à l'égard des secours de la Russie, est conforme à la nôtre, il est de la dernière importance que, sans la perte d'un seul instant, il soit procédé aux arrangemens à prendre à ce sujet. Les distances sont immenses, le rassemblement et tous les préparatifs préalablement nécessaires pour la marche des troupes Russes, exigent un temps considérable; la plus grande partie des non-succès de nos opérations jusqu'ici n'a été constamment que la suite des rétards dans les concertations à prendre entre les Alliés; et les nouveaux délais qu'on mettrait à s'assurer, en façon quelconque, de l'exécution des offres de la Russie, seraient infailliblement cause que, les troupes n'arrivant pas à temps, et les opérations manquant encore d'ensemble, les fruits des nouveaux sacrifices auxquels l'Angleterre se sera déterminée, ne répondrait nullement à ce que la bonne volonté actuelle de la Cour de Petersbourg permet d'en attendre.

“Au reste, il est sans doute superflu d'observer ici que les sommes à accorder à la Russie ne doivent entraîner aucun retard ou diminution pour les avances et secours pécuniaires qui nous sont promis; loin de là, il est d'une nécessité absolue que notre emprunt, conséquemment à ma dépêche du 7 du mois dernier, soit porté à 5 million, ou pour le moins à 4½ million livres, somme égale à celle de notre emprunt de l'année passée; attendu que les évènements qui ont eu lieu depuis quelque temps, nous ont occasionné des dépenses aussi énormes qu'inattendues; que le nouveau changement des circonstances et l'arrivée prochaine des troupes Russes font pressentir la possibilité d'une prolongation quelconque de la guerre; et que, d'un autre côté, le règlement de notre emprunt ayant été retardé jusqu'ici, nous prévoyons bien qu'il ne serait guères faisable de proposer un nouvel et troisième emprunt dès les premiers mois de l'année prochaine.

“Nous ne balançons pas de prévenir avec franchise un allié en qui nous mettons la plus grande confiance, que la pénurie de nos finances est au-delà de toute expression ; que nous sommes exposés au danger de manquer de numéraire pour fournir au prêt des troupes ; de voir, par conséquent, les armées se débâter ; et que, ne pouvant courir le risque d'un pareil malheur capable d'entraîner le bouleversement total de la monarchie, nous serions probablement obligés malgré nous, et en frémissant sans doute, à prêter les mains à une paix quelconque, si l'Angleterre refusait de subvenir à notre détresse.

LORD GRENVILLE to W. WINDHAM.

1796, September 11, Dropmore.—“ I return you the letters you enclosed to me. I understand from M. Dutheil distinctly—what, indeed, the memoire of the agents clearly shows—that they only ask 7,000*l.*, including the 4,400*l.* protested on account of the inaccuracy of the mode in which it had been drawn. If for the separate object of sending Tryon back, or of furnishing any immediate sum to Puisaye, Mr. Pitt is willing to allow any further advance, I can have no objection to it ; but that is a business with which I must not mix the allotment of the 7,000*l.* to be remitted to the King's agents. If I am not careful to keep this sum distinct from all other appropriation or use, we shall relapse into confusion.

“ Dutheil has engaged to remit this money directly to Paris, which is both a safer and a more expeditious conveyance than by a commercial enterprise through Hamburg. I did not know that he had proposed to Tryon to return by the same channel. The advantages or danger of such a plan must, of course, be left to be decided upon by Tryon himself.”

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 11, Park Street, Westminster.—“ My idea of Ramsay's mission is that he shall be sent as a military man for the purpose of gaining information, with the assistance of our Minister, relative to the military state of the country, and of conveying to the Government, with the same assistance, our ideas of the sort of succours which we can best afford them.

“ On this last head, he will have to explain to them the nature of the corps which we propose to send, and the footing on which we mean them to be ; and by these explanations endeavour to get the better of that sort of apprehension which they are at present disposed to entertain of French troops.

“ On the other hand, by learning something of the state of their officers and of their army, and forming a better judgment of both than Mr. Walpole will probably have been able to form, he will be enabled to tell us how far it is important to press upon them the acceptance of the corps which we are now speaking of, and which, it must be remembered, are the only ones that we have to send. My own idea of the Portuguese service is that it will not suffer by the introduction of two such regiments as Mortimart and Castries, and such corps of French officers as may be furnished by the cadres, and recruited from the numerous French and Walloons, that will not fail to desert from Spain, or that are already in Portugal. The superintendence of an officer of ours will be a great security for the good behaviour of these corps, and a great means of preventing misunderstandings between them and the natives.

"If this measure is thought right, the sooner Ram-ay sets off the better. The powers that he should have must be more than I can give him, though they need not be such as to excite any jealousy on the part of Mr. Walpole. They must only be such as to ensure him an introduction to the ministers in person, though accompanied, whenever it is wished, by our Minister. Ramsay is the last man to use his power in a manner that could give any offence.

"Should this first attempt succeed, and the jealousy entertained of French corps be found to be a prejudice, it is probable that the force to be furnished in this way may extend to something very considerable, and produce a body of troops at the head of which it may be right to put some one of higher authority. A body of six or seven thousand men, headed by good French officers, would go a great way in the defence of Portugal. It is always, too, with me a secondary, but not immaterial consideration, that it spares the dreadful example of casting out, without the slightest means of subsistence, the remains of that body of people who have sacrificed everything to their attachment to royalty.

"I mentioned to your Lordship the business of Antony. If you think it worth while, it would be easy to seize the papers of one of the persons whom he is said to have engaged, and who is going for Hamburg in a day or two; though I don't know that more is likely to be discovered than that Antony is a double spy, and that many persons here, having no means of subsistence, are willing to enter into France upon any terms—which is a proceeding that, as it seems to me, can neither be prevented nor blamed."

C. BENTINCK to C. GODDARD.

1796, September 13, Varel.—"I mentioned in my last, of the 9th instant, the reports which prevail in our neighbourhood of the King of Prussia having acknowledged the Batavian Republic. These reports seem to gain credit; they are again mentioned in our last letters with the addition of Prussia's having acceded to the alliance of the French and Batavian Republics. Some of the fugitive representatives of Friesland are gone to Paris, others are at Groningen and in this neighbourhood. It is from the correspondence of these people that these reports seem to originate. It is added that the conditions are not to their taste, and they seem out of humour. However this may be, and whether the whole be a fiction or not, it gives great uneasiness to the well-intentioned, at least to all our friends, who do not expect in that case that the deliverance of the country will so soon take place, or if it should apparently, that in reality their situation would be at all changed for the better. I cannot help translating word for word the passage with which one of our friends concludes his last letter. He says: 'Our situation becomes daily more critical, and should our deliverance really take place shortly, it will by no means be complete or satisfactory. Our letters from ——— and other circumstances make me think that, if anything is passing or should be concluded between France and Prussia apparently for the advantage of our Republic, this will happen without the knowledge of the Prince, without the co-operation of England; and that by their giving the Hereditary Prince a part of Brabant, it will be with the object to tear us from our old and faithful ally England, which is of so much importance to us. Thus our commerce and navigation will be annihilated, and we shall lose our possessions in the East and West, and we shall be forced to look for ever after for safety and protection to the authors of all our misfortunes, and the common enemy of all Europe. This wretched prospect makes me quite desponding. God grant my apprehensions may be ungrounded.' By this passage you may see that the reports I allude to gain credit; and by this language, which is that of all those within the country we have any communication with, you may see at the same time to what quarter they steadfastly look for the return of order and prosperity. At the same time, no authentic accounts we have lead us to countenance rumours of this nature, which, if founded, would again put off any immediate hopes we might otherwise have of affairs taking a more favourable turn; though we should not, even in case of their being founded, despair of the final issue of the contest being fatal to the supporters of a system we think so contrary to the real interest of the country. I thought it right to state all this, though I am not fond in general of repeating all the various reports that are in circulation.

"Our last letters mention again the breaking up of the camps in the neighbouring provinces of the Republic, and some of the troops have been dispersed into the provinces of Overijssel, Friesland, and Groningen.

"The decree for setting aside the established religion occasions the greatest discontent, and is but slowly carried into execution in some of the provinces.

"I mentioned in mine of the 19th August to Lord Grenville some circumstances relating to a correspondence with Amsterdam, and our answer to some of their communications. We have since heard, and the answer I am happy to say has been found satisfactory, and produced a good effect.

"I shall continue to write very regularly, though I do not receive any communications from England, which would, however, be of great service at this moment to direct me. I shall go on to the best of my judgment, begging this to be shown."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 15, Hollwood.—"A direction was sent from the Treasury yesterday to the Commissioners of the Customs, to let no Spanish vessels quit our ports till farther order. The only regular step is certainly an Order of the King in Council for an embargo. And I rather doubt whether the formality of a letter from the Secretary of State—which will not, in fact, be a sufficient authority—is not better avoided. I state this, however, only as a doubt; and if, on considering it, you remain of your former opinion, I should wish you to send the letter.

"Any of the persons in your list would do perfectly for a mover or seconder. The best chance, I think, would be Lord Exeter, and Lord de Dunsterville. I do not recollect any separate sum being lately destined for Puisaye, except 3,000*l.* which was advanced to Windham,

I think about a fortnight ago. A letter was sent to him at the same time releasing him from any obligation he might conceive himself under to remain in France. If any farther advance to a moderate amount seems necessary, and Tryon can point out safe means of conveying it, there certainly can be no difficulty in giving it.

"I left directions last week to enquire about the stamper, but in the number of things yesterday omitted to ask for the result. Lord Buckingham's offer sets an example which, if followed, would have the best effect; but I am unwilling to suggest any specific mode till some general plan is digested for giving such efforts as much effect as possible."

C. BENTINCK to C. GODDARD.

1796, September 16, Varei.—"A friend of ours, who came here within these few days mentions that there are not above four or five thousand French troops within the frontiers of the United Provinces. He mentions that even a part of the weak garrisons of Amsterdam and the Hague had been marched away, notwithstanding the representations made by the Government against this step, more particularly with respect to the latter place. A great many seamen had been punished on board the Dutch ships for expressing too loudly their attachment to the House of Orange. The greatest animosity subsists between the French and the armed citizens, whom the former treat with contempt. In Amsterdam some people openly rejoice at the disasters of the French, and with impunity. Our friend, during his stay there, was at a club where the Orange party meet. There were about a hundred persons in the room, when one of the members came in mentioning loudly the late successes of the Austrians with great demonstrations of joy. Our friend even expressed his apprehensions to some of them that they might get into a scrape by their want of caution.

"C. L. Byma writes to Staal, a Friesland patriot, that the reign of the patriots is over, that he expects, however, they may be allowed to remain quietly at home; and he is said to be a sanguine man, and the last who loses all hope.

"Blann, the ex-minister at Paris, has written, they say, to one of his correspondents that the French Directory is quite under Prussian influence; that it is to this influence and to his aversion to the old Government he attributes the ill-usage he has met with at Paris.

"This is all I have to say for the present. Our friends continue firm, though in our neighbourhood every measure is taken to intimidate them, above sixty persons being at this moment in prison on various pretences, though we have not to reproach ourselves any of them are owing to any imprudence on our part; but it is the natural consequence of the situation the country is in and of the too sanguine disposition of many individuals who will not listen to the cautions given them. We are not without great hope that these arrestations will not continue long, for many reasons which it would be too long to detail. We flatter ourselves the brilliant successes the Austrians have lately had, which we have heard many details of this day, will make the usurpers more mild in their proceedings than they might otherwise be.

"I heard to-day from the person who left a letter for me lately, and whom I hoped to have had the pleasure of seeing; but, as he is on his journey home, and has fixed no place for meeting, I must give up that hope, however reluctantly. I flatter myself, however, I may receive a few lines from some of my friends, which may make up for the disappointment."

LORD GRENVILLE to the EARL OF ELGIN.

1796, September 18, Dropmore.—“I have the greatest hopes that the account respecting Colonel Craufurd may not be confirmed. But if it should unfortunately be true, I am afraid that it would be impossible for me to recommend Captain Anstruther to succeed to the station which Colonel Craufurd filled; and which, as you will easily suppose, is one which is more sought after than almost any other employment the King has to give.”

C. BENTINCK to C. GODDARD.

1796, September 20, Varel.—“What we have heard since I wrote last (September 16) confirms what I have said of the measures taken within the Provinces to prevent any foreign correspondence hostile to the National Convention; and it seems a very serious alarm prevails amongst the usurpers and their adherents, by the plan of a requisition of all the inhabitants between 18 and 40, that they may be armed; an expedient, however, which, in the present disposition of the country, will give but little security to the new Government. All persons coming into the Provinces are of late very strictly examined, at least on this frontier; a Prussian postillion having, within these few days, been stripped at the Neuwe-Schantz, that his clothes might be searched.

“Huber, one of the former Friesland representatives, writes from Paris that an agreement has been concluded there with respect to the Seven Provinces between France and Prussia, very contrary to the wishes of the new Government of those Provinces. The letter where this is said has been intercepted by some of the Committees. This, and other reports of the same nature which I have noticed in former letters, may account for their suspicions; and I hope the late successes of the Austrians, and their further progress, may produce still more serious apprehensions and consequences than what may result from the intricate and equivocal conduct of the Prussian Government.

“We are under considerable anxiety at this moment for one of our friends, and for a person he employed at different times to forward letters to the person who is here, and whom I have so frequently mentioned. They have both been taken up. I know not the particulars as yet, nor do I know whether this happened on mere suspicions, as was once the case before, without any further consequences, or whether any letter have been found; at any rate, I flatter myself there will be means to prevent any serious mischief. The arrestation of these two persons has made it advisable for two of our friends to absent themselves for a time, till they hear how the matter turns out. They took care to give notice to all those it might concern, that they might be on their guard; and though these two persons will certainly be missed, we have reason to flatter ourselves this unpleasant incident will neither create confusion, nor interrupt the communications we receive from time to time. I shall be very anxious until the persons in question have got safely through this business, but I am as ready as ever to take upon me any share or the whole blame of what we may have done here, as what has happened is the natural consequence of the situation the country is in, and of too much zeal and too much contempt for their adversaries on the part of the persons in question; though I have certainly cautioned them often enough, and prevented things of this sort from happening more frequently. The persons most concerned have immediately applied to our friend here for advice, and he is exerting himself to set all to rights again. I am very impatient to know that all is ended well; and, in the meantime, I thought it right to say so much on the subject for fear of misrepresentations.

"Having been deprived of the pleasure of seeing Mr. [Hammond] as I mentioned in my last, it will not appear surprising I should be more impatient than ever to hear from my friends in England, and to know more particularly from what quarter we are to expect external support. The favourable turn military operations have taken of late give me some hopes that the expectations I had formed when I left England may still be likely to be in part realized. Should the moment arrive we have so long wished for, it may be very necessary we should know (1) what external force is likely to march to that part of the country we have chiefly directed your attention to; (2) that we should have some direct communication with the person who commands. These are two points you may very likely clear up. Our friend wrote to Prince Frederick (by the channel the Prince pointed out) in June last, at my request, to say that he was ready at any time that Prince might wish it, to send him any information within his reach. Our friend had lately the pleasure of receiving a line in answer from the Prince, dated Amberg, August 13th. This letter only came last Friday, the 16th instant, so that it was above a month coming. This seems strange, and our friend here has had no letters since the 24th ultimo from his correspondent who is at Brunswick, though many circumstances have occurred in the interval well worth taking some notice of, at least no less so than many that were in the preceding letters of the correspondent in question. I am at a loss how to account for this silence, and for the delay in forwarding Prince Frederick's letter; and this makes me the more desirous of receiving some answer from my friends upon the two points I have laid some stress upon in this letter. In the meantime to prevent any inconveniency arising from similar delays whether accidental or intentional, which I shall not pretend to determine, and as Prince Frederick asks for the information offered, we have agreed our friend should send his letters to Prince Frederick by another channel, by which they will, I hope, go more expeditiously. I cannot help wishing for my part, that I was referred to some leading person acting with the external force to which we are to direct our attention, that I had even a letter for that person to make use of at my option should the moment come, and that I may thus be assured of receiving from time to time the necessary communications. At the same time I beg again to assure those who have placed confidence in me, that I do not wish to attach any very great importance to our proceedings; but, as far as they go, I could wish not to omit mentioning any circumstance which is likely to contribute to our success; and I cannot help repeating again, what I have said in former letters, that we are confident we could extend our plan a great deal further, and indeed to most parts of the Republic, if we received orders to that purpose, and the means were given our friends as I have stated before now. If our offers are not accepted of, and even if we receive no answer, we shall rest satisfied with having done our duty by saying all we thought necessary; and with the hopes that measures have been taken with the same view, to which our efforts will be made subservient, and which make it useless we should go beyond the limits we have been obliged to confine ourselves to. I must refer again to what I have said in former letters on that subject, and on our wishes that our conduct should at all times meet with the approbation of the persons in England who must at all events, sooner or later, contribute so essentially to re-establish the House of Orange in their former authority; and the Republic on a footing compatible with the real interests of the country, and with the honour of that House which is inseparable from them. Our friends within the country are entitled to the highest commendations for their perseverance and good humour under the many delays and disappointments they have experienced, and the personal risk which attends their situation. I speak only of the parts of the country I have chiefly alluded to, though I am very far from wishing to take away from the merit of others.

"The last accounts of the Austrian army continue to be equally favourable. I see by the Times, a paper we receive here, that Mr. Thomas Grenville is going to Paris; if anybody is really going, I am happy he is the person."

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE.

NOTE.

"D'après la note qui m'a été communiquée, il paraît que mes propositions n'ont pas été comprises.

"J'ai offert de faire admettre les propositions qui pourront être faites (pourvu qu'elles reposent sur des bases acceptables dans les circonstances actuelles) en remplissant vis-à-vis de moi la totalité des conditions dont j'ai fait l'ouverture à Mr. ———.

"Je n'ai aucune autorisation avouée, ni mission ad hoc. J'ai seulement la persuasion de réussir dans ce que j'entreprendrais.

French.

Endorsed.

Received this through Mr. Dundas, September 21, 1796.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 22, Kew.—"I sincerely rejoice at the continuance of the good accounts of the Austrians, which must soon annihilate the French army, which has been sowing destruction in Germany."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, September 23, Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to transmit to your Majesty a letter which Count Wedel has this morning delivered to him, and also the copy of dispatch from the Danish Chargé des Affaires at Paris, which Count Wedel left with him. Notwithstanding the insolent tone of the answer received, there is an ambiguity in the purport of that answer which seems to create some difficulty as to the manner in which it ought to be considered, so as to leave no pretext or subterfuge to those who may wish to mis-represent the subject here. Your Majesty's servants are to meet this morning, and Lord Grenville will have the honour to submit to your Majesty such ideas as may, on discussion, occur to them."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 23, Windsor.—"After the highly insolent answer to the Danish Chargé d'Affaires on our demand for a passport that a person may be sent to treat at Paris, I cannot suppose any one can be so lost to the sentiments of self-respectability to think any other measure necessary than the letting Parliament know the offensive turn given to what some might think an humiliating step taken by this country ; if such a communication will not rouse the British lion he must have lost his wonted energy."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, September 23, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to acquaint your Majesty, that your Majesty's servants, in considering the answer received from France, thought it would be of the utmost importance to bring to a distinct issue the ambiguous and evasive manner in which the Directory has couched its insolent refusal of a passport ; in order to leave no room for those misinterpretations by which attempts will certainly be made to deceive the people of this country into opinions inconsistent with the safety of any independent state. Every step that can conduce to this object is of such infinite importance in the present situation of affairs that no considerations but those of great and material interests ought to be opposed to it. Under this impression the note has been prepared which Lord Grenville has now the honour to submit to your Majesty, and which it is proposed to send by a flag of truce directly to France. There can be little expectation that a measure of this nature can now conduce to the re-establishment of peace, which the present dispositions of the Directory appear to set at a great distance. But it will clearly prove the existence of those dispositions, and will, in that respect, be highly advantageous to the interests of your Majesty's dominions. Such at least is the best opinion which Lord Grenville has been able to form, and which he now ventures most respectfully to submit to your Majesty's consideration."

P. BOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, September 24, Philadelphia.—"When I had the honour of transmitting to your Lordship, by the last mail, that part of the debate which was then published, upon the subject of the treaty with Great Britain, I did not apprehend that I should, so soon, have the satisfaction to enclose the sequel of that interesting debate to your Lordship. It has just made its appearance, and I take the earliest means of conveying it to your Lordship.

"I also beg leave to enclose to your Lordship the address of the President to the people of the United States, apprizing them of his intention to retire from public life."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 24, Windsor.—"As Lord Grenville and Mr. Pitt think a farther step of humiliation necessary to call forth that spirit which used to be characteristic of this island, I will not object to the proposed declaration being sent by a flag of truce."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1796], September 25 [Stowe].—"I am recovering and if good news can make me well you have taken care to contribute to it. If Jourdan is indeed driven across the Rhine, I cannot imagine how Moreau is to get back from Munich to Bale, Brisack, or Strasburgh; and yet at one of those places he must cross the Rhine, for he cannot dream of falling back into Wurmser's line of retreat, with the Austrians pressing on his rear, and the garrisons of Manheim and Philipburgh pressing on his flank. As to Bonaparte, I am satisfied that he cannot advance whether Moreau be pushed or not; for he is not, and cannot be, prepared to garrison Italy against a revolt and against Naples. Surely some operation might be attempted while we remain masters of the sea, by transporting Neapolitan troops in aid of our own to make a diversion on the coast, and by that to assist Wurmser."

"I have writ a long letter to my brother Tom respecting the plan which I have so much at heart. I am happy to find that you feel the importance of it as much as I do. I am every hour (and I study it every hour) more satisfied of its practicability even without troops, though there is no difficulty in collecting 1,000 men from Chatham, and embarking them in two India ships fitted as transports, and now in the river; and these troops might receive orders for Ireland, or for Scotland, and might sail under those ideas. I see more advantages from the attempt even if it should fail than I can venture to commit to paper; but I think that my friend is sure of forcing his way, and equally sure of his retreat with the troops, and less so (though not hopelessly so) without them; and this is my idea after every consideration I can give to it.

"After these details, I hope you are satisfied with Frogatt's embassy. Part of your arrangements have depended upon my son, to whom I have explained my wish for your accommodation, and nothing could be more kind."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, September 29, Windsor.—"I am much pleased with the account from Leipzig transmitted by Lord Grenville as it so fully states that General Moreau has been defeated on the 11th of this month at Munich, which seems also by what [we] have heard, to be accompanied with further successes of the Archduke on the banks of the Lahn. I cannot but help flattering myself that Divine Providence has employed the wicked French as much as it thinks necessary, and that we shall now [see] that nation meet with the fate which has on former occasions [befallen] those who have adopted such depraved ways."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, October 2, Wimbledon.—"I have your note enclosing the paper respecting the militia, which I understand to be from Lord Buckingham. I shall take an early opportunity of speaking with the Duke of York on the subject of it, after which I would wish to have a private conversation with your brother, at which Mr. Pitt ought to be present. If he is much occupied at the moment, I shall meet with Lord Buckingham myself. Government will, in my opinion, be liable to just censure, if they do not, very early indeed after the meeting of Parliament, state to Parliament for the satisfaction of the public what is intended for the internal safety of the country. If satisfaction is not given on that point, it will be in vain to look for either approbation or support in the conduct of any operations abroad. At the same time you are aware that all discussions and propositions respecting the militia belong to the Duke of Portland's Department, and, of course, I must be delicate in encroaching upon it."

— to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, October 5, Vienna.—“I took the liberty of troubling your Lordship frequently from Berlin. Appearances have mended much since that period, and I can venture now to offer my congratulations on the success of the campaign. Prince Charles has done well, and if those opposed to Moreau act with as much judgment and vigour, he will not be able to escape. At least he must suffer much loss. The Imperial armies may yet repossess themselves of the Low Countries this autumn, and being masters in the field, may even take by blockade some of the French fortresses, which are in general, I believe, unprovided with magazines. It is not however my object to consider these circumstances, or conjecture probable events, but to communicate an observation I have frequently had occasion to make. Your enemies spread everywhere the idea that you oppose a pacification with a view to aggrandize yourselves in the two Indias, regardless of the blood lavished on the continent of Europe. This, as you will easily suppose, excites ill will; but yet, from the nature of your Government, you are led to insist in Parliament on the advantages gained by the British nation, and to show that these result from diversions made by its allies. Such arguments are turned against you abroad, and become the excuse of those who have abandoned you. They are made use of here to render the war unpopular, and with such success, that, if public opinion were of much weight, the Court would have been greatly embarrassed. In the Seven Years’ War English enthusiasm was raised by the danger of the Protestant interest, and of its immaculate hero, the King of Prussia. At an earlier period the beautiful, persecuted, magnanimous Maria Theresa was the object of adoration. But in these cold calculating days it is not easy to stimulate exertion at home without exciting envy abroad. You best can judge whether it be prudent, after insisting that the war in its prosecution as in its origin has been defensive, to declare that the principal object of it now is to protect the German Empire and the Low Countries. That the dearest interests of Britain are eventually connected with that defence and protection. That far from ambitious views, you look only to the security of yourselves as the result of that security you seek for others. That a faction, aided by French armies, having turned against you the resources of Holland, you had been compelled for the defence of your Oriental possessions to seize those posts from whence they would otherwise have been annoyed. That in like manner you had been obliged to attack the French islands for the purpose of saving your own, not merely from capture but from utter devastation. Such declarations would have a good effect throughout Germany, already undeceived with respect to the French possessions. Moreover, should you be embroiled with Spain, it would strengthen you in the North to declare, after dwelling on the unprovoked aggression of his Catholic Majesty, that it justifies you in demanding (as a condition of peace) that he open his American dominions to the commerce of all who now are, or hereafter may, be joined with you in the war against him. This kind of crusade will not indeed be so wonderful as that which was produced by the preaching of Peter the Hermit, but it may answer better purposes.”

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, October 5, St. James’s.—“If Lord Grenville on consulting Mr. Pitt shall, on the whole, think Lord Malmesbury’s situation in this country not too elevated for treating with the French Convention, I shall not obstruct his being sounded with regard to the Commission, but should not think he will accept it."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, October 6, Kew.—"It is with infinite satisfaction I learn from Lord Grenville's note that Earl Bathurst so eminently distinguished himself in moving the last afternoon the address in the House of Lords; his talents are certainly known [to] those that are acquainted with him; if he can conquer his natural diffidence he cannot fail of making that figure which would be particularly agreeable to me from my regard for the memory of his grandfather."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1796, October], London.—"Ayant vu Monsieur Pitt depuis que j'ai eu l'honneur de vous écrire mon billet ce matin, je ne chercherai pas à vous tourmenter inutilement à moins que vous ne me donniez des ordres vous-même; mais je serai cependant bien aise de vous entretenir avant Vendredi. M. Pitt juge qu'il est utile de faire parvenir à Vienne aussi promptement que possible des paroles de consolation et d'amitié, qui expliquent en même temps pourquoi l'emprunt Impérial n'est pas arrêté, en annonçant qu'il le sera vraisemblablement bientôt. Si vous n'aviez pas le projet d'envoyer un courier Vendredi à Vienne, j'en expédierai un. Sinon je profiterai du vôtre, ce que je préférerai, parceque nous sommes de pauvres gens."

French.

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, October 14, London.—"I have to apologize to you for not having mentioned this morning how much it was in my wishes to take with me a confidential friend to Paris, but I was then far from being sure that Mr. George Ellis, the only person in whom I could place entire confidence, and who has so often been with me on similar occasions, could or would accompany me; he has since very kindly consented to do it, and I do not now lose a moment in entreating your Lordship's permission to be allowed to entrust him so far with the great objects of my mission as to enable me to have recourse to his opinion and judgment on those many points of difficulty and dilemma which must inevitably come in the course of it, and on which I should otherwise be compelled to act without any reference or consultation whatever.

"It will be of such real and, I may say, necessary comfort to me to have a person on whose friendship I can entirely depend, and to whose tried judgment and ability I can recur, at the same time that it would add so greatly to my hopes of acting in a manner conformable to the spirit of the instructions you have given me, that I am sure you will not think my feelings as an individual extraordinary, or my request as a servant of the public unreasonable.

"I need hardly explain to you that Mr. Ellis will go on no other capacity than as my private friend; but even in this light I should perhaps have had some scruple to mention him to your Lordship at this last moment of my stay in England, had I not this evening had an opportunity of seeing Mr. Pitt, and of receiving from him assurances that I might do it without hesitation, and that he was confident you would be good enough not to object to an arrangement so essential to my comfort."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

1796, October 16, Dropmore.—"As I think that this may probably still overtake you at Dover, I write to say that we have received dispatches from Vienna, the tenor of which, though not unsatisfactory as to the spirit of union and concert with his Majesty which prevails there, still leaves us in much uncertainty with respect to the objects which that Court may preferably urge in case of detailed negotiations for peace. In this state I do not think it useful to add anything to your instructions, but I would not leave you unapprized of the circumstance, as the knowledge of it will naturally induce you to use, if possible, still more care than you would otherwise have done, not to let any hint or insinuation drop from you that may have the remotest tendency to commit us in this respect. It is perhaps unnecessary for me to recall to your recollection that, by the convention signed with the Court of Vienna in the beginning of the war, the King is bound not to make peace without the consent of Austria, except on the terms of procuring for that power the restitution of all it may have lost in the war. I mention this to you merely as a thing to be kept in your own mind; the effect and application of this stipulation to the present state of things must be matter of detailed instruction to you if the negotiation proceeds."

Copy.

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, October 17, Dover.—"I have this moment received your letter of yesterday's date from Dropmore. I had prepared everything for sailing at ten o'clock this morning when the tide serves, and as you find no reasons in the dispatches from Vienna to delay my departure or alter my instructions, I shall (unless the wind changes) leave this place at that hour, and, I hope, reach Calais before the evening.

"I shall bear carefully on my mind what you say to me relative to the engagements we contracted with the Court of Vienna at the beginning of the present war, and also to what appears to be the present feelings and temper of that Court. On this and any other point I will act up to the best of my judgment, and endeavour to obey your instructions to the utmost of my power."

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, October 18, Calais.—"I have told strictly the truth in my official letter. My reception here has been, on the part of every person employed by the French Government, as civil and, I may say, as full of attention to the character with which I am invested as it could possibly have been before the Revolution. They were even studious in their expressions of respect, and the first thing said to me was 'Quoique c'est l'usage de conduire tous ceux qui arrivent chez le Commandant de la place, cependant, par respect pour votre caractère, nous avons reçu des ordres de venir chez vous demander votre passeport, et faire tels arrangements que vous jugeriez convenable pour faciliter votre prompt arrivée à Paris.'"

"The only safe inference which can be drawn from this kind of reception here is that my mission is not likely, as far as relates to the common forms of reception, to be attended with any disagreeable circumstances, as it is to be presumed that the Directory themselves will not at Paris act in contradiction to the orders they have given here.

"I intend sending on immediately some of the persons with me to prepare for me apartments at Paris, where I expect to be myself on Friday. My correspondence from thence shall begin as soon, and be as regular, as is in my power."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, October 19, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has the honour most humbly to submit to your Majesty a minute of the opinion of your Majesty's confidential servants on the measures to be taken under the present circumstances respecting the Mediterranean fleet and the island of Corsica. If the idea which is there very generally stated should receive your Majesty's most gracious approbation, Lord Grenville will lose no time in sending off the necessary dispatches to Naples, Vienna, and Petersburg, meaning, however, to open the latter part of the plan in the first instance to the Court of Petersburg only."

Copy.

Enclosure.

1796, October 19, Cleveland Row.—"At a meeting of his Majesty's confidential servants at Earl Spencer's.

"Present.

"The Lord Chancellor.
Duke of Portland.
Earl Spencer.
Earl of Liverpool.

Mr. Pitt.
Mr. Secretary Dundas.
Mr. Windham.
Lord Grenville.

"It was determined that it should be humbly submitted to his Majesty as the unanimous advice of this meeting, that in the present state of Italy it is expedient that his Majesty's fleet should be continued in the Mediterranean, and that the measures for the evacuation of Corsica should be suspended.

"And that a proposal should immediately be made to the Court of Petersburg that proper measures should be taken in concert by his Majesty and the Empress, for obtaining the consent of the people of that island to transfer the sovereignty thereof to the Empress, on such conditions as may secure to the commerce of his Majesty's subjects in peace, and to his fleets in time of war, those advantages which his Majesty's situation there entitles him in such case to demand from the Empress; and as may also provide for the interests and prosperity of the island."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, October 20, Kew.—"Lord Grenville; I never received a minute of Cabinet that more heartily met with my approbation than [than?] the one now before me for ceding Corsica to Russia; I know the object is a favourite one of the Empress, and therefore I am of opinion care should not only be taken to secure the ports being at all times kept open for us, and that our trade shall be favoured over all other nations as to ease of port duties, but it should secure an additional fleet of ships for prosecuting the war."

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

Private.

1796, October 21, Cleveland Row.—"A duplicate of the despatches which I send this day by your servant will be delivered to you by Mr. Eaton, who proceeds in a cutter to Elsinore. I have thought that the services of this gentleman might, in the present moment, be very useful to you, particularly with respect to the execution of any of the secret measures alluded to in one of those letters. I trust however that zeal in this respect will be tempered with due discretion. I have also authorized him to hold general language of the King's disposition to unite his interests entirely with those of the Empress. But I trust that both you and he will feel that there is a wide difference between the most faithful execution of those assurances to their utmost extent, and the taking any express or implied engagements to become parties in offensive measures against powers or states of whom the King has no cause to complain.

"My wish was to have named Mr. Eaton to the Secretaryship of Legation at Petersburg, but I am embarrassed with some engagements that I know not well how to arrange in the present moment, though I think it likely that this nomination will ultimately be made."

Copy.

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, October 23, Paris.—"I hope that I have proceeded thus far in my mission without mistake or blunder, but I confess I have the feeling of an unsteady head on the edge of a high precipice.

"I must entreat of you not to be disappointed if I do not send you early intelligence as to the state and temper of this country; you may rely on my being most assiduous to obtain safe and accurate information, but, without being on the spot it is difficult to form an idea how impossible it is to select the true from the false.

"If I was absolutely compelled to give an opinion, I should say the negotiation would go on, but I should be most sorry to be bound by such an opinion.

"The wearing of the national cockade is so universal in the streets and so unpleasantly enforced by the populace that it is impossible to appear in them without it; the Government by no means insist upon it, and certainly it never shall be worn by any persons belonging to me when I am acting in an official capacity. But it would inevitably make them and me liable to the most disagreeable species of insult were they not to put it on when they walk out in a morning.

"The weakness of this Government, when opposed to the temper of the people, is such that, was such an event to happen, it would not be in their power to give me satisfactory redress; and I trust I do not judge wrong in supposing that, by exposing myself to it, much more serious and degrading consequences might be produced, than by the simply conforming to a general usage, presented by popular custom and not at all dictated by the Government.

"I have not yet seen Del Campo. But as I find Mr. Talbot (with whom I have every reason to be satisfied) is well acquainted with him,

I shall endeavour through him to discover the degree of credit he is in here and the part he is acting.

"From my receiving so early an answer from M. de la Croix, it is evident they are in a hurry either to begin the negotiation or to send me from Paris."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, October 26, York Farm.—"J'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer, ci-joint, la copie d'une lettre que M. de Müller a reçu d'un de ses amis actuellement aux Pays-Bas. Il va sans dire que si vous faites quelquel usage de ces renseignemens, vous voudrez bien ne pas nous compromettre vis-à-vis de notre Cour en disant que vous les avez reçû de nous. Quoiqu'il en soit, il semble d'après le contenu de cette lettre que les Flamands sont, on ne peut pas plus, fatigués du joug des Français, et, en même temps, au moment de se résigner à recevoir le dernier coup qui doit les accabler, si on ne le prévient pas par une mesure quelconque. Il me serait impossible sans ordre préalable de ma Cour de prendre vis-à-vis d'eux le moindre engagement; mais n'y aurait-il pas moyen de leur faire entendre sous main que l'Angleterre prendra tous les moyens possibles pour les faire rentrer sous la seule domination que puisse convenir à leurs intérêts? Cette espèce d'assurance donnée actuellement, jointe à l'exaltation et à l'espérance fondée que leur inspirent les succès de l'Archiduc, encourageraient l'énergie prête à se déployer, et les empêcheraient au moins de céder immédiatement aux instances, jusqu'à présent sans menaces, que le Directoire Français fait pour l'exécution du décret qui ordonne la sécularisation des biens du clergé. Vous n'ignorez pas que la réalisation de cet arrêt est celle de l'extinction totale d'une des premières ressources de ce bon pays, qu'on s'est toujours obstiné à méconnaître à Vienne, depuis les fautes de Joseph II.

"J'attendrai votre réponse pour donner des espérances à ceux qui en attendent. Je pourrai me servir utilement à cet effet des mêmes personnes auxquelles j'ai écrit dernièrement, et dont les détails sur l'état et les dispositions véritables du peuple Belge seront encore plus authentiques que ceux que vous recevez aujourd'hui. Mais daignez songer qu'il est urgent de ne pas perdre de temps si on veut prévenir des malheurs réels qui reflueront indubitablement sur le futur possesseur de la Belgique.

Songez, en lisant ceci, que c'est un ami qui écrit à son ami, qui veut comme lui le bien de la maison d'Autriche, auquel elle ne songe pas encore elle-même.

— to BARON DE MÜLLER.

"J'ai eu l'honneur de vous parler des nouvelles apportées par deux exprès des Pays-Bas; ils étaient adressés aux principaux agens du clergé Belgique, stationnés en deçà du Rhin. J'eus l'occasion de rencontrer ici leur chef, le chanoine de St. Gudule Vaudorselaer, connu par le rôle qu'il a joué lors de la révolution Brabançonne. Je m'entretins avec lui. Il me dit que la mission de ses exprès avait pour objet de l'informer ainsi que ses collègues de la suppression du clergé régulier aux Pays-Bas. Il me fit beaucoup d'observations sur cet événement. Voici celle qui m'a paru la plus importante sous le rapport politique. La vente, m'a-t-il dit, que le Directoire a résolu de faire incessamment des biens du clergé, par petites parties et à vil prix, fixera, si elle a lieu, la majorité des Belges, bien pensans encore, à la cause de la Révolution Française, par le motif le plus fort aux Pays-Bas, par celui de l'intérêt. Ces biens, poursuivait-il, ne manqueront pas d'acquéreurs ; la diminution générale des fortunes, la quantité immense de papiers Français dont les Belges sont pourvus, le besoin et l'occasion de trouver des indemnités faciliteront l'aliénation des possessions ecclésiastiques, aliénation secondée d'ailleurs par le silence et le peu d'intérêt de la Cour de Vienne à l'égard des Pays-Bas. L'indifférence de la Cour, ajouta-t-il, empêchait bien des Belges à se conduire en vrais prosélites de la bonne cause ; il ne se dissimula cependant point que la Cour pouvait avoir des raisons d'en agir ainsi ; mais, suivant lui, rien ne s'opposait à ce qu'elle fit sentir indirectement aux Belges, dans quelques pièces officielles et publiques, qu'elle les considérait encore comme ses sujets, qu'elle s'intéresse à leur sort. L'Angleterre, continua-t-il, par un disposition plus relative à son intérêt mercantile, qu' à toute autre circonstance, savoir, par celle qui autorise le commerce entre les Iles Britanniques et les Provinces Unies, à reveillé dans celles-ci tous ses partisans, et tous ceux du Prince Stadthouder.

“ Dans le cours de mon entretien avec ce chanoine, j'ai pu remarquer aussi qu'il était chargé d'une correspondance avec quelqu' agent du clergé Belgique à Rome. Je ne puis plus douter qu'il n'ait la commission de tenir exactement ses committans au courant des nouvelles des armées Autrichiennes. J'eus l'occasion de presumer le plan de conduite que s'est prescrit, dans ces circonstances, le clergé des Pays Bas. Il paraît décidé à s'opposer autant qu'il le pourra indirectement à l'exécution de la suppression, il s'attend que ses efforts à cet égard seront inutiles, et, dans ce cas, il empêchera et retardera autant que possible les ventes ; qu'il est résolu du suivre et d'observer avec attention, disposé à saisir avec empressement le premier instant opportun pour se réintégrer dans les possessions qu'on lui aurait ravies. Déjà il s'occupe d'allarmer les classes du peuple sur leurs propres intérêts par de nombreuses affiches et billets, et je sais qu' il regrette qu'aucun personnage marquant ne veuille se mettre à la tête des mécontents qu'il forme. ‘L'or pourrait en armer beaucoup,’ me dit le chanoine, ‘mais le tout devrait être combiné avec la Cour. Comment le faire ?’ ajoutait-il, ‘la Cour accueillerait-elle nos démarches ? La route de Vienne nous est fermée ; il n'y a plus de chancellerie des Pays-Bas ; l'Archiduc n'annonce plus de mission à traiter avec nous ; il a effacé de ses titres celui de Gouverneur-Général des Pays-Bas. Il y aurait de l'inconvénient de traiter directement avec le militaire’ ; il s'échappa d'avantage. ‘Je suis connu’ dit-il, ‘des plusieurs membres du Gouvernement qui sont à Vienne : je n'hésiterais point de traiter avec ces Messieurs.’ Il s'étendit en outre sur l'effet avantageux à la coalition qui produirait une descente de la part des Anglais sur les côtes de la Flandre, presque dégarnie de défense dans ce moment ; mais il faudrait, selon lui, qu'elle se fit d'accord avec l'Archiduc, et avec des moyens capables d'inspirer de la confiance aux Belges disposés dans cet instant à tout entreprendre pour secouer le joug des Français, et ne différants de le faire que par l'incertitude où ils sont d'être puissamment secourus. Je vis bien que son intention était que je fis connaître ce qu'il me disait, quoiqu'il affecta de me parler confidentiellement ; je ne néglige donc point de vous en instruire.”

French. Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, October 27, Windsor.—“The dispatches which Lord Grenville received in the night from Lord Malmesbury and which he has now sent to me, certainly give not the smallest insight as to whether the negotiation will be commenced or whether it may not be instantly broken off; if I could allow myself to form any opinion where I will do the author justice, no ground for any seems to be given; I should think there seems too much reserve, unnatural to a Frenchman, for any intention to remain behind of entering into negotiation."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, October 31, Windsor.--"I have perused the dispatches arrived this morning from Lord Malmesbury which Lord Grenville has forwarded to me. I perfectly concur in the opinion that there is not the smallest appearance of the negotiation advancing, which, as I never thought the present an advantageous moment for concluding peace, cannot but give me pleasure."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 6, Windsor.--"The last evening I received the inclosed paper from Lieutenant-General Harcourt, which had been sent to him from Scotland for my perusal by that busy man Sir John Hippesley. I should not have taken notice of any paper through that channel, as I did on a late occasion, when to my great surprise, through Major-General Manners, he communicated to me the retreat of the French out of the Duchy of Wurtemberg, but as by this paper Lord Grenville will see not only that Baron Reiger is to arrive in the course of this month to conclude the treaty of marriage, but that the Hereditary Prince proposes to be, the 13th of December, at Hamburgh. As to the former there can be no objection to it, as the business need not be hurried; but I desire Lord Grenville will write to the Hereditary Prince at Vienna, that the season of the year is too boisterous for me to wish his risking to come over till towards the end of April, for that I could by no means think of permitting my daughter, who is an uncommon bad sailor, to embark till in the month of May; and his so long stay in this country could but be inconvenient to all parties."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, November 6, Cleveland Row.--"Lord Grenville has been honoured with your Majesty's commands respecting the letter to Sir John Hippesley on the subject of the proposed journey of the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg. He has the honour humbly to acquaint your Majesty that he received yesterday a letter from Baron Reiger, announcing his arrival and desiring to see Lord Grenville for the purpose of presenting to him the copy of his credentials. Lord Grenville had appointed to-morrow morning for the visit, and he will, if your Majesty should be pleased to approve of it, take that opportunity of making the communication directed by your Majesty, which he humbly submits might be better made in that manner than by a letter, as M. de Reiger is now here. If, however, your Majesty should judge it otherwise, Lord Grenville will not fail to write on Tuesday in obedience to your Majesty's commands."

————— to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 6, Vienna.—“Were it evident that peace would take place, what I am going to say might well be spared, but I believe in another campaign. In that case Spain will become a party against you, and the everlasting bone of contention, Gibraltar, may perhaps be her object of attack, unless she should adopt the plan proposed last war of conquering it in the West Indies. You will probably endeavour, on the other hand, to make serious impression on her American dominions; and, in so doing, must contend with a climate more dangerous than your enemy. Two modes have presented themselves to my mind; one which I mentioned cursorily to Sir Morton Eden has probably occurred to your Lordship, namely, transporting some Lascars from India to Mexico. These would indeed find an open country, but the extent of it and other causes would render the impression less permanent than you would desire. The other mode is more simple. The Emperor might furnish some troops from Croatia and other unhealthy places, who are inured from infancy to baneful exhalations. These, under the pretext of garrisoning Gibraltar and attacking Cadiz, would keep your enemy in alarm; but, once beyond the Straits, they would rapidly run down the longitude, and arrive at such point of attack as should be deemed most advisable. If, as is said, the Pope means to declare a holy war against France and her allies, he might give you a detachment of monks, supplied with the due quantity of bulls and such-like ammunition from the Vatican. These, in the bigoted country you have to deal with, would produce great effect; and this appears to me the cheapest and best mode of opening to yourselves the direct commerce of Mexico and Peru, which, added to the acquisitions already made, would fully indemnify you for the expenses incurred, and to be incurred, in the course of the contest. I suggested to Baron de Thugut the other day that it might produce a great effect on the French armies, should this Court give an Office to the different foreign ministers, intended for publication, in which, premising that circumstances now permit the Emperor to declare fully his intentions without wounding his dignity, a short recapitulation should be made of the manner in which he had been compelled to make war by the aggression of the enemy, mentioning the proper facts as of public notoriety. It might then go on to declare that he wished for nothing but to establish the general peace of Europe, repossessing himself of his own and recovering for the Empire what belonged to it; and that, if he should for these purposes be forced to act within the antient territory of France, it must be attributed merely to the obstinacy of those who seek from ambitious views to prolong the war. He said that as England had undertaken to negotiate a peace for the allies, this step, however useful in itself, might interfere with your views. Before I close this letter I must testify the pleasure I felt in reading the King’s speech. It is excellent.”

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 8, Wimbledon.—“I was extremely sorry on calling yesterday at your house to learn the unfortunate cause of my not finding you at home. You will, of course, be anxious to know the result of my investigation on the subject of re-enforcing Portugal. It turns out better than probably you imagine. Having, in the consideration of it, acted upon the principle that the honour and interest of the country were both much concerned in the support of Portugal, I have not allowed small or even considerable inconveniences to prevent me appropriating a brigade of 1,800 excellent British troops to go immediately from Gibraltar to the aid of Portugal. I have selected them from the troops which have all along been employed in service at Corsica, and I believe they are as good as any troops can be. By the returns yesterday received from Corsica, it appears that the foreign corps serving there amount to 2,600 ; the French corps and artillery to go from this amount to 1,400 ; and the brigade of British from Gibraltar will amount to 1,800, making in all a body of 5,800, which, allowing for accidents, may certainly be taken at good 5,000. I am very happy we have it in our power to give them anything so respectable. I hope to see the Duke of York here this morning. He intended yesterday to offer the command to General Charles Stuart, who, I believe, will do it exceedingly well ; and, having commanded the troops at Corsica with great éclat and popularity, would in that respect peculiarly suit. If he does not go, General de Barghe, I suppose, will be ordered from Gibraltar, where he will come from Corsica, along with the troops, after evacuation. He, likewise, is reckoned an exceeding good officer."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November [10-12], York Farm.—“ Vous m'avez permis d'oser vous offrir le portrait du jeune héros, à qui l'Europe doit en vérité son salut. J'ai l'honneur de vous l'envoyer ci-joint. Permettez, qu'en même temps, je vous demande un moment d'entretien quand vous le jugerez à propos. Un courier qui m'est arrivé de Vienne m'a apporté de quoi vous entretenir, et des pouvoirs pour conclure même ce dont nous parlerons, si nous convenons de nos faits.”

French.

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1796, November 13, Dropmore.—“ Recevez, je vous prie, mes remerciemens pour le portrait intéressant du jeune héros qui a tant contribué à nous préserver [de] tous des maux qui menaçaient l'Europe. Vous verrez dans la Gazette Officielle de demain le détail de ses victoires du 19 à 21 d'Octobre. Puissent ses succès ultérieurs répondre à la sincérité de nos vœux pour tout ce qui peut contribuer à sa gloire, et à la prospérité de la Monarchie Autrichienne.

“ J'ai reçu par le courier du Chevalier Eden des dépêches dont le contenu ne peut que m'affliger sensiblement. Comment est-il possible qu'on ait cru à Vienne que, dans un moment pareil, nous aurions eu la sottise puérile de ne pas charger notre Ministre de nos véritables et dernières intentions sur les ouvertures qu'il devait faire ?

“ Je souhaite de me donner encore quelques jours avant de retourner en ville pour reprendre le cours de mes occupations ordinaires. C'est pourquoi je me flatte que vous voudrez bien me permettre de vous recevoir ici, soit demain soit Jeudi, à telle heure après midi qui vous conviendra le mieux.”

French. Copy.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November [13], London.—“Je suppose que vous venez en ville aujourd’hui et, dans ce cas, je vous supplie d’avoir la bonté de me voir un instant. Pour éviter que l’appointement que vous pourrez me donner ne me parvienne pas à temps, je vous prie de l’envoyer au bureau où je me rendrai à midi, et où je l’attendrai. Il serait, je crois, fort à propos d’envoyer un courier à Vienne pour y parler de l’emprunt, de l’arrangement prochain, et to comfort them. J’ai écrit, il y a deux jours, à M. Pitt pour lui demander des avances, et de faire honneur aux intérêts de notre dernier emprunt qui échoient Samedi prochain. Ce dernier point est bien important, puisqu’il y va de notre crédit, et aussi de celui de l’Angleterre qui nous a cautionné.”

French.

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, November 13, Paris.—“I shall be most extremely anxious to receive an answer to what this messenger carries, although I think it very likely, after what has passed to-day, that I shall have a message from the Directory to leave Paris before he can possibly return.

“Although I feel a consciousness of having done right, and that I have on no occasion, either in my language or behaviour, afforded the slightest pretence for supposing I was not most sincere and hearty in my wishes and endeavours to promote the success of the negotiation, yet the object at stake is of such immense magnitude that it fills my mind with doubts and apprehensions.

“I trust I shall receive no fresh instructions from you between the time this messenger leaves Paris and his return, as, circumstanced as the business now is, it would be extremely difficult for me to know how to act.

“I cannot conjecture what can have given rise to so sudden a change, for, although I never was inclined to believe the Directory desirous of peace, yet everything led me to believe that it was their wish to protract the negotiation, and wait for a more favourable occasion for breaking it off than that they have created themselves.

“It is possible from M. de la Croix’s last note that they may refuse me leave to dispatch messengers; I shall endeavour to avoid bringing this question to an issue till I hear from you, but it would be such a manifest infraction of les droits des gens as to authorize my immediately leaving the country.

“I have not thought it necessary to send a messenger to Vienna with an account of what has passed. It relates only indirectly to them, and, besides, although I do not give the least credit to it, there is a strong rumour here that they are negotiating a separate peace.

“The only news from the armies is to be found in the paper called Les défenseurs de la patrie.”

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 14, York Farm.—“Je reçois dans le moment la lettre que vous m’avez fait l’honneur de m’écrire; je me rendrai demain à vos ordres entre midi et une heure.

“On vient de m’envoyer des instructions de Vienne pour obtenir, s’il est possible, quelque chose de plus de vous. J’ai les pouvoirs les plus étendus de conclure immédiatement la convention qu’on désire beaucoup que vous vous prêtiez à faire actuellement. Je vous exposerai nos véritables besoins et j’aime encore à me flatter que l’urgence des circonstances, et notre conduite vraiment admirable, vous feront trouver des nouveaux moyens pour aider les seuls véritables et utiles alliés que vous ayez.”

French.

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, November 15, Paris.—“It is of such infinite consequence that you should be in possession of every possible information I can convey to you at this very critical period of the negotiation, that it is with the greatest pleasure I accept the kind offer of Mr. Ellis to return to England for a few days.

“He is fully acquainted with everything that has passed, and you may rely with perfect confidence on the soundness of his judgment and on the acuteness of his discernment. You will hear from him, as far as our observation and information go, an exact and true description of the temper and state of this country; and you will be enabled to judge from the account he gives, of the means the best calculated to produce the end we wish to obtain. I have endeavoured to transmit this to you in my official correspondence, but I have done it so imperfectly and in a manner so unsatisfactory to myself, that I am made very happy in being able to perform the most essential part of my duty in a way which will leave no uneasiness on my mind least any circumstance or reflection, important to be known, should have been suppressed, overlooked, or misrepresented.

“I am anxious Mr. Ellis should follow the messenger who left Paris on Sunday night closely, since I am fearful that what I stated in my letters by him was so put as to lead to a belief that the negotiation was nearly irrecoverably lost. I certainly had reason to think at that moment that it was the intention of this Government to end it. I am since convinced that a great deal which I placed to the account of system and design ought to be put to that of inexperience and inaptitude in business; and it is to enter into a full explanation on this point and on others naturally arising out of it, to answer any question you may wish to ask, to convey to you, in a word, at once the whole of our knowledge and observations, and consequently to prevent the adoption of any false measures from omissions or incorrectness in my reports, that Mr. Ellis undertakes the journey. All I have to add is my wish, both for my own sake and for that of the business, that he may return very soon.

“I thought it advisable to ask M. de la Croix myself for Mr. Ellis’s passport, and to intimate to him at the same time in general terms the motive which induced him to return to England, and I did it with a view to prevent suspicion and jealousy inseparable from characters like those which form this Government, and also to make him feel how much I was in earnest in my endeavours to promote the success of the negotiation.

“I must do Monsieur de la Croix the justice to say that he was extremely pleased with this communication, and expressed himself in very handsome terms on my making him what he called a voluntary confidence, since I had certainly a right to despatch any person to England at any time without assigning a reason for so doing.”

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 15, Stowe.—“I find that there is a very general expectation of a riot about Wednesday or Thursday next, when the petitions are to be presented; I trust you are prepared with cavalry. In 1792 (about this time) George Berkeley, by my private advice, put two six-pounders in the storehouse on the Parade amongst the rejoicing guns, and lodged 150 rounds of grape for each gun, under the care of the storekeeper there. You could easily know from Lord Cornwallis whether they are still there, and a few artillerists might be ordered to attend at the Ordnance Office (or there) without giving suspicion. I was much gratified with the account of your battle with Lord Thurlow, but this is not the first instance in which he has shrunk from Parliamentary attack. You see that our meeting is fixed for Saturday; can you come on and take your bed here? Do you know of any attenders? for I fear that, unless a point is made, the meeting will be very thin.

“Postscript.—I find that I have 18,000*l.* in money in the Exchequer; the other Offices not quite so much each, but above 60,000*l.*, which is too much to be left to the mercy of the mob in Westminster Hall, with only an inch-plank door for its security.”

GEORGE III. TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 16, Windsor.—“No one more cordially laments the occasion which prevents Lord Grenville’s coming to town this week; but in the actual state of public business, I can without detriment to it, consent to his further absence. I thought by this time a messenger must have arrived from Paris with the account of what steps had been taken by Lord Malmesbury in consequence of the instructions he has received on the strange mode adopted of publishing every matter relating to the impending negotiation.”

COUNT STARHEMBERG TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 16, York Farm.—“Je vais l’avoir l’honneur de vous rendre compte, confidentiellement comme je vous l’ai promis, du sens des instructions que j’ai reçu de ma Cour par le dernier courier qu’on m’a envoyé. Daignez vous rappeler de votre côté que tout ceci est uniquement de vous à moi, et que vous n’en ferez d’autre usage que celui d’en prendre une connaissance complète.

“On commence par me témoigner l’étonnement qu’on a éprouvé de ce que, précisément après m’avoir donné l’ordre d’insister ici sur une augmentation absolument indispensable dans le montant des avances mensuelles que nous recevons de l’Angleterre, on a vu M. le Chevalier Eden faire des propositions fort au-dessous de ces mêmes avances. On en a dû conclure qu’apparemment il s’était glissé quelque méprise dans les ordres envoyés au Ministre d’Angleterre à Vienne, et on me demande l’explication la plus prompte à cet égard. Il me sera aisé de la donner actuellement en conséquence de notre dernière conversation; mais je ne puis m’empêcher d’avoir l’honneur de vous observer encore que si, au moment du départ du courier, vous aviez daigné me donner part des instructions que vous envoyiez à M. le Chevalier Eden, en ne trahissant jamais le secret de l’amitié, j’aurais peut-être pu vous éviter le désagrément du moment, en vous prévenant de l’effet certain que produirait votre nouvelle mesure. Ma seule amitié a osé dans le temps vous en porter ses plaintes; vous avez bien voulu rassurer mon sentiment; mais ignorant absolument le terme fixé à votre ministre, je n’ai rien mandé de positif à ce sujet à ma Cour, et il était, par conséquent, très simple qu'on en fut surpris à Vienne, qu'on crut que M. Eden avait l'ordre de marchander, et que l'on fut même mécontent de la modicité des offres qu'il était difficile de prévoir. Il me semble qu'il l'était tout autant de croire que nous dussions, pour ainsi dire, être punis par une diminution remarquable faite dans nos avances, du bien que nous avions procuré à la cause commune en portant la Russie à s'engager à envoyer un corps de troupes contre l'ennemi ; car il est certain que le principe établi de ne partager qu'une somme de trois millions entre la Russie et l'Autriche, sans satisfaire la première, devait donner à la seconde une sorte de sujet de se plaindre, puisque ce serait à ses dépens qu'on aiderait l'activité nouvellement prononcée de la cour de Pétersbourg. Il devait être aisé d'en déduire que notre pénurie réelle et non factice (comme celle que le Roi de Prusse a mis si souvent en jeu) ne nous permettant d'agir qu'en proportion des secours que nous recevions (quoique ces secours n'aient jamais été des subsides) nous nous verrions forcés d'agir avec une efficacité proportionnée à la manière dont on voulait nous restreindre, et que, par conséquent, tout ce que l'on donnerait à la Russie, seulement et uniquement à nos dépens, serait de toute nécessité autant de diminué sur le nombre de nos troupes, l'étendue de nos efforts. L'exemple de ce qui vient de se passer doit, ce me semble, prouver à l'Angleterre que tout arrangement qui produirait ces conséquences ne serait point conforme à ses véritables intérêts. Après m'avoir déduit avec beaucoup de clarté et de précision ce que je viens de vous rapporter, on m'enjoint exactement, par ordre exprès de Sa Majesté, d'envoyer incessamment un courier à Vienne porteur d'explications exactes sur les véritables dispositions du ministère Anglais à l'égard des secours qu'il veut nous accorder, et d'après lesquels nous devons régler notre manière future de poursuivre la guerre. Le désir de Sa Majesté Impériale étant de se préparer à temps à deployer dans la campagne prochaine, qui sera la sixième pour nous, une énergie capable de parvenir à réaliser le grand but des alliés de dompter l'opiniâtreté de l'ennemi, et d'accélérer le moment désiré d'une paix solide et durable, il faut qu'elle s'explique de la façon la plus franche sur l'exacte étendue de ses besoins. On m'ordonne, en conséquence, d'insister absolument, 1°. sur une première avance de 600,000 livres sterling, à obtenir dès les premiers jours de 1797, pour nous mettre en état de faire des préparatifs nécessaires, et toujours négligés jusqu'à présent faute de moyens, d'ouvrir la campagne avec une vigueur analogue à la manière dont on termine celle-ci. 2°. Sur une augmentation du montant très insuffisant des avances mensuelles offertes par M. Eden. Je vous confierai qu'après m'avoir enjoint de tâcher d'obtenir 250,000 livres par mois, on me permet d'acquiescer, en dernière analyse, à un offre de 200,000 livres. La connaissance profonde que j'ai de l'état de détresse où se trouve le ministère Anglais, de sa bonne volonté envers nous, et, en même temps, la confiance que ma Cour me témoigne, me feraient prendre sur moi de ne pas m'arrêter à une différence peu importante ; mais, si vous persistiez absolument à croire ne pouvoir pas vous relâcher des bornes étroites que vous venez de vous prescrire, je serais obligé, à mon bien grand regret, d'en rendre compte immédiatement, ayant à ce sujet les ordres les plus pressans. Daignez croire qui même dans ce cas je rapporterai avec cette scrupuleuse exactitude dont je me suis toujours fait un devoir, et qui m'a valu vos bontés, tout ce dont vous me chargerez. Il va sans dire, je crois, qu'après avoir eu le bonheur de contribuer par ma part de soins et de travail à la réalisation de l'heureuse intelligence qui subsiste entre nos deux Cours, je chercherai toute ma vie à écarter de mon mieux jusqu'au plus petit léger image qui pourrait menacer de la troubler, même pour un seul instant.

“Après m’avoir donné ses instructions dans toute leur étendue, M. le Baron de Thugut termine par ces mots ; “Dès que nos serons d’accord sur les premiers principes j’aurais l’honneur de vous esquisser les points essentiels de cette convention, conformément aux ordres que j’ai reçu, ou je prendrai la liberté de vous faire la demande de ceux que vous déterminerez, et qui ne pourrait certainement pas manquer d’être analogues à ceux que ma Cour désire. Agréez tous mes hommages. Ce n’est pas d’aujourd’hui que mes sentimens vous sont connus. Je vous ai parlé avec la confiance d’un frère ; mais je sais que vous avez assez d’amitié pour moi, pour m’en savoir gré sans jamais me compromettre.

French.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 17, York Farm.—“J’ai l’honneur de vous envoyer, ainsi que nous en sommes convenus hier, l’esquisse des points principaux de la convention à rédiger, et qui porte absolument et uniquement sur les bases et les principes dont nous nous sommes entretenus. Si vous l’approuvez, comme je l’espère et le désire, il ne s’agira plus que de donner à cet ouvrage le vernis et les formes diplomatiques pour procéder immédiatement à la signature. J’ai déjà, je crois, eu l’honneur de vous prévenir que j’avais à cet égard toutes les instructions et pouvoirs nécessaires.

“Permettez cependant que je prenne la liberté de vous rappeler encore ici quelques observations que j’ai crû utiles de vous soumettre pendant notre dernier entretien. 1<sup>o</sup>. L’urgence dont il est que ma Cour soit informée au plutôt de la réalisation de vos bonnes intentions à son égard. J’ai sur cet objet les ordres les plus pressans, votre bon esprit vous en dira les raisons, et vous me pardonnerez en conséquence d’oser vous importuner encore pour vous prier de hâter autant que possible la conclusion de nos négociations. 2<sup>o</sup>. L’extrême importance dont il est pour nous que nous touchions une somme très considérable dès les premiers jours du mois de Janvier. M. de Thugut insiste sur un montant de 600,000 livres ; peut-être trouveriez-vous plus convenable de répartir cette somme entre les mois de Janvier et de Décembre, mais il est hors de doute que ce point est absolument essentiel. J’en suis tellement pénétré que, quoique mon chef m’ait donné le terme de 200,000 livres par mois comme son ne plus ultra, je prendrais plutôt sur moi d’acquiescer à un secours mensuel un peu moins considérable (si cette différence était légère) pour obtenir avec certitude la somme de 600,000 livres au commencement de 1797.

“Vous voudrez bien remarquer encore que la manière dont j’ai rédigé la proposition de l’article répond entièrement à ce que vous m’avez dit hier, et vous laisse le champ le plus vaste.

“L’article séparé que je propose, et qui, comme tout le reste, est absolument soumis à vos lumières, a pour but, ainsi que j’ai eu l’honneur de vous le dire, d’assurer à M. de Thugut les époques exactes surquelles le ministère Anglais nous fera ses payemens. Il va sans dire que les lenteurs et même les dangers possibles des remises entre la maison Boyd et Vienne ne peuvent regarder aucunement le gouvernement Britannique ; et me trouvant actuellement à la place du directoire pour ce genre de besogne, je ne manquerai pas de prévenir ma Cour à ce sujet, et de rectifier les idées fausses qu’on peut lui avoir donné à cet égard.

“L’Article 2, qui fixe la terme de l’ancien arrangement auquel le directoire avait part au mois de Novembre, répond encore à ce que vous avez paru désirer. C’est le point de démarcation nécessaire. M. de Müller se mêlera encore de la rentrée des avances de Novembre calculées sur l’ancien pied ; celles de Décembre ne seront plus de son ressort.

“Il serait bien agréable à ma Cour encore que vous voulussiez écouter à un article secret que je ne fais que vous proposer, et sur lequel je n’insiste nullement, qui porterait en substance qu’à l’époque que vous fixerez vous-même quand vous le jugerez à propos pour l’emprunt que nous ferons, afin de vous rembourser les avances, vous consentirez que cet emprunt soit porté au moins à la somme de 4,600,000 livres. Vous en concevrez vous-même la raison, qui n’a d’autre but que de pas voir alors cet emprunt peut-être employé dans sa totalité à n’effectuer que des remboursements, sans qu’il en soit rien versé dans nos caisses. Encore une fois ceci n’est qu’une proposition à laquelle je ne tiens point du tout irrévocablement. Votre sagesse en jugera.

“J’attendrai vos ordres pour me rendre chez vous. Daignez de grace ne pas perdre de vue que c’est doubler le prix du service que vous rendrez à un allié reconnaissant, que de l’aider promptement.”

Enclosure.

PROJET.

“Sans entrer dans le détail des formes diplomatiques, et du préambule ordinaire, toujours les mêmes dans tous les traités et toutes les conventions, je me bornerai à esquisser ici le sens des principaux articles qui devront, ce me semble, former la base essentielle de celle qu’on se propose.

1° “Par le premier article les deux puissances alliées renouvelleront solennellement tous les engagements réciproques contractés par les traités et conventions précédentes.

2° “Le Roi de la Grande Bretagne, pour aider son allié à subvenir aux fraix énormes que lui occasionne la masse des efforts qu’il déploie contre l’ennemi commun, prend l’engagement de lui fournir, à commencer du mois de Décembre prochain, le secours d’une avance de 200,000 livres sterling par mois ; l’arrangement préalable, pris il y a quelque temps, d’après lequel on fournissait à Sa Majesté Impériale un secours mensuel de 150,000 livres devant cesser avec le paiement du mois de Novembre, qui sera le dernier fait sur l’ancien pied.

3° “L’ouverture de la campagne de 1797 mettant Sa Majesté Impériale dans la nécessité absolue de faire des dépenses beaucoup plus considérables pour mettre toutes ses armées en mouvement, et préparer les moyens de leur procurer immédiatement la plus grande activité, le Roi son allié consent à lui fournir pour le mois de Janvier seulement, indépendamment du secours mensuel de 200,000 livres sterling énoncé dans l'article 2, une avance extraordinaire de 400,000 livres de plus, formant un tout de 600,000 livres pour l'avance du mois de Janvier.

4° "Sa Majesté Impériale, sensible à la nouvelle preuve d'amitié qu'elle reçoit de Sa Majesté Britannique, prend l'engagement de rembourser exactement toutes les sommes qui lui ont été avancées jusqu'à présent, et qui pourront lui être encore avancées par la suite, en conséquence de la présente convention, en ferant servir à ce remboursement les fonds d'un emprunt que Sa Majesté Impériale ouvrira à Londres pour son compte au moment qui lui sera indiqué par le Roi son allié, lorsqu'il croira pouvoir donner sa garantie au dit emprunt.

5° "Sa Majesté Impériale, intimement convaincue des sentimens de sa Majesté Britannique à son égard, et de son désir sincère, dont elle lui donne une nouvelle preuve en ce moment, de l'aider de tous les moyens qui sont en son pouvoir, consent à ce que, si l'empire des circonstances ou des raisons importantes l'exigeraient, on suspendit le payement des avances convenues en totalité ou en partie, pourvu toutefois qu'on en informât Sa Majesté Impériale trois mois d'avance dans le premier cas, et deux dans le second."

ARTICLE SÉPARÉ.

"Sa Majesté Impériale devant être informée aussi exactement que possible de l'époque de la rentrée des fonds qu'elle recevra de la part de l'Angleterre, on versera ces avances entre les mains de la maison chargée de leurs remises tous les premiers de chaque mois. Si quelque raison devait retarder ce payement de quelques jours, on en prévientrait le Ministre de Sa Majesté Impériale à Londres, pour qu'il puisse en informer sa Cour."

French.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 18, London.—"Par une suite de ce système de franchise et de sincérité que votre touchant amitié a bien voulu encourager toujours, et qui ne m'a jamais permis de vous rien dissimuler, je ne puis vous cacher aujourd'hui combien j'ai été douloureusement affecté dans la journée d'hier d'apercevoir la réserve que vous avez jugé à propos de mettre vis-à-vis de moi dans vos ouvertures au sujet du montant de nos avances, et des subsides que vous allez offrir à la Russie. M. Thugut m'a donné des ordres positifs, et ne se contentera pas des notions vagues que je puis lui donner, et s'il apprenait, comme j'ai lieu de le supposer, des détails plus circonstanciés de M. le Chevalier Eden, il jugerait avec raison que vous n'avez pas en moi la confiance que mon zèle, ma discrétion, et la manière ouverte et franche avec laquelle je vous ai toujours fait part des choses les plus secrettes, devraient me mériter. Vous n'ignorez pas d'ailleurs que, connaissant certainement mieux les dispositions et les intentions de ma Cour que M. le Chevalier Eden, j'ai entre mes mains des moyens de persuasion qu'il ne peut avoir, et que j'emploierai sans cesse dans l'occasion par l'intime conviction où je suis de la nécessité de la durée d'une alliance aussi utile, à laquelle j'ai eu le bonheur de travailler moi-même.

"Daignez donc rassurer un honnête homme qui vous aime, qui a droit à l'estime et à la plus grande confiance du ministère Anglais, et qui a eu l'honneur de vous répéter souvent que le moindre hint de votre part lui suffira, quand il croira ne vous être plus agréable.

Postscript.—Il va sans dire que ceci est de vous à moi, ma manière d'agir vous prouve mes sentimens. Elle doit réussir auprès de ceux qui pensent comme Lord Grenville."

French.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 20, York Farm.—"J'ai remis avant hier à M. Pitt, en conséquence de la conversation que nous avons eu ensemble la veille, le projet qu'il m'avait demandé. Comme je ne doutais pas, ainsi qu'il me l'avait promis, qu'il ne vous le communiquât immédiatement, j'ai cru pouvoir me dispenser de vous en envoyer la copie ; mais daignez permettre que j'ose vous supplier de hâter cette besogne autant que possible. Vous en sentez l'urgence comme moi. Je viens de recevoir des nouvelles instances de Vienne à ce sujet. Agréez tous mes hommages ; j'attends vos ordres avec la plus vive impatience."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1796, November.]—"J'écris aujourd'hui à ma Cour pour la prévenir des raisons qui ont arrêté la conclusion de notre convention, mais comme néanmoins il serait possible (comme je l'espère) que ces raisons ne subsistassent plus dans peu de jours, nous reprissions notre négociation, je crois parer à tous les inconvéniens, et surtout à celui qui résulterait infailliblement de la pénurie dans laquelle nous devons nous trouver, en prévenant M. de Thugut que, si les bruits publics se trouvent faux, notre arrangement retardé se fera immédiatement, et qu'ainsi il pourrait tirer d'avance 200,000 livres s'il ne se sent pas coupable de ce dont les Français l'accusent, jusqu'alors sa traité arriverait ici après la convention déjà signéé : bien entendu qu'en cas de paix séparée, ou de quelque marche qui y conduirait, il ne pourrait être question de rien. Il me semble que cet expédient (sans compromettre personne et sans faire courir aucun risque) pare à tout, et particulièrement aux retards qui seraient la conséquence naturelle et fatale de la mesure juste, sage et prudente que vous prenez actuellement. Il va sans dire que j'écris en chiffres. J'adresserai ma dépêche à notre ministre à Hambourg, qui l'enverra par estafette. Agréez mon hommage. Je ne doute pas que vous n'approuviez mon idée ; elle est fondée sur nos principes communs."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 22, Windsor.—"Unless it had been judged right on the receipt of the captious notes written by La Croix to Lord Malmesbury to have made them the cause of breaking off the negotiation, which would have best accorded with my sentiments ; for forbearance when too long pursued has too much the appearance of a degree of caution, nearly approaching timidity ; I cannot object to the mode of wording the fresh note to be given by Lord Malmesbury. As it does not appear that Mr. Ellis's arrival has been attended by his bringing any dispatch for Lord Grenville, I much like the having mentioned his language in the dispatch, as it takes off any sting if attending his journey, as the whole now stands recorded and cannot be alluded to any future stage of the business. I am almost unwilling to have stated this remark, but the many politicians I have dealt with makes me always not only look to the apparent object produced, but see whether anyone not ostensible lies behind."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

Private.

1796, November 22, Cleveland Row.—"Mr. Canning will, I hope, have explained to you the melancholy occasion which prevented my acknowledging your private letters, at the time that my last dispatches were forwarded to you. I think you have judged perfectly right about the national cockade, which is, like every other part of the dress of yourself and your suite, absolutely sans conséquence except when you are acting in an official capacity, and the only way to create difficulties on such points is the appearing to attach to them an importance which they have not.

"It is impossible for anything to be more satisfactory to my feelings than the footing on which you have left the business in the different notes that passed between you and M. de la Croix, and I should have been truly sorry if you had thought so literal an adherence to the instructions of taking their answer ad referendum could be necessary as to have prevented you from giving an immediate answer to the impertinent questions put to you. Any delay in that respect would have given the impression of a doubt on your part with respect to the ground on which you stood.

"I have not the smallest reason to believe that the Court of Vienna has any thoughts of separate peace. It is indeed so evidently her interest to treat only in conjunction with us that I think it scarcely possible for France to hold out any temptation that would even make her waver in this respect.

"Mr. Ellis's conversation could not but be highly interesting to me. What he says rather tends to confirm the impression in my mind, which indeed I imagine is the same which you and he also feel, that the Directory wish to get rid of the negotiation, though they are frightened when it comes to the moment of breaking it off.

"We hear that the capture of Lucas's squadron has made great impression in Holland. If you hear any Mediterranean news of importance, whether by land or sea, it would be very desirable that you should send it over as soon as you can ascertain the facts.

"I have seen to-day a packet of letters from Sir Sydney Smith. I am uneasy lest we should not appear to do all that is due to a naval officer of his rank in the service, when placed in such a situation. You do not mention him in your last dispatches. I enclose some letters for him which I conclude you will find no difficulty in forwarding to him, and I rather think the best way of doing this would be by claiming a right to send either Mr. Talbot or Mr. Swinburne to him with them. There is no instance here, not only of an officer confined in prison, but even of any private soldier or sailor, to whom the French Commissary has not the freest access."

Enclosure.

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR SYDNEY SMITH.

1796, November 22, Cleveland Row.—"I cannot transmit to you the accompanying letters without adding a few words from myself, merely to assure you of the strong interest which I personally feel in your unworthy treatment, and of the decided resolution of those who join with me in this sentiment not to suffer the matter to remain on its present footing.

"What has passed in France respecting you is a disgrace to a country calling itself a civilized nation, and it is still more so when contrasted with the liberal treatment which the French prisoners have experienced here during the whole war, even at the moment when Robèspierre's Government had passed a decree for the murder of all persons in the situation of becoming prisoners. This, I suppose, will hardly be renewed at this time, but the rigour and indignity with which you have been treated differs from it only in degree, and not at all in principle. And the effect of such conduct, if adhered to, must be to bring similar rigour upon their own prisoners here who are in so much greater number, and to aggravate beyond description the calamities of war which they profess themselves desirous of terminating.

"I know that your generous feelings would lead you to regret that your sufferings should be made the cause of misfortune and calamity to others. But this sentiment, which it is honourable for you to entertain, cannot diminish the duty incumbent on us to protect the King's officers from such unworthy treatment, by those means which the fortune of war has put abundantly in our power.

"This will be conveyed to you through Lord Malmesbury. Be assured that your situation was one of the first objects of his instructions."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, November 25, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has the honour humbly to submit to your Majesty the draft of a dispatch, with its inclosure, which Lord Grenville has prepared in consequence of the opinion of your Majesty's servants, and which, if your Majesty should be graciously pleased to approve of, he proposes sending it to-morrow by a messenger to Vienna. Lord Grenville trusts that the favourable accounts received this day from Italy will very much tend to remove difficulties which might otherwise have occurred on this subject, and to place the whole state of affairs in a much more favourable situation, whether for the negotiation of a peace or for the continuance of the war.

"Lord Grenville this day saw Baron de Reiger. It appears from his account that there is a very little probability that a letter would still reach the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg at Vienna. Baron Reiger said that he conceived what might perhaps best suit your Majesty's ideas under this circumstance would be, that the Prince on his arrival this autumn should stay only till the marriage treaty could be settled, and that he should then return again at the period, whatever it may be, that your Majesty might be pleased to fix for the celebration of the marriage. Upon this subject Lord Grenville could only undertake to receive your Majesty's commands.

"He begs leave humbly to mention that, if your Majesty should be pleased to approve of this arrangement, it might be proper that the necessary orders should be given for the reception of his Serene Highness in such a manner as your Majesty may be pleased to appoint, and also for the frigate to bring him over."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 26, Windsor.—“Lord Grenville cannot be surprised when I have, from the first moment of any idea of treating with France being proposed, uniformly shewn my disinclination to a measure which undoubtedly at this hour so manifestly destroys the solid ground on which the war was undertaken, the truth of which never was more clear than at the present period. I certainly, therefore, while I do not mean to oppose the sending the project to Vienna, certainly hope the Directory will break off the negotiation ; for when the scene in Italy is so much improved as well as in Germany, another campaign must be with pleasure looked to by those who like me dread any intercourse with a French Republic.

“Seeing how clumsily my directions had been executed by the Duke of Portland towards Baron Reiger, I have got the Duke of Gloucester to write to the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg to shew him how much better it would be for him to defer his journey ; but, should that not succeed, he then certainly ought to make but a short stay, and not return till the marriage is to be concluded. I cannot give any directions as to what is to be done till Lord Grenville can collect for me information in the case of the late Prince of Orange. I am totally ignorant where he was lodged ; but must premise if it was at Somerset House, that I have now no apartment where I could place him, therefore, in that case, some house must be hired for his reception ; but I doubt if in this case it would be necessary ; he can only come here on the present occasion as incognito, and any particular attentions of that kind ought, it seems, naturally to be postponed till he comes in his public character.

“I wish Lord Grenville would look back for the treaty of marriage of the Princess of Orange, and of the Duchess of Brunswick, and have a précis made of them, that it may be settled how that for my daughter is to be prepared.”

LORD MALMESBURY to W. PITT.

Private.

1796, November 28, Paris.—“It gives me much satisfaction to hear from Canning that you approved my sending over Mr. Ellis, and still more to hear from Ellis himself of the very kind reception he met with from you.

“My official letters are to-day very voluminous, but I hope that the general substance of what they contain will be satisfactory.

“I trust now that it will be considered as proper to send me the projet of a treaty, with instructions as to those articles on which I may make concessions or modifications, and as to those on which I am to insist ; without some latitude of this sort I shall find this Government a very impracticable one to deal with.

“I still remain convinced that the Directory had rather we should furnish them with a pretence which would enable them to make the continuation of the war popular, than conclude a peace ; but peace is at present so much the cry and wish of the country, that unless we do furnish them with this pretence, I firmly believe they must either consent to it, or risk the overthrow of their Government.

“In saying this I not only explain the motives for every part of my conduct since I have been here, but also express my opinion what I conceive it ought to be as long as I remain. If you think me right, you will, I am sure, concur with me in the necessity that I should be authorized to begin the negotiation without any farther delay, and that in a manner to make it impossible for the Directory to misrepresent the sincerity of our pacific intentions.

"If you think me in the wrong, I am still more sure that you will forgive my writing freely and openly my sentiments to you.

"The solemn assurances I have received from M. de la Croix on the not publishing what may pass between us in the next stages of the negotiation, will, I hope, be considered to be as binding as any which I could have drawn from him had I run the risk of corresponding with him on this very delicate subject.

"The Netherlands will be the great obstacle in our way. If we do not pertinaciously insist in these being restored to the House of Austria, or if the Emperor will look to an equivalent elsewhere in lieu of them, I incline to think that on all other points we shall find a much more accommodating disposition than we expect. We must certainly make up our account to hear a great deal of offensive and vapouring language in the progress of the business, but if we obtain our end, this may I presume be overlooked, and I am most ready that it should be understood not as addressed to the country at large, but to me in particular, on whom it does not produce the smallest unpleasant sensation.

"It would be entering into a very wide field to discuss the consequences that would follow if Belgium was to remain annexed to France. Perhaps they may, on deliberate reflection, be found to be less serious than is generally thought; and certainly, when we consider the situation of the countries which surround the Austrian Netherlands, the present state of Holland, and that in which it is probable and perhaps desirable it should remain, the cession it has made to the French of Maestricht and Venlo with the districts round them, and of Dutch Flanders, the annihilation of the Bishopric of Liege and of the Ecclesiastical Electors, I scarcely see a possibility of the Netherlands being again put on the same footing relative to England in which they stood before the war.

"I am still in hopes there is good news from Italy, though they are somewhat diminished by an article from Milan in one of this morning's papers in the pay of Government."

LORD MALMESBURY TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, November 28, Paris.—"It was with infinite concern that I heard from Mr. Canning of the melancholy event which so naturally employed your whole mind, when the last messenger but one was sent to me from your Office.

"It is a real comfort to me to find that you are satisfied with what I have hitherto done, and I hope the contents of the official letters I wrote to-day will continue to be approved; they seem to justify the reasons which induced me to send Mr. Ellis over to England.

"I hope you will now have no difficulty in sending me over the plan of a treaty, and allowing me a sufficient range in my instructions to enable me to get fairly into the negotiation. I think if this once happens we cannot fail of getting honourably and advantageously out of it, let the event be peace or war.

"Should the Emperor consent to an equivalent in lieu of the Austrian Netherlands, I do not see at this moment any very insurmountable obstacle in the progress of our work. And in regard to England I imagine that, considering the state of the countries which border on them, it is next to impossible ever to place the Austrian Netherlands again in the same beneficial situation they were in before the war.

"I beg you to believe that I enter most fully into your feelings about Sir Sidney Smyth, and that it was solely from the idea that I could have obtained his release in a less official way than that I was directed by you to do, that I delayed so long giving in my last memorial on this subject. The last words I said to M. Delacroix yesterday evening were on behalf of Sir Sidney, and he promised me to press the Directory for a speedy answer.

"I have means of communicating very freely with Sir Sidney, although I have not seen him. Mr. Swinburne will, I hope, be admitted to him to-morrow. If he is, he shall carry your letter; if not, it shall get to him through another channel.

"I am ashamed at the bareness of my news and intelligence; but Mr. Ellis will tell you how very impossible it is for me to get safe and true information here, and how much I should lose if I was to be suspected, with any degree of proof, that I was employing indirect means to obtain it.

"You have never mentioned whether you are satisfied with the Neapolitan peace, and I am much puzzled what to say to M. Pignatelli on this subject.

"My Portuguese colleague does nothing. Was he a man of activity he would be very useful to me."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1796, November-December.]—"La dernière malle m'a apporté une dépêche Allemande chiffrée du Baron de Thugut, dans laquelle il me presse de nouveau sur la nécessité d'arrêter au plutôt l'arrangement des secours pécuniaires; et il me témoigne sa surprise de ce que le courier, porteur de la convention que, dans d'autres circonstances, nous avions vous et moi annoncé comme prêt à être expédié, n'était point encore arrivée à Vienne. J'ai lieu de supposer, d'après ce que l'on me mande, que le courier que vous avez envoyé à M. Eden pour annoncer le nouveau retard survenu à l'occasion des embarras de la Banque, était parvenu à sa destination; mais comme on ne me fait à ce sujet aucune plainte ni reproche, j'ai lieu d'espérer que la confiance bien placée que nous avons dans l'amitié, l'honnêteté, et les talens de nos amis, l'a emporté sur les autres considérations, et prévalu audessus de toutes les craintes que cette cruelle information aurait pu produire. Mais je ne dois pas vous cacher que l'on m'ordonne absolument d'insister qu'il soit clairement énoncé dans la convention (qu'on croyait alors devoir porter sur une base d'avances) que les deux mois soient comptés du moment de la déclaration du Chevalier Eden à Vienne, dans le cas où il serait question de prononcer un jour un statement d'avances. Une circonstance assez particulière encore c'est que M. Thugut m'ajoute, vous avez beau me vanter les avantages de semblables avances qui, à la vérité, épargnent quelques intérêts; je préférerais un arrangement qui porterait sur un emprunt, puisqu'alors nous ne serions pas ainsi dans la dépendance, et dans le cas d'être privés de secours d'un moment à l'autre.

"Jugez d'après cela de ce qu'on dirait à Vienne d'une convention pour un emprunt dans laquelle on spécifierait qu'on pourrait nous arrêter les remises de cet emprunt. On jetterait feu et flamme j'en suis sûr. J'ai écrit dans ce sens par le dernier courier, et je suis persuadé qu'on m'en voudra singulièrement. Je m'en remets à votre justice et à votre touchante amitié pour moi. L'une et l'autre vous feront juger, sans aucun doute, combien il serait déplacé d'admettre cette condition, qu'au fond, rien ne nécessite ; et qui fera naître chez nous les soupçons et le mécontentement dont pour ma part (quoique je serais très prêt à me sacrifier pour le bien réel) je ne tarderai pas à ressentir les effets. Il n'entrera jamais dans nos têtes peu financières que, quand nous avons souscrit à un emprunt, il puisse être possible que nous n'ayons pas la totalité de ce que nous avons emprunté, et de ce que l'on nous a garanti. Nous causerons encore sur cet objet la première fois que j'aurais l'honneur de vous voir. Tout ceci est, d'ailleurs, confidentiel et de vous à moi, quoique je n'ai aucune objection à ce que vous en parliez à M. Pitt. Je me propose de lui écrire demain pour lui représenter que nous sommes à sec ; qu'immédiatement après l'arrangement, il nous faudra des fonds ; et qu'ainsi, il serait à propos que la restitution des avances déjà perçues fut renvoyée plus loin. Peut-être pourrait-on destiner à cet usage l'époque des derniers installments au rentrées. Excusez ma franchise et mon griffonnage. L'un et l'autre vous prouve et mon attachement, et la manière dont je compte sur vos bontés."

French.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, December 3, Stowe.—"I am very much obliged to you for the trouble you have taken in sending your messenger who returns to London with a letter to Coutts, desiring him to insert my name in the list for 10,000*l.* ; and I shall be ready with the first payments, and must me tirer d'affaire for the rest (as you and, as I suppose, every one will) by bringing to market that which I should imagine will be depreciated by the number of sellers below all calculation. However, be that as it may, it is certainly necessary and fit that I should 'be made a volunteer' and after having completely failed in every plan and device to persuade Government to accept my money in the shape of raising men for them, and having been most egregiously trifled with in that proceeding, I am not a little amused at the necessity of sending an express (at the risk of freezing him) to save me from the imputation of being as frozen in my patriotism, as this poor devil is in his fingers. Seriously however, I am delighted at the facility with which this very important and new plan has been acquiesced in. The pinch will probably show itself (and possibly to an unpleasant extent) at the first transfer day ; but the effect will probably be electrical upon Lord Malmesbury's friends at Paris.

"I have no faith in your Kehl news ; but I have the greatest expectations from Italy ; and the effect of Alvinzy's success will be decisive upon much more than the possession of one hundred miles of country, more or less.

SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, December 6, St. Petersburg.—"There remains so little to add to my dispatch by this messenger, that I feel it incumbent to apologize for the additional trouble I now give your Lordship. Were I to give way to my feelings, I could have much to say on the subject of the regret I cannot but feel at the important change I now experience. I hope and trust however that this change may not strike at the root of those interests which ought ever to unite the two countries. Every expression which falls from the Emperor should convince me of the contrary ; and my only apprehension arises from those attacks which I see daily made against all the measures of the late Empress. We must, however, hope for the best, and, at the same time that I beg leave to repeat the assurance of my constant zeal and attention to His Majesty's service, I venture to bespeak the continuance of that confidence and protection which I have so constantly experienced from your Lordship under more favourable auspices."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

1796, December 10, Cleveland Row.—"Mr. Ellis, who returns to you to-morrow with the instructions which have been prepared in consequence of your last dispatches, will be able to state to you verbally the little which is to be added to them. I flatter myself they will be found so full that nothing can be wanting to forward the negotiation except a disposition on the part of the Directory which I am persuaded does not exist, though the publick opinion at Paris may force them to go great lengths in appearances. You will observe that we are very strongly impressed with the impossibility of listening to any idea of leaving the Netherlands to France, and indeed I must say that, without carrying our point at least to the extent of obliging France to relinquish that possession, I do not see what solid advantage England would gain by a treaty which must contain the sacrifice of so many conquests.

"While I am upon this subject I cannot help mentioning to you in confidence that I have reason to believe that the Prussian minister at Paris has reported to his Court language on this point as coming from you which I am perfectly sure you never held to him, or indeed to any one else at Paris; but the circumstance is a reason for additional caution respecting a person of whom, I imagine, you do not think more favourably than I do.

"I have written to Lisbon to represent against M. d'Aranjo's being continued at Paris, but the chance of succeeding in any separate negotiation there (except on terms which the Portuguese Government will not consent to) is so small that they will hardly think it worth while to send a new negotiator there, and they will, of course, be unwilling to withdraw him whom they have there, till the last moment.

"I do not say more to you in my public letters about intelligence because I do not like to controvert what I strongly feel, the necessity of great caution in your situation. But, on the other hand, the importance of the object is such that something must be risked for it, and we should both of us blame ourselves if your mission should terminate abruptly, without your having established some means of our being better served in that respect than we have hitherto been. I have also desired Mr. Ellis to mention to you very particularly the necessity of frequent communication (at least once a week) in order to keep us informed of what is passing on the Continent now that the Elbe is frozen, and will probably continue so, with very short intervals, till February or March. Do not forget that Paris may be our only channel of communication, and, therefore, do not omit anything interesting from any quarter on the supposition that we already know it.

"Mr. Ellis will give you the details of our finance operations, which are wonderful even in the eyes of the most sanguine. I trust they will very greatly facilitate your negotiations, for there is no doubt that the Directory believed, au pied de la lettre, all they read and heard of the impossibility of our finding resources for another campaign. It remains to be seen whether they will be equally successful in their attempts for the same object. But what we have done certainly enables us to take a tone of more confidence in support of those demands which we think ourselves bound to adhere to.

"The answer from Vienna I think much more negative in form than in substance; and I conclude from it that the Austrians would not be sorry to be saved against their will, or rather against their declarations. We have at least obtained groundwork enough to proceed upon as far as the present state of our business requires, and very probably much further than it will in fact ever proceed.

"Mr. Ellis will be followed, in twenty-four hours after he sets out by a messenger whom you will have the goodness to send on to Vienna without delay, as I have no other certain mode of communicating with Sir M. Eden but through Paris. You will probably be enabled to say something to him of the first reception the proposals will have experienced. I have no idea that anything is to be done with the Directory but by firmness and steadiness; and I trust, therefore, that if you have not already received a favourable answer about Sir Sydney, you will not delay stating it in your dispatches that we may act accordingly. You can judge better upon the spot, but I cannot persuade myself that they could for two days stand the clamour which would be raised against them if they drove us to the necessity of retaliation. In all events I am clear that we owe it to our naval service not to let the business remain any longer in its present state.

"The peace of Naples is involved in so much confusion, and I fear I must add deceit, that I am at a loss what to say about it. In general I should have thought the terms favourable enough, and that we lost very little by the defection of such an ally which was not compensated by our no longer having the duty of protecting him. But when one sees on how nice a turn the business of Italy has been decided (if decided it has been) it is impossible not sometimes to think that 30 or 40,000 men, even Neapolitans, must have turned the scale. Till, therefore, we know the facts and circumstances we can neither approve nor disapprove, we can only regret."

LORD GRENVILLE TO LORD MALMESBURY.

1796, December 10, Cleveland Row.—"Since I wrote my other letter I have received the enclosed. I am afraid that the last paragraph may lead to much embarrassment, because if Aranjó makes any formal declaration of this nature, it will naturally renew the discussion whether the Emperor will do the same, and if not why France should be called upon to explain herself about terms of peace with Austria.

"You must do in this the best you can, and I thought it very material that you should be apprized of it."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, December 11, Windsor.—"This morning I have received Lord Grenville's box containing two dispatches for Lord Malmesbury with the draft of the note and mémoire confidentiel, as also a second mémoire confidentiel with regard to Spain and the Dutch, with an explanatory dispatch on that subject; which papers he has laid before the Cabinet, and obtained the approbation of all those present; I perceive Mr. Wyndham was not there. As the measure is so unanimously recommended, I shall not refuse to permit these being sent to Lord Malmesbury; though I should not do justice to my sincerity, if I did not add that I hope the propositions will be rejected by the Directory, as I cannot think either the terms proposed, or the time for treating, such as I can wish shall end the present struggle."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1796, December 11, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has the honour of submitting for your Majesty's royal signature two messages to the Houses of Parliament, communicating the declaration of war on the part of the King of Spain. He also begs leave to lay before your Majesty a printed declaration in answer to that of the Court of Madrid, which has been prepared by Lord Grenville's direction, and which, if your Majesty should approve of it, is proposed to be published and laid before Parliament to-morrow.

"Lord Grenville has seen Lord Bute, who does not bring anything new, except the most unfavourable accounts of the state of preparation in Portugal."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, December 12, Windsor.—"I return the messages for the two Houses of Parliament which I have signed in the usual manner, and highly approve of the printed answer to the declaration of the Court of Madrid which Lord Grenville has prepared, and which certainly ought to be published.

"I am sorry the information Lord Grenville has received from the Marquis of Bute is so unfavorable as to the state of preparation in Portugal."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, December 12, Stowe.—"As to my Exchequer Office I have satisfied my own mind, and I hope Mr. Pitt's, that it is best for me to state the actual deductions and the actual net receipts as clearly and distinctly as truth can make it. I am satisfied that the general arrangement of what is supposed to be reserved to my use is so much known, that it would be silly to attempt to conceal the facts stated in the report from the Commissioners of Accounts in 1780.

And the efficient officers are so well paid, that I shall not appear to have under done that part of the question as you will see by the annexed list. The net receipt which stands charged to me (though you know how much I pay yearly from it) will, after all, fall very short of Mr. Tiernay's expectations, as I understand he expects a net balance ever since 1793 of above 20,000*l. per annum*. The best mode of treating the question is by conceiving it a first step to the attack on private property; stating always that this was a private property granted to Mr. Grenville, and the existing arrangements upon it made (as was true) by him."

1796, December 13, Stowe.—“I know that it will give you pleasure to hear that I have received from Mr. Pitt the most marked attentions in the immediate expedition of my warrant for 7,000*l.*, and in the discussions with Bernard upon the subject of my office. He perfectly approves the return, varying it in some slight degree but not in the essentials. But I have likewise infinite satisfaction in receiving from him a letter to which I am very sensible, in answer to the thanks I thought myself bound to give him for the justice he did to the memory and services of my father. Though I have nothing to add, I write you these few lines because I know they will gratify you.”

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, December, Whitehall.—“I find upon inquiry that there is nothing that I can do in the case of Captain Munro; and that one of the plans which he proposes is not practicable at all. The oath is required in conformity to the directions of an Act of Parliament, and cannot therefore be dispensed with by any less authority; and the commissions in the Commissariat that entitle to half-pay, are made out at the War Office only in consequence of a communication of the King's pleasure from the Treasury."

GEORGE MONRO TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, July 1st, Ledbury.—"In the vast multiplicity of your business, my name has perhaps escaped your Lordship's memory; but, from what I know of your character, I am sure my services have not; and that you perfectly recollect I am the person that was sent to Paris, when it was thought proper, from the state of affairs there, to recall Lord Gower.

"I shall not trouble your Lordship with the services I rendered while there; whether great or small, they were performed to the utmost of my abilities; neither will I take up your time in stating the risks I ran, as I am sure you have forgot neither of them, nor the promises made by your Lordship (through Sir James Burges) to provide handsomely for me; for that was the message delivered by him to me in your name.

"After what I have stated, your Lordship no doubt will be surprised when I tell you that, as yet, I have little or nothing permanent done for me; and the little I may have has not been given me even by your Lordship. This, however, I am far from imputing to you, or anyone in administration. It has arisen from circumstances too tedious to trouble you with, and a course of ill luck, which can still be easily remedied if your Lordship thinks proper to interest yourself about me.

"To make the matter short, I am so situate at present as to hold two appointments in the army, that of Captain, and Assistant-Commissary. They are both commissions entitled to half-pay; the first is five shillings a day, and the other seven shillings and sixpence. Could I hold the half-pay of both these places I should think myself most amply provided for; but that is impossible without your Lordship's interest. Should you be kind enough to give me that, I am given to understand that in particular cases there is such a thing as an order issued from one of the Secretary of State's Office (or from the Treasury) to the Pay Office, directing the Paymaster-General to dispense with the oath half-pay officers are obliged to take. Could I get this dispensation for my half-pay as Assistant Commissary, it is exactly what I would wish. Should your Lordship however not approve of this, I would be obliged to you to get my eldest son, George Monro, appointed Assistant Commissary in my place (it is necessary to mention the boy is only twelve years old).

"Should your Lordship be kind enough to procure me either of these favours (I should prefer the first) I shall then (holding my Captain's half-pay) have twelve shillings and sixpence a day, which I shall gratefully think an ample provision for myself and three children. As in all probability I shall soon be obliged to join my regiment in the West Indies, I am anxious to have this done prior to my departure; I therefore look up to your Lordship for protection with that anxiety a father naturally has for his children."

LORD MALMESBURY TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, December 20, Paris.—"You will, I am sure, forgive my not answering fully your kind private letter by Ellis, and allow me to postpone the doing till we meet, which, although it is perhaps a little sooner than you expected it would be, is not at all sooner than I wish it. I hope I am not mistaken in thinking we have died well; certain I am that I quit this world without regret.

"The death of the Empress of Russia has, I have the best reasons to believe, very much influenced their conduct here.

"We shall be at Calais on Saturday night or Sunday morning."

Postscript.—"I have not been unmindful of Sir S. Smyth, and will post in the form of a dispatch an account of the steps I have taken, and give it to you when we meet."

————— to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, December 21, Vienna.—"Before I quit this city, I take the opportunity of throwing together, and probably without method, some ideas which have offered, as well as some information received. I am assured that a principal lure for bringing Spain into the war against you was the promise to put a second son of Spain on the throne of France. This consists well with various indications which have fallen under my notice, so that I cannot withhold my belief; but you have probably a perfect knowledge of the business as far as it has gone. I now believe it was not unknown at Berlin when I was there, for I observed some little incidents then unaccountable, and which stand explained by that idea. I conclude also that, if the Emperor's arms do not prevail in Italy, Naples will throw herself into the scale against you, and drag the Pope along with him; in which case I shall expect that the French will make use of the resources in Italy for carrying the war, aided by the Turks, into Hungary and the Ukraine. On the other hand, if the Emperor be successful, he will have an enormous superiority of force there, and it must be his own fault if he do not find resources. He will come in by the droit du plus fort as successor to the French, who now hold by that same right; and may declare that, as this war is evidently carried on by his enemy for the destruction of property, he expects and insists that the proprietors pay for the protection afforded them; and considers the petty Sovereigns of that country as entitled only to an expectancy in their dominions, to be realized when the war shall be at an end. Naples, which has all along played a double game, is too far off for him; but your fleet may show good reasons to the Neapolitan Administration why, in preserving the peace concluded with France, they should pay a monthly sum to aid the Emperor in defraying the expenses of the war. Our holy father the Pope is desirous to connect himself with Austria rather than with France, because this last has brought the question off from political to personal interests; and in so doing has acted unwisely. If you are superior in the Mediterranean, and your ally in Italy, will it not be worth while to transport 30,000 Austrians to Barcelona, and dictate a peace there to Spain? In this case the Pope can be useful, and I have reason to believe that he would come into any measures you would wish. I have mentioned this thing to the Baron de Thugut, who thought it very good for you, but did not see how this country, which has no marine, could derive any benefit from commercial privilege in the ports of Spanish America. I told him that such privileges, opening a trade from Trieste and Fiume to the new world, would invigorate their pecuniary means, and eventually raise for them some marine. That you could not but see with pleasure a new maritime Power in the Mediterranean, which would check there the influence of your natural enemies. That, in like manner, you could not but favour a commerce whose operation must go to diminish that of France, without affecting your own by any possibility. And as you would be sometimes obliged to call on them for aid at land, you would be the more ready to give them help at sea, and vice versa; which mutual state of dependence would strengthen the bands of friendship between you. He did not seem to think there was any cause of apprehension from the indolent Turk; and the rather, as Prussia is equally interested with Austria and Russia in preserving the peace of Poland. But here he is, I believe, mistaken. It would suit Prussia perfectly well to erect again a kingdom of Poland in that part of it which is occupied by the Imperial Courts; and I know it is in the system of Prussian politics to play off, in case of necessity, a Polish insurrection against Russia. The death of the Empress changes, in my opinion, the state of affairs very much. I do not believe you will have any assistance from the new Emperor, because the population and finances of his country really require repose; because it is not his interest to strengthen so powerful a neighbour as Austria; because he is equally interested with France in preserving that anarchy which goes by the name of the German Empire; and, above all, because in his quality of successor to the throne, he is naturally disposed to adopt measures different from those of his predecessor. What reasons he has to stimulate him beyond the usual measure of new Princes, and what evidences he has given of their influence over him, it is needless to mention. You will have seen how he is straining at popularity; a conduct which, in my opinion, savours more of puerile vanity than of sound discretion. It is to act not to be the monarch, and suits better the theatre than the throne. I stated to Monsieur de Thugut my conviction that he would have no aid from Russia, without detailing my reasons; and, on that ground, suggested the engaging Prussia in a manner I have formerly mentioned to your Lordship. He considered it as impossible to bind that court by any engagements. This did not surprise me, but I replied that, admitting their infidelity, it would only follow that the consideration for their services should be eventual, and depend on the success of their exertions. He startled at the idea of giving strength to Prussia; but I observed that if he gained Bavaria, it would be more than a compensation for anything which Prussia could get. That, moreover, the case supposing you in a position to influence the decisions of Holland, it would result that the most abundant resources in men, money, and other means of war would be thus united. That Prussia could not carry on two campaigns, if the war were carried into their country. That geographical reasons, the only ones to be relied on for any considerable period, having placed Russia in direct enmity with Prussia, the aggrandizement of the latter would be the best method of obtaining the cordial assistance of the other. That on a peace, France, if reduced to her antient limits, would be for a long time hors de combat; in which case nothing could prevent Austria and Russia from crushing Prussia, which must ever be considered as the naturally ally of France. He asked me whether I thought the English prejudice against standing armies might not make them unwilling to hold the Low Countries. To this I replied that, in my opinion, the present situation of England was such that the danger to liberty did not arise from the too great power of the executive magistrate, but the contrary; and that I did suppose the good sense of the nation would turn with pleasure to the contemplation of a force which might, in case of necessity, be called in to protect property against those who wish to destroy it; and who in that view are endeavouring under plausible pretences to overturn the Government. I think I might have added that this would be a safer resource than such interior regulations as circumstances may otherwise require ; but I did not choose then, nor do I wish now, to tread further on this tender ground.

"I mentioned to M. de Thugut the situation of Monsieur de la Fayette, and found that they wished never to have taken him, and would now be glad to get rid of him, but see no way in which it can be done conveniently. I proposed his liberation in a moment of rejoicing for any good news, but this did not seem to take. He told me, however, that if England would ask for him, they would readily give him up ; and the King might, if he pleased, let him loose in London. Now I wish you to consider that, when peace takes place, he will of course be liberated, and go to America. He will have more or less influence there. I believe he will have a good deal. You may, if you please, send him thither under such a weight of notorious obligation that he shall be incapacitated from dis-serving you. And, if you take him now, there are two supposable cases in which, if he were twenty times a Frenchman, he would be inclined to serve you ; namely a restoration of the titular monarch, or the full establishment of the present rulers of his country. In all cases you would do an act agreeable to America, which would cost you nothing ; and I am sure you are not to learn that such things propitiate more the minds of men than more solid services, which, however they may promote the interests, seldom fail to wound the pride of the obliged party. Should you incline to this measure, the least hint would induce the American Minister to request it on the part of the United States ; unless, which I should deem the better mode, you did it of your own motion. The effect would then be great even in France, for though he is now of no importance there, that nation is highly sensible to every act of nobleness and generosity."

THE EARL OF ELGIN TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1796, December 21, Berlin.—"I beg leave to advert to a subject which I should not have submitted to your Lordship had not an occasion offered in which its influence on public affairs had become very evident.

"In many parts of the continent of Europe there are sects whose tenets and doctrines supersede every other consideration ; and who hold together in spite of every principle of disunion, whether of country, of national religion, or of political interests. Much has been said of the Illuminés, who have been supposed to have great influence at Berlin. I have no reason, however, to suppose that to be the case. But most certainly there are here many of the sect, called la secte pieuse, whose fundamental doctrine consists in attributing everything to faith, and supernatural interposition. This sect has many partisans in Russia, and the present Emperor is supposed to be at the head of it. About five years ago a Prince Traboulsky was banished with his family into the Ukraine for having carried on a correspondence on the part of this description of people. He is now recalled to Petersburg ; and a Russian, of the name of ———, who has resided some time here and was equally concerned in the above correspondence, is preparing to return to his country at the recommendation of the King of Prussia. Prince Repnin appears to have been much engaged in the mysteries of this sect, for M. Haugwitz speaking lately confidentially of him said, je ne le connais pas personnellement, mais nous avons été autrefois dans les liaisons les plus étroites ; referring to these doctrines. It is chiefly from being initiated into the higher ranks of this sect, that Count

Bruhl has been selected for the purpose of congratulating the Emperor on his accession. That had been formerly a bond of much union between them; and Count Bruhl goes both on this account, and with a view to establish in the Emperor's mind the attachment of the King and his ministers to these doctrines.

"Your Lordship knows that Count Bruhl married a daughter of M. Gomm, one of the most absurd and violent enthusiasts."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, December 25, Windsor.—"I have received Lord Grenville's note transmitting the one he has had from Baron Rieger. All the answer I can possibly give is that I hope the letter that has been written by the Duke of Gloucester will have been received by the Hereditary Prince in time to prevent his present inconvenient journey; but least that should not be the case, I desire Lord Grenville, after mentioning this in his note to Baron Rieger, will remind him that, should the Prince come, it is hoped it will be as a short visit, for that I abide by my resolution that the marriage of my daughter cannot be at this time, nor till I think her situation in Germany will be free from the perils of war. Since Somerset House has been turned into public offices I have no house for lodging any foreign prince; Lord Grenville must therefore send to the Lord Chamberlain, and the best ready furnished house that can be found must be hired for his reception, and application must be made to the Admiralty for a frigate for the prince's passage from Cuxhaven, an allowance given to the captain for providing him on this occasion, as is now done when they carry any passenger by command.

Since writing, I have found in another box Lord Grenville's note and the decyphered letter from Mr. Arbuthnot on the subject of the Duke of Ostragothia. I lose not an instant in desiring Mr. Arbuthnot may be acquainted that any proposal of the kind would not be accepted by me, that therefore he should clearly explain this, that no further idea of such a negotiation may exist."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1796, December 28, Windsor.—"As Lord Grenville seems to wish to have my opinion on the paper to be published on the cause of the rupture of the negotiation at Paris for peace, I have rapidly read it, and can assure him that I think it is that cool discussion which must satisfy those who were desirous of the negotiation terminating with a peace; perhaps if, at the end, a summary of the wicked principles of France, and how much they must be shocking to every man of probity, would have been pleasing to those who seriously view the subject; but the omitting this may perhaps, as far as others are wished to be gained, appear to some, though not to me, more prudent."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1796-1797].—"I see no tolerable report in any of the newspapers of your Demosthenes sentence, or of any of the most striking parts of your speech. I wish you would employ an hour to put down both that particular sentence, and, as well as you can remember it, all that related to the reasons for staying in office, the sort of peace which Opposition would make and be hanged for, the conciliation with Ireland, and the connection with the Corresponding Society. As much more as you please, but these topics are really what would be of the most essential use. I called to mention this but found you gone to the woods."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1796-1797].—"I make haste to prepare you for a visit which you will have from the Duc d'Harcourt, on a subject which he judged very rightly that I might probably be informed of, though I made a pretence of ignorance, leaving it to you to admit to him what degree of knowledge you should think proper. I take it for granted, indeed, that in return for his frankness and confidence, you will think it right to state to him what Ministry know upon the subject. I am rather sorry to find that our Breton friend, whose arrival here you know of, has not observed all the good faith which we had reason to expect from him. If he found it absolutely necessary for him to have a communication directly with the Princes, he should not have told us that he meant to have none. I am not, however, willing to infer from thence that he is a person not to be trusted. It is possible also, though hardly probable, that the whole of this communication supposed to be made from him to the Princes may be a forgery, at least it does not appear that he has communicated to them the secret of his being here; and a communication with them of some sort he has, if I am not mistaken, avowed.

"It might still, therefore, be possible to keep the Duc d'Harcourt ignorant to a certain degree of his being here, supposing it were expedient to do so; but the integrity of the Duke of Harcourt's character, the reliance that may be placed on his prudence and his conduct in this affair, all make it advisable probably that no reserve should be used with him, but that he should fairly be taken into counsel; though certainly, previously to this partial communication to the Princes, one should have wished that the affair had remained entirely in the hands of Government here."

CABINET MINUTE.

1797, January 2.—"It is agreed to authorise Lord Grenville to give to M. Duvergne de R. an assurance of receiving—

1. "Twenty thousand per month, for three months certain, to cover the expense of intelligence, and of the allowance to the force which the royal agents are collecting in the central departments of Paris with a view to act after the elections if necessary, or to resist any attempt to supersede the elections.

2. "An engagement that, if the case shall arise, 15,000*l.* shall be paid for clothing men in dépôt at Rouen.

3. "An engagement that, if the scheme should actually take place and should lead to the actual assembling of an army, 30,000*l.* shall be paid in the first month after such event shall happen."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, January 4, Berne.—"I shall do no more to day than inform your Lordship of M. de Précy's safe arrival. I find him to the last degree grateful for the kindness which your Lordship had shown him.

"I have no intelligence respecting the fleet but what will be found in the enclosures of the annexed dispatch. M. de la Harpe is constantly closeted with the Minister La Croix on the business which has lately occupied the Abbé Girod. The death of the Empress of Russia is, I believe, the principal cause of Lord Malmesbury's having been dismissed in so hasty and indecent a manner.

"The Prince of Carency is the author of the articles that have lately appeared against England in the Journal Général and the Journal des Hommes Libres. The Abbé B. informs me, in justification of the momentary confidence he had given him, that that young man had been entrusted by his father with the whole secret of the negotiation alluded to in my public dispatch No. 66.

"Montgaillard is here after having had a violent quarrel with M. d'Entraigues.

"We are all going wrong again in this country. The French faction has again taken the lead, and has commenced its operations by a most scandalous and indecent act of partiality. Colonel Grose, the Commandant of the contingent of this canton at Basle, has been recalled because he paid a visit to the Prince of Orange (who came there with Prince Frederick in the month of October last) with his orange cockade in his hat. Your Lordship will observe that M. Grose has passed his life in the Dutch service, and that he was appointed to the command of the contingent subsequent to the fact complained of.

658. 1557. 3978. 1220. 2176. 865. 315.

1551. 1701. 2944. 2948. 1478. 2963. 566. 2817. 410.
1339. 1701. 1255.

"The measures alluded to in your Lordship's late despatches will oblige me to draw for a large sum immediately, probably ten thousand pounds."

Enclosed is a note in French of remarks of a very general character on the war between Great Britain and France.

COUNT WOROUZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, January 9, Richmond.—"Connaissant mes sentiments, vous pouvez concevoir combien je suis douloureusement affecté des dépêches que nous a apporté votre dernier courier de Petersbourg. La seule consolation que j'ai reçue est l'assurance positive que me donnent mes amis qui sont bien informés que l'Empereur n'est pas pour la Cour de Berlin en fait de politique, et qu'admirateur de l'ordre et de la discipline de l'armée Prussienne qu'il veut imiter, il n'est nullement Prussien pour le reste, et qu'il est très décidé à contenir Frédéric Guillaume, s'il s'avise d'inquiéter l'Autriche. Attaché comme je suis à ce pays-ci, je crois de mon devoir de vous faire observer, que si vous voulez avoir une escadre Russe pour le printemps prochain, il faut vous presser sans perdre de tems, et envoyer des ordres au Chevalier Whitworth pour qu'il presse chez nous l'arrangement de cette expédition, pour que les ordres soient donnés avant le départ de la Cour pour Moscow, ce qui aura lieu au mois de Mars. Si la chose n'est pas arrangée avant, il y aura des lenteurs interminables, car Moscow est à 500 miles d'Angleterre de Petersbourg, et de Cronstadt où sont l'administration et le dépôt de notre marine.

"Pour l'amour de Dieu ne perdez pas de tems. Ce n'est pas que je crois qu'une escadre de notre faible marine d'un très grand secours pour vous; mais il faut avoir égard à l'opinion qui dans toutes les affaires, et surtout en politique, gouverne le monde. L'union du pavillon Russe avec celui de la Grande Bretagne aurait une grande influence sur l'opinion générale en Europe. Et cela servira toujours de maintenir l'union des deux pays. Ceux qui se tiennent par la main sont plus prêt de l'embrasser que ceux qui se tiennent éloignés l'un de l'autre. Notre escadre unies avec les vôtres prouvera par le fait les mensonges que le Prusse ne cesse de débiter à Paris. Je ne doute nullement que vous ne sentiez tout ceci beaucoup mieux que moi, et je me flatte que vous vous presserez d'envoyer un exprès à cet effet au M. Whitworth."

French.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, January 10, Windsor.—"As Lord Grenville has no particular business to call him to town this day, I perfectly consent to his remaining at Dropmore; he is so thoroughly worked by business in general, that it is but just he should have some relaxation when it fairly occurs.

"I am happy at finding the letters from Ireland show that, so late as Thursday, great probability subsisted that the French fleet could not yet be far off, consequently that Lord Bridport may give a good account [of] it; he may have been by Friday morning off that coast."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, January 11, Windsor.—"In the box which contains this, I received letters from Lord Grenville and from Mr. Pitt, but as they both relate to the same business I shall only answer that from Lord Grenville, and desire it may be looked upon as an answer to both.

"I perfectly coincide in the opinion that, in the present state of things, private negotiations are preferable to public ones, and that Lord Grenville shall instruct Monsieur de Luc now at Hanover (by sending the letter under cover to Monsieur de Steinberg my privy counsellor) to return to Brunswick and persuade the dispatching General Stamford instantly to Berlin, and authorising him to offer such sum as Lord Grenville and Mr. Pitt may think right to the King of Prussia in case France shall involve him into a fresh war by his defending the north of Germany.

"I approve of the idea of getting Prince Frederick of Orange to return to Vienna; the avowed reason may be the concerns of his family; I wish therefore Lord Grenville would sound him through Baron Nagell as to his willingness if pressed by me to return to Vienna. He certainly should go by Berlin, from whence he may be also employed on the present occasion; and a communication through Sir Charles Whitworth to Russia will certainly do all the good that can be effected there."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, January 13, Windsor.—"The box I have just received from Lord Grenville contains the private letters from Wurtemberg brought by Count Warkvill for me and the Queen. I authorize Lord Grenville to bring him on Wednesday to St. James's; I shall order the mourning for Sunday the 21st, by which means the Court will be the next week in colours."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. WICKHAM.

1797, January 13, London.—"Although it is not improbable that Mr. Talbot may reach you before this letter, I take the chance of mentioning to you that the present state of the Foreign Office making Mr. Flint's presence there absolutely necessary, Mr Talbot will immediately be sent to replace him. He will have the character of Secretary of Legation, and I have every reason to hope that you will be satisfied with his talents, discretion, and industry. You will have the goodness to mention this to Mr. Flint, who I trust has continued to deserve the satisfactory manner in which you have spoken of him in your letter."

Copy.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, January 19, Stowe.—"You are very good to remember me on a subject and in a moment so interesting to us all. If Lord B[ridport] has good fortune with the unaccounted-for divisions of the French fleet, the consequences are uncalculable; particularly when coupled with all that is known to exist in France, and with the actual state of the politics of Italy, which I hope are now safe; for the capture of Mantua seems wholly out of the question, and the retreat of the French seems almost as certain. I wish Kehl was taken; for I fear least the Arch-Duke's illness or possible death may turn the tide once more in that quarter. I never yet have been so sanguine as I am in the present moment; for Talbot's information has confirmed the very interesting intelligence of which I have seen part; and of which the whole has been long since shown to Mr. Pitt or to you; and from which I expect so much."

— to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, January 26, Dresden.—"Just before I left Vienna I was told by a person of good understanding, who has tolerable means of information, that the Emperor is hurt at his brother's high reputation. In short, is struck deep with jealous envy, and that as soon as the fate of Kehl should be decided, Prince Charles, having made the needful arrangements, would come to Vienna, from whence, said my informant, he will never return to the army. I hope this may be a mistake, for he is adored by the soldiery who think themselves invincible under his command; and that idea goes, as your Lordship well knows, a great way towards making them so. Moreover I have learnt from an old and discerning friend whom I met with at Vienna, and who spoke from personal knowledge, that the Prince is really a man of talents, to whom nothing but experience was wanting to make an able commander. I think it a great pity that the courts of Berlin and Vienna cannot be brought together in the present crisis. The feelings of the latter are very poignant, and Sir Morton seems fully to share them; but policy is, we know, a creature void of passions. I have but a moment to acknowledge the honour of your Lordship's letter of the 22nd of August, which should have reached me at Berlin; but I had unfortunately left that city before Mr. Hammond arrived. Mr. Elliot gave it to me two days ago. I have some reason to believe that you may yet bring the Prussian Cabinet to hear reason."

W. WINDHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, January 31, Park Street.—"I enclose a letter, which Hippisley has chose to convey through me. The object is certainly one that I wish well to, as to everything that may contribute to save Italy and encourage the noble spirit that has shown itself in some of the states of that country. I cannot rejoice for my own part that our troops have not been able to quit Elba, and suspect that they may be of more consequence there, than they will at present in Portugal.

"What is meant to be done respecting the offer made from Malta? The total abandonment of the Mediterranean has always seemed to me the most desperate of all measures.

"With respect to furnishing to the Pope any part of our troops, I am afraid it must be considered as rather an idle fancy. But it will be a great pity if, when the Pope thinks that resistance is practicable, at least for a certain time, he should be incapable of it for want of arms, or that exertions for supplying him should not be made from here. Arms sufficiently good for his purpose may certainly be obtained from the country.

"As I am enclosing suggestions, let me add one which I likewise think not undeserving of consideration, and which may certainly in the end, should we be in a state to adopt it, lead to consequences the most important. One would certainly be disposed to do whatever our finances would admit to help the Swiss into a quarrel."

"Quoiqu'il ne puisse plus être question dans ce moment d'un subside tel qu'on aurait été en état de donner aux Suisses en 1792 et 1793, pour les décider à faire cause commune avec les Puissances Alliés, ce à quoi il eut été facile alors de réussir, cependant il ne faut pas se dissimuler que la grande difficulté qui se présentera dans chaque canton où les provocations de la France deviendront même les plus sensibles, sera, comme ci-devant, l'impossibilité de fournir, au-delà d'un temps très limité, aux besoins et aux dépenses d'entretien de l'armée de milices qui serait nécessaire pour couvrir une étendue de frontières aussi considérable que celle de Genève à Basle.

"Et néanmoins la levée de ces milices, et l'attitude guerrière qui prendrait par là la Suisse sont de la plus grande importance au Gouvernement Britannique, soit parceque cela obligerait les Français à tenir sur les mêmes frontières un corps tout au moins d'observation, qui diminuerait d'autant la force de leurs troupes dirigées contre l'Empereur, soit parceque, d'un instant à l'autre, et suivant les circonstances, cela amènerait une rupture ouverte, et forcerait les Suisses à devenir, au fin de compte, les auxiliaires très actifs de l'Empereur. Il est donc à considérer si une offre d'aide et secours pécuniaires, relatifs seulement à l'entretien des milices excédantes qu'il s'agirait de mettre sur pied, et qui ne sont point à comparer avec des levées et équipements de régiments tels que ceux qui passent de Suisse au service étranger, ne serait pas en même temps et une mesure politique sage, et une véritable économie.

"Risquerait-on beaucoup à sonder le terrain à cet égard, surtout s'il s'en présente une occasion favorable par la suite des défiances et de l'irritation que le ton hautain et chicanier de la France peut augmenter rapidement dans les cantons les plus influens; mais afin que la chose fût absolument cachée au Gouvernement Français, et n'excitât pas les clameurs de ses partisans et amis en diverses parties de la Suisse, il conviendrait essentiellement qu'elle ne se traitât qu'avec les chefs du canton de Berne, en sorte que ceux-ci puissent déterminer leurs Conseils à accorder pour un temps illimité aux cantons pauvres le secours dont ils auraient besoin relativement à leurs milices tant qu'ils seraient sur pied, avec la certitude d'être remboursés ici de la majeure partie de ces secours, jusqu'à un quantum qui serait à-peu-près fixé, et de la manière que, vis-à-vis des autres cantons, l'avance à long terme, soit le prêt à très bas intérêt, (et plutôt ainsi stipulé pour la forme) parut émaner uniquement du trésor de leurs Excellences de Berne.

"Cela serait fort aisé à régler si cette affaire, quant à tous ses détails, était traité ici où Leurs Excellences de Berne ont des fonds très considérables, dont les dividendes sont perçus par la maison Vanneck ; et, au moyen d'arrangements secrets et néanmoins solides, on leur bonifierait sans que rien parut au dehors ce qu'elles avanceraient soit autres cantons, soit (en parti) à leurs propres levées, somme dont le total ne serait nullement majeur pour les finances de l'Angleterre, et pourrait cependant par son emploi produire un résultat très majeur dans la tournure des affaires à la campagne prochaine."

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, February 3, Bath.—"I had already received from Admiral Barrington a note upon the subject you mention, and had communicated it to my friends at the Board for their consideration. The position he mentions in it (though I have not any maps to refer to here) must, I should suppose, be only tenable when the wind is easterly ; but, as such, may very probably be an advantageous one for watching Dunkirk. It is not however correctly stated, when it is called Dunkirk harbour, where, I assume, no ships could anchor out of reach of their guns ; but the spot meant usually goes under the name of Gravelines pits, and lies between Dunkirk and Calais. In a westerly wind I should think this must be dangerous, and would be ineffectual into the bargain, as they may always go out of Dunkirk eastward when the wind is not east. If the road is sheltered, I should suppose it must answer very well.

"I have a note unanswered of yours about Cadiz. If the present state of the force at Brest would admit of our so much weakening the channel fleet, and if we were more certain than we are of the arrival of our troops from Elba, the idea, though a very dashing one, might perhaps do ; but under impressions which I cannot help feeling of the great probability of some other desperate attempt from Brest, and in the actual state of our channel fleet which has been unavoidably very much battered by their late ineffectual cruise, and which will barely be ready again as soon as it is possible the French may have another fleet at sea, I own I cannot advise the measure.

"I send you to-day by Mr. Taylor the box containing Wickham's letters. It seems very difficult to form any judgment from them, as, no doubt, even if his intelligence was more clear and decided than it is, much alteration must since have taken place in their plans."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, February 4, Downing Street.—"Les nouvelles d'Italie que nous venons de recevoir par Paris sont affreuses. Elles paraissent, malheureusement, de toute vérité, puisqu'elles sont conséquentes au plan de M. d'Alvinzi. Je ne doute pas que le Directoire n'envoie immédiatement des nouvelles propositions de paix à Vienne ; il les fera même d'un avantage apparent pour essayer de nous séparer de vous. Comme j'aime à juger ma Cour d'après mon cœur, et d'après l'exemple du passé, je me flatte qu'on restera toujours inébranlable. Mais, en même temps, je ne puis me défendre d'une sorte de crainte. Songez qu'il n'y a que l'Empereur et M. de Thugut qui soient dans le bon système. Ils vont être plus assaillis que jamais par les fauteurs d'une paix déshonorante. Je ne doute pas qu'on ne persévère; mais on peut tout appréhender dans ce monde.

"La vertu la plus sévère succombe quelque fois, je frémis à l'idée de la seule possibilité de séparer nos intérêts des vôtres. Vous savez combien je suis Anglais, parceque je suis véritable Autrichien, ou plutôt parceque je suis un homme honnête, attaché au sort de l'Europe et au maintien des monarchies.

"Il serait, je crois, bien important que vous envoyassiez aussi promptement que possible un courier à Vienne pour y rassurer, et encourager, en appuyant cet envoi de motifs déterminans. Si même cette mesure était inutile comme je l'espère, elle ne peut rien gêner, et ne doit que vous ranimer. Pardonnez ces réflexions, qui sont dans notre confiance. Elles doivent vous prouver mon attachement. On craint toujours quand on aime bien. Il est souvent si aisé, en s'y prenant à temps, de prévenir les plus grands malheurs."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, February 6, London.—Quoique le courier que j'attends de Vienne, et qui doit me rapporter les instructions nécessaires à l'égard de la convention qui concerne vos avances mensuelles, ne soit point encore arrivé, je me fais un vrai plaisir d'avoir l'honneur de vous annoncer que j'ai appris, par une voie sûre non-officielle, qu'on a accueilli vos dernières propositions avec l'amitié reconnaissante qu'elles méritaient. Cette information me rassure un peu sur le fâcheux effet que pourra produire la mauvaise nouvelle de la défaite d'Alvinzy. J'ai de nouveau la certitude que les Français veulent faire des offres avantageux à ma Cour pour la détacher de l'Angleterre. J'aime à croire à la bonne foi; et la conduite constante de mon maître me raffermir dans cet heureux sentiment. Mais je plains l'Empereur et son ministre; ils auront des rudes attaques à soutenir. Il s'agira, je crois, de défendre seulement le Tyrol, et de porter des plus grandes forces encore vers le Rhin. N'y aurait-il pas moyen pour nous fournir la possibilité de détacher beaucoup de troupes de l'Italie, de forcer le Roi de Naples à rentrer en jeu? Il a une armée assez considérable prête à marcher. Je ne voudrais pas qu'il vous en coutât beaucoup plus que des menaces; mais l'Amiral Jarvis venant près de Naples, comme fit Truguet au commencement de la guerre, pourrait bien produire le même effet. Ceci est peut-être un songe creux; pardonnez-le à mon zèle.

"Vous pourriez, en outre, nous prouver d'une manière bien digne de vous dans ce moment combien vous vous occupez de nos intérêts. Il était convenu entre nous que vous nous payeriez les 300,000 livres du mois de Janvier immédiatement. Cet argent a été mis à notre disposition; mais vous vous appellerez en même temps, qu'en nous promettant de nous faire encore au mois de Février une avance semblable, vous vouliez attendre notre réponse pour mettre cette somme à notre disposition. Cette réponse ne peut plus tarder, et sera conforme à vos désirs. Ainsi si vous m'autorisiez à mander par votre courier que nous pouvons, dès à présent, tirer ces 300,000 livres, ce procédé, rempli de grace de votre part, serait apprécié comme il doit l'être dans la circonstance, et vous ne courrez aucun risque. Je me flatte que vous m'applaudirez vous-même d'avoir suggéré cette idée à votre désir constant de nous être utile, si votre bon esprit ne m'avait pas déjà prévenu."

SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797. February 23, St. Petersburg.—“In about ten or twelve days, we shall, I presume, be on the road to Moscow. It is supposed that His Imperial Majesty will, immediately after the ceremony of the coronation, proceed further into the interior of his dominions, and, in that case, it is possible that he may do me the honour to invite me to accompany him. I therefore request His Majesty’s eventual permission so to do ; but I do not scruple to confess to your Lordship that, although it would be highly flattering, yet I am no wise ambitious of such a distinction ; His Imperial Majesty being of that sort of character with which it is easier to live at a little distance than too near.”

LORD GRENVILLE to the EARL OF ELGIN.

Private.

1797, March 2, Downing Street.—“You will see by the tenor of my despatches of this night that we are full of distrust as to the sincerity of all the professions made to you. In truth if they were sincere, why were not the proposals and offers made distinctly and plainly from them whose intentions we have so much reason to distrust, and why is so much stress laid on instructions and powers to be had from us, all whose wishes, views, and means are notorious to them and to all Europe? What more can we say than we have said, and said publicly? and what necessity would there be for wrapping up their good intentions, if good they are, in mystery, dissimulation, and reserve? Still we do not wish to discourage whatever tendency there may be, however remote, to a system conformable to our interests and to those of Europe. But all possible care must be taken not to lose Austrian realities in pursuing Prussian expectations, and such would, I fear, be the event of any new overtures to be made from hence to Prussia till after the fullest communication with Vienna.

“All these speculations seem to set very much at a distance the object of your application contained in your private letter; nor would it be possible for me to say anything upon the subject of that application without much more consideration, and a nearer view of the circumstances that may exist.”

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR MORTON EDEN.

Private.

1797, March 3, Cleveland Row.—“I have only time just to add to these despatches that Count Starhemberg has no knowledge of my sending on this messenger to Vienna, because I thought it might be more agreeable to M. Thugut that the subject now in question should not be previously known to him.

“I cannot say I have much hopes in this scheme of Prussian co-operation, and yet, if M. Thugut could be brought to look at it deliberately, I think that even from the opening such a discussion at Berlin much good must arise; although, possibly, the ultimate object, that of co-operation, may not be obtained. It is very material to observe that the basis of this plan is the scheme of peace already offered by the allies; and, therefore, that all the former objections of making confidences to Prussia which might be betrayed from Berlin to Paris, are, in this case, totally inexplicable.

"If this idea does not produce something, we may be under the absolute necessity of having recourse to Russia, and that very soon. I wish, therefore, that you would converse with M. Thugut on that subject that we may know his general notions, and that he may not be wholly unprepared to hear from us upon it. You will at once perceive how urgent this would be if our difficulties of finance should shut our purse to Austria, which, though I still allow myself to hope will not happen, I am sure no man can answer for."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 8, Queen's House.—"In one of the two boxes I received this morning from Lord Grenville's Office there was a letter to him from Baron Rieger desiring to have the Princess Royal's picture, if ready, that he might send it tomorrow by a messenger to the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg at Hamburg. I therefore send the snuff-box I have had prepared on the occasion with my daughter's picture, which I desire Lord Grenville will send to that Prince with a suitable compliment. I have since seen the Duke of Gloucester, who came to communicate to me a conversation he has had with M. de Whymphen, who is the real confidant of the Prince, who again presses for leave to come over; he has also heard from the grand intriguer Hipsley [Hippesley] who says the Prince must be at Stutgard in May. I therefore desired the Duke of Gloucester to say any directions I should send would be through the channel of Lord Grenville, as I think, if the Duke of Gloucester had written as strongly as he promised, this fresh application would not be made. I desire therefore that, though Lord Grenville may send the box through the channel of Baron Rieger, that he will separately converse with Monsieur de Whymphen, and show him the impossibility of my agreeing to the Prince's coming here till the treaty of marriage has been drawn up and ratified, and the other arrangements for the wedding settled; that if the Prince is obliged to go to Stutgard in May, he had best do so, as it [is] impossible the whole can be arranged so soon. I think Whymphen had best return to Hamburgh and explain the business to the Prince.

"I have sent to Hanover for some information as to the affairs of the Duke as well as Duchy of Wurtemberg, which I must have before I can give any directions to Lord Grenville with regard to the treaty of marriage; and indeed the perplexed state of Germany requires my not being over expeditious in transacting this business."

"By the précis of the treaty of marriage of the present Duchess of Brunswick, it was, by the first article, regulated that the marriage should be solemnized in England; a similar article for that of the Princess Royal with the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg.

2nd Article. "The portion to be eighty thousand pounds.

3rd Article. "As the Hereditary Prince has children by his first marriage, it seems natural that no distinction should be made as to the future children of this marriage, but those of each sex to share equally.

4th. "The children to live and be brought up in the Duchy of Wurtemberg; but not to marry without the consent of the king or his successors, agreeable to the present act for marriages of the royal family.

5th. "In case the Princess should die without children, half her portion to remain with the Court of Wurtemberg, and the other half to be disposable by her; and that, if she leaves no disposition, to return to the king. But the survivor of her or the Prince to receive the whole interest during their lives.

6th. "One-half at least of the fortune to be placed in the English funds; perhaps it might be better to have the whole placed there till the troubles of Germany are totally quieted; and then, if it be thought that the one moiety be placed on mortgage in lands or other revenues belonging to the House of Wurtemberg, that not to be without the consent of the king.

6th [7th]. "The Princess to have a pension on the Irish establishment of £5,000 per annum during her life for her sole use; but with no power to alienate or mortgage it.

"I do not mean to add any pension as Elector; that was peculiar to the case of the Duchess of Brunswick, as it had been intended she should live in my Electorate.

"A German treaty must also be made with me as Elector, wherein the usual German portion will be fixed, and the jointure that is to be settled on my daughter."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 9, London.—"J'ai été bien fâché d'apprendre que vous êtes incommodé; j'espère que cela n'aura aucune espèce de suite. Vous connaissez mon tendre et véritable attachement à votre personne.

"Je serai obligé de vous prier de vouloir bien me dédommager incessamment de la conférence d'aujourd'hui. J'ai une occasion sûre et prompte pour Vienne Lundi prochain, et je ne puis, en vérité, pas me dispenser d'écrire à ma Cour au sujet de nos affaires. Quelques soient les raisons (dont je reconnais l'importance et la validité) qui vous forcent à nous tenir encore en suspens, l'incertitude n'en est pas moins cruelle pour nous; et j'ai toujours peur que nous ne puissions pas avoir de quoi subvenir à une aussi longue attente. Il y a plus de 10 jours que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de me parler, et je n'ai plus eu rien de vous depuis ce moment. Songez donc, de grace, que les instans sont des siècles dans notre position, et que des délais plus prolongés pourraient avoir les suites les plus fâcheuses. Vous les appréciez sûrement aussi bien que moi; mais il est de mon devoir de vous les représenter pour n'avoir pas à me reprocher un jour comme ministre de l'Empereur, et comme la personne la plus attachée au Gouvernement Anglais et à Milord Grenville, de ne vous avoir pas prévenu à temps, et à plusieurs reprises, des malheureuses conséquences que l'embarras dans lequel vous nous laissez pourrait amener. Si donc vous ne pouvez pas encore rien prononcer de décisif, daignez au moins m'entretenir du plus ou du moins d'espérance que vous conservez; nous méritons certainement d'être prévenue à temps. Il me paraît impossible que vous ne préjugiez pas déjà dans votre sagesse du succès ou de la non-réussite de la mesure sérieuse que vous avez adopté, sans doute, dans la vue d'aider vos alliés. Croyez que les informations dont votre dernier courrier était le porteur, n'auront pas manqué d'affecter comme elles le devaient des amis dont la constance inébranlable n'hésite jamais quand il est question de vous prouver leur loyauté et leur fidélité. Tous les préparatifs immenses pour la campagne prochaine sont, sans doute, déjà faits à compte des remises sur lesquelles nous avons le droit de compter d'après vos dernières assurances; mais quelque cruel que serait un refus que nous sommes bien loin d'attendre, et qui étonnerait au delà de toute expression, la prolongation de la situation critique dans laquelle nous sommes, et qui nous fait subir journellement toutes les anxiétés du doute, est bien plus fâcheuse encore, puisqu'elle paralise tous les projets et toutes les déterminations, tandis que l'ennemi commun redouble d'activité. Mettez-moi donc, je vous prie, dans le cas de pouvoir annoncer confidentiellement à mon chef, ou que vous entrevoyez la possibilité prochaine de contracter les engagements que vous paraissiez vous-même empressé de conclure il y a très peu de temps, ou que vous craignez que les expédiens que votre zèle et bonne volonté en notre faveur vous avaient suggéré, ne soient pas suffisans pour remplir le but proposé.

"Je ne puis m'empêcher encore de vous demander une réponse à la lettre officielle que j'ai eu l'honneur de vous écrire, d'après l'ordre réitéré de ma Cour, au sujet de la flotille à établir dans l'Adriatique. Nous avons trop d'intérêt à cet objet pour n'être pas très pressé de connaître vos intentions."

French.

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1797, March 9, Cleveland Row.—"Je viens de recevoir votre lettre laquelle je ne sais si je dois regarder comme officielle. Si cela est, il faut y répondre ; et ce sera avec les sentimens que vous me connaissez, et que les embarras des affaires n'altéreront jamais, en tout ce qui regarde l'union de nos deux Cours.

"Cependant (soit dit dans notre amitié et confiance) je vous avais cru trop raisonnable pour insister sur une réponse que vous êtes bien à portée de voir que nous ne pouvons encore vous donner. Vous ne croyez pas, sans doute, que cet état d'incertitude soit pour nous un lit de roses. Voilà cependant ce que l'on pourrait inférer de tous vos raisonnemens, que vous employez avec tant d'éloquence pour persuader à un malade de vouloir bien guérir.

"J'espère que tout ira bien, mais je suis bien loin de vous le dire officiellement ; et, si le contraire arrive, vous n'aurez pas à vous reprocher d'avoir compromis votre ami par des instances si peu nécessaires." Copy.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 10, London.—"Il suffit que vous jugiez à propos de communiquer mes réflexions à Monsieur Pitt pour que je n'y trouve aucune difficulté. Je sais trop apprécier son bon esprit, et j'ai trop de confiance dans son caractère, pour avoir la moindre inquiétude en lui communiquant ma façon personnelle de voir les objets dans la circonstance critique où nous nous trouvons. N'oubliez jamais, l'un et l'autre, que ce papier est peut-être entièrement différent du langage officiel que je devrais tenir, et vraisemblablement très éloigné de la manière dont les meneurs envisagent les objets chez nous ; et daignez ne le considérer que comme le résultat des observations de quelqu'un dont vous connaissez depuis longtemps l'amitié et les principes, qui gémît sur le passé, songe au présent, et craint pour l'avenir."

French.

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, March 10, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to submit to your Majesty's consideration the draft of a dispatch to

Mr. Walpole at Lisbon, directing that minister to propose to the Portuguese Government to sound the dispositions of Spain respecting a separate peace.

"Lord Grenville does not flatter himself with much hope of the success of this measure; but he thinks it may be so conducted that the attempt can lead to no inconvenience, while it takes the chances, whatever they may be, of materially weakening the means of France for carrying on the war."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 11, Queen's House.--"I do not object to the proposed draft to Mr. Walpole, though I do not expect it will have the effect proposed of detaching Spain from France; yet, if the Court of Lisbon make the proposal with the delicacy that the step requires, should it not succeed my name ought not to be brought forward.

"I have received another box from Lord Grenville. I own I did not expect that with the candour I have acted, that the Prince of Wurtemberg would have so eagerly pressed; I must therefore take a little time to consider of my answer, which I will certainly send to-morrow to Lord Grenville."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 11, Queen's House.--"Lord Grenville knows me too well not to imagine that the strong pressing from M. de Wimffen in the name of the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg for leave to come to England gave me pain; and indeed it is not very encouraging for my daughter that she is going to enter into a family much divided; but as I ever wish that reason rather than temper should direct my conduct, I have delayed till now returning an answer on that subject to you.

"I think it absolutely necessary that the treaty of marriage should be drawn up and mutually agreed to before the Prince comes here. I have therefore drawn up, on the accompanying paper, the alterations I think necessary from the treaty of marriage of my sister the Duchess of Brunswick, which seems to suit the case of my daughter better than that of my aunt the late Princess of Orange; as those papers may not be immediately at hand I send the substance Lord Grenville had sent me, which I hope he will return when no more of use to him.

"I desire he will communicate the whole to Mr. Pitt before any step is taken, who, with the Lord Chancellor, will be the proper persons to be consulted on this occasion.

"When the treaty is ready, M. de Wimffen would return to Hamburg and, when the Prince accedes to it, the consent of the Duke must be obtained; that once done, the Prince may then come over according to his proposal, and, after being seen by my family only in private, and staying a few days, he must make a tour in the country till the time for the ceremony of the marriage, and all the arrangements necessary for it can have been prepared.

"Lord Grenville should intimate to Mr. Pitt that, considering the great arrears in my payments, I have desired the Queen that the jewels, cloths, and other things for my daughter may be done with as much economy as decency will permit. I shall take care that he shall hereafter have the account, that it may be paid."

LORD GRENVILLE TO GEORGE III.

1797, March 21, Downing Street.—“In humble obedience to your Majesty’s commands, Lord Grenville has the honour to return your Majesty the two précis of the marriage articles of their Royal Highnesses the Princess of Orange and the Duchess of Brunswick, together with the projet of the treaty with the Duke of Wurtemberg, and the French translation of it, which Lord Grenville has this day communicated to Baron Reiger, and which the latter has promised to send immediately to Stutgard.

¶ “Lord Grenville has also seen M. de Wimffen, and has apprized him of your Majesty’s intentions respecting the arrival of the Hereditary Prince, which M. de Wimffen promised immediately to communicate to his Serene Highness.”

M. DUTHEIL TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 27, London.—“Dans la note que M. Dutheil a eu l’honneur d’envoyer à Milord Grenville, et qui contient des observations sur l’insuffisance des fonds accordés à l’armée de Normandie, M. Dutheil n’a pas cru devoir se permettre de rappeler à Milord Grenville dans cette note qui peut être communiquée, que c’est à cette armée où Monsieur a la projet de se rendre très incessamment. Cette détermination de Monsieur est un des motifs qui engage M. Dutheil à envoyer en Normandie l’agent du Roi actuellement à Londres, afin de faire concourir les moyens civils avec l’organisation militaire à la plus prompte arrivée de Monsieur en France. M. Dutheil ayant eu ordre de ne communiquer le projet de Monsieur qu’à Milord Grenville seulement, il lui devient impossible de faire connaître à aucun autre membre du Conseil de Sa Majesté Britannique ce projet, et de le présenter comme moyen pour obtenir non seulement les mille livres promises par mois pour cette armée, mais encore ce qui peut être nécessaire au delà de cette somme pour que l’armée de Normandie puisse, vers la fin du mois dernier, recevoir Monsieur. Les agents qui étaient pénétrés de l’importance de l’arrivée de Monsieur en Normandie, avaient promis de donner sur la somme qui leur avait été accordée par le Ministère Britannique, tout ce qu’il aurait pu être possible d’économiser sur cette somme. M. Dutheil a l’honneur de demander la permission à Milord Grenville d’avoir celui de lui observer que, quoique Monsieur n’ait point fait l’honneur d’écrire à M. Dutheil rien qui puisse lui faire présumer que Monsieur ait eu l’intention de diminuer en aucune manière le nombre des Ministres de Sa Majesté Britannique aux quels Milord Grenville croira devoir confier le projet de Monsieur, cependant M. Dutheil croit pouvoir assurer que Monsieur a pensé que peut-être son Excellence jugerait à propos de borner, quant à présent, cette confiance à M. Pitt seulement. M. Dutheil ajoutera encore à cette observation que Monsieur, croyant que le succès de son projet est attaché au secret profond dont il sera couvert, n’a cru devoir jusqu’à ce moment confier ce projet qu’à M. Dutheil seul.”

French.

THE ROYALIST WAR IN FRANCE.

Memorandum of M. Dutheil.

1797, March 29, London.—“Il résulte d’un entretien que M. Dutheil vient d’avoir avec le Comte de Frotté, relativement aux demandes d'argent faites par le général, et qui se trouvent dans une note jointe au contrôle des officiers de son armée que le Comte de Frotté a expliqué à M. Dutheil, qui effectivement a vérifié avec lui que les demandes que contient cette note ne doivent être considérées que sous le rapport d'une armée à lever, et pour laquelle on aurait à payer, non seulement tout ce qui concerne l'habillement, l'équipement, mais encore des prix d'engagement à chaque individu. Le Comte de Frotté ayant fait cette note à la fin du mois d'Octobre, reconnaît qu'elle ne peut plus s'appliquer à l'ordre de choses qui existe en ce moment, d'après lequel rien n'est plus facile que de recruter parmi tous les gens de la réquisition qui ont quitté les armées pour rentrer dans leurs foyers. Aussi, le Comte de Frotté dans les instructions qu'il a données à ceux de ses officiers qui l'ont précédé, leur a-t-il spécialement recommandé de comprendre dans le contrôle de leurs divisions respectives, tous ces hommes de réquisition qui eux-mêmes ont fait offrir au Comte de Frotté de se réunir aussitôt qu'il jugera à propos de leur en donner l'ordre. Le Comte de Frotté recrutera encore son armée des troupes Républicains qui passeront collectivement sous les drapeaux du Roi ; mais pour celles-ci, il ne doit les solder qu'au moment où, par le mouvement général qui doit avoir lieu, il se trouvera dans le cas de pouvoir les faire agir. Jusqu'à cette époque, il doit se contenter d'entretenir les bonnes dispositions des chefs, et leur fournir quelques moyens qui puissent les mettre à portée de conserver sur les soldats qu'ils commandent, l'influence qu'ils se sont ménagés. Enfin, le Comte de Frotté, en considérant la note dont il s'agit comme étant sans objet, au moyen des changements survenus depuis l'instant où elle a été rédigée, reconnaît qu'il ne devra recevoir de fonds lorsqu'il sera question de mettre son armée en activité, que par les personnes qui doivent être chargées de la distribution générale ; excepté toutefois, les mille livres par mois qui lui ont été promises pour son organisation."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 29, Windsor.—"I wish Lord Grenville, previous to answering Baron Rieger on the Additional Article proposed by the latter, would see Baron Leathe and, as it is different from the treaty of marriage of my sister the Duchess of Brunswick, [consider] whether it ought not rather to be an article in the German treaty, where the jointure and German portion will be fixed, according to former precedents.

"I suppose it is out of stupidity, for certainly there has as yet not a word passed as to the particular time of the marriage ; the Prince has leave to come over, and, after being seen in private, to travel into the country till the notification has been made to Parliament, and the time fixed for the marriage. I think Lord Grenville, when he shall fix the mode of completing the treaty, must by letter remind the Baron of the mistake in his assertion."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 30, Queen's House.—"I return to Lord Grenville the important despatches received this morning from the Earl of Elgin, and highly approve his not having delayed to the usual hour the communicating them to me. I desire he will direct a copy of the Prussian agreement with France, as accompanying Lord Elgin's private letter, to be made for me."

THE ROYALIST WAR IN FRANCE.

MINUTE OF LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 30.—“I saw M. Dutheil and M. F., the latter being on the point of setting out for France. They were very urgent with me to explain to them what they could depend upon in the way of pecuniary assistance for keeping up the R[oyalist] party. They divided this question into two points.

“First, with respect to the payments that had been settled with M. D[uvergne], and secondly, with respect to future aid.

“I told them that, on both these points, we must be further informed before we could speak with certainty. That the engagements taken with M. D[uvergne] were provisional only, and extended no further than to the end of this month. The object stated by M. D[uvergne] had been the being enabled to keep together a party sufficient (particularly in point of military strength) to resist any attempt of the Directory to prevent the elections from taking place. That payments were to be made for that purpose for the three months of January, February and March; but that we had expressly reserved to ourselves the right of judging at the end of that period, according to the turn which affairs might then have taken, what further measures we should adopt. That, on the arrest of the agents at Paris, I had explained to M. Dutheil that we conceived the course of that plan must necessarily be thereby interrupted; and that it seemed doubtful whether the amount of monthly payments settled with M. D[uvergne] could now be beneficially employed for the same objects. That if, as was now stated to me, individuals at Paris had, on the faith of those payments, made advances on their own account to be employed for the same objects, we should certainly be desirous of freeing them from any personal embarrassment; but that I must, for that purpose, know the amount of any sums so advanced, and the general objects for which the money had been employed.

“The second point was one of still greater difficulty. I owed it to them and to myself to say that we had not the means of furnishing the assistance in money which I thought indispensably necessary to support any general rising. That I was therefore extremely reluctant to concur in advancing any sums which could have for their object the bringing on that which, if it depended for success on our support, must fail, and involve in it the ruin of all those engaged in it.

“They both gave me, upon this, the strongest and most explicit assurances that they perfectly understood this explanation; that they had the express orders of the king to discourage any partial insurrection; and that nothing would be done except under the direction of the central agency at Paris, who would act only when they saw a plan which contained in it the means of supporting itself. But that, even with that view, it would be necessary that some funds should be left at the disposal of that agency, in order that they might be enabled to maintain their correspondencies, and keep up the favourable dispositions in the different parts of France.

“It was at last agreed that M. F. should go to Paris in order to judge there of the plan to be adopted in future, which must in great degree depend on the result of the elections. And that he would transmit here a statement of the situation of things such as he might find them, of the measures proposed to be pursued, and of the expense which they might require, in order that the British Government might form its judgment on these grounds.

"The same day I saw M. Frotté with the Duke de Harcourt, and held to them the same language; requiring that M. Frotté should distinctly explain to those with whom he had communication in Normandy the grounds on which they stood in this respect; and this I repeated to M. Frotté when I saw him again two or three days after, previous to his leaving England."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, March 30, Dropmore.—"Je suis bien mortifié d'avoir quitté le bureau hier peu de temps avant que vous y êtes venu. Je retourne Lundi; et Mardi matin à onze heures, je serais bien aise de vous recevoir, si cela vous convient. Lord Elgin m'envoie la copie de la Convention Secrete. Je vous la transmet ci-jointe, et quand vous en aurez pris lecture, je vous prie de l'envoyer au Comte Starhemberg pour son information, avec prière de la renvoyer au bureau. Elle est vraiment curieuse, et bien fait pour donner des sujets de penser à tout le monde.

"Lord Elgin ne m'envoie pas la copie des instructions données à M. de Kalitcheff, mais seulement une espèce de sommaire qu'il en a fait d'après la lecture que M. de Kalitcheff l'a permis d'en prendre.

"L'Empereur s'excuse de répondre à la lettre du Roi. Les instructions entrent assez en détail sur tous les points contenus dans cette lettre, et dans un mémoire justificatif qui y était joint. On dévoile d'une manière claire et énergique la mauvaise foi des Prussiens en la qualifiant d'astuce qui a surpris la religion du Monarque. On confond les mauvaises prétextes allégués par M. de Haugwitz, et l'on ajoute enfin que les plans proposés par le Roi de Prusse sont en contradiction directe avec toutes les vues de l'Empereur, et tout désir de les seconder. Et l'on exige, comme la première preuve d'un pareil désir, que la Cour de Berlin se désiste de toute mesure attentatoire à l'intégrité de l'Allemagne, en ajoutant que c'est à ce prix seul que la bonne intelligence avec la Russie peut être établie. Enfin M. de Kalitcheff a l'ordre de déclarer formellement la vive et juste apprehension de l'Empereur de voir tout autre résultat des mesures adoptées par la Prusse que celui d'opérer la rétablissement du calme et de l'équilibre, et la résolution de Sa Majesté Russe de diriger tous ses efforts à ce but salutaire.

"Je ne sais si vous pourrez lire ce barbouillage, mais voilà le résumé (et même les paroles expresses) de ce que Lord Elgin me mande. Il serait fort à désirer que ces communications fussent encore suivies de déclarations capables à contenir la mauvaise volonté de ceux qui ont ourdi cette trame si perfide et si inique."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, March 31, Downing Street.—"Hier sa Majesté le Roi me fit l'honneur de me dire in extenso la réponse de mon souverain au Roi de Prusse, mais, comme sa Majesté parle ordinairement fort bas, et que par malheur j'avais à mes côtés Spinola, Elle me parla encore plus doucement que de coutume, de manière que je n'ai presque pu rien retenir.

"J'étais venu ici pour vous supplier de me communiquer la dépêche de my lord Elgin, de qui on a les détails de cette réponse; et comme vous êtes déjà parti, je vous supplie de me faire la faveure de me communiquer les détails de cette réponse intéressante."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1897, March—April, London.]—"Ces dernières nouvelles d'Italie me déplaisent beaucoup. Je ne conçois pas cette terrible reculade sans se battre, et cet oubli des pauvres bataillons. Une autre chose tout aussi inconcevable est que l'ennemi n'ait pas profité de cet avantage avec son activité ordinaire. Je crains, de vous à moi, que ceci ne soit un jeu préparé et convenu par le guerrier pacificateur, pour venir à bout de convaincre son auguste frère, dont le caractère est aussi ferme que le sien l'est peu, de la nécessité de la paix. Je crains, en outre, que les premières nouvelles peu consolantes d'ici, qui seront arrivées presque en même temps, n'achevent de tout gâter. Je serais inconsolable de voir notre conduite héroïque se terminer par une lâcheté. Cela me tourmente au-delà de toute expression. En attendant, j'ai pensé qu'il serait peut-être à propos que vous fissiez aller par Vienne le courrier qui va ce soir à Petersbourg. Il pourrait y porter en passant des paroles de consolation et d'encouragement, et annoncer la signature très prochaine de notre arrangement. Cette attention ferait un merveilleux effet sur les braves gens qu'on veut rendre poltrons, et qui ne seront jamais perfides.

"Ne pourriez-vous pas aussi, pour perdre le moins de temps que possible, commencer dès aujourd'hui le plan politique dont nous parlions dernièrement, et jeter les fondemens de la pacifications que vous feriez agréer par la Russie. Il est bien essentiel de prévenir à temps l'étendue gangreneuse des perfides Prussiennes, et de se presser d'entrer en négociation avant que la faiblesse qui paralise les plus grands talens n'ait procuré des nouveaux avantages à un ennemi insolent, qui saura se prévaloir de tout.

"Vous connaissez l'esprit dans lequel je vous offre ces réflexions. Je les soumets à la supériorité de vos lumières et les répand dans le sein de l'amitié. Je passerai vers une heure au bureau ; si vous voulez me voir un instant vous me rendrez heureux. Je serai bien aussi d'écrire au Count de Cobentzel, d'une manière conforme à vos désirs. Il me semble que, dans la crise actuelle, tous les bien-intentionnés doivent s'entendre, et concourir au même but en tenant le même langage."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797, March—April, London.]—"Je reçois votre billet qui est bien aimable pour moi, et je tâcherai en conséquence d'arriver à la conférence un peu avant mes collègues, afin de vous entretenir quelques minutes de plus que les autres. Comme vous expédiez un courrier Mardi, je me dispenserai de l'envoi du mien Vendredi, à moins que vous ne le jugiez nécessaire vous-même. Il me semble qu'il vaut autant ne pas les tenir en suspens à Vienne, et leur prononcer leur arrêt définitif tout d'un coup. J'espère comme vous que l'on tiendra bon chez nous, mais je ne suis pas sans crainte. Je rougis de voir de mes proches, et des gens que je suis obligé de respecter, se conduire d'une manière si lâche et si peu honorable."

Postscript.—"Vous savez sans doute que le Prince de Waldeck est arrivé."

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, April 3, Harley Street.—“ Je vous rend mille et mille grace pour votre obligant billet, pour la bonté avec laquelle vous avez bien voulu vous donner la peine de m'expliquer les sens de la réponse de mon souverain à la Cour de Berlin, et pour la confiance avec laquelle vous m'avez communiqué les articles secrets entre la Prusse et la France, et qui complètent les infâmes et sinistres projets de la première. J'ai remis d'abord au Comte Starhemberg ces pièces ainsi que vous l'avez permis, et il vous les a déjà renvoyé sans doute.

“ Comme il se pourrait bien que my lord Elgin, qui vous les a envoyé, n'en a pas fait de même avec le Chevalier Whitworth, dans le doute de cela ne trouveriez-vous pas nécessaire d'envoyer la copie de ces pièces à ce chevalier, pour qu'il fasse voir à l'Empereur et à son ministère toute l'étendue de la perfidie de la Cour de Berlin. Il faut battre le fer tandis qu'il est chaud ; et bien loin de laisser refroidir l'indignation qu'on a chez nous, il faut la renouveler et l'entretenir avec soins, quand on a des moyens et des preuves aussi palpables.

LORD GRENVILLE TO SIR MORTON EDEN.

Private.

1797, April 4, Cleveland Row.—“ I have spoken to you in my dispatch as it was necessary for me to do, in terms of doubt and uncertainty respecting the possible decision of Parliament on the question of affording further pecuniary aid to the Emperor ; because in the present state of things, it would not be proper for me to anticipate that decision, which must be made on a view of the proposal to be laid before Parliament on that subject, with all its attendant circumstances. I have, however, the pleasure to acquaint you that a preliminary question on this subject of the utmost importance, to the fate of the general proposition has, this evening, been decided by the House of Commons ; a very large majority having supported the general policy of aid to Austria.

“ Mr. Sheridan moved that the House should resolve itself into a committee to consider how far it might be proper to grant further advances to the Emperor. The intention of this motion being avowedly to obstruct, and if possible to pledge the House against any such further aid, it was resisted by Government, and negatived on a division by 266 against 87.

“ This decision may justly be considered as one of the most important events of the age in which we live, and I most sincerely congratulate you upon it. There is, I trust, now no doubt of the event of the proposition itself, which will be made by Mr. Pitt in the course of next week at furthest ; and I shall immediately acquaint you with it by a messenger, by whom I shall also write to you on other points.”

M. DUTHEIL TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, April 6, London.—“ M. Dutheil a l'honneur d'envoyer à milord Grenville la lettre qu'il vient de recevoir du Comte de Frotté, et d'après laquelle il paraît que les dispositions continuent à être parfaites en Normandie, où il semble qu'on prend le parti de ne porter que des Royalistes au Corps Législatif. Si cette mesure est suivie par toute la France, c'est alors que véritablement les principes monarchiques se trouvaient en majorité dans les deux Conseils, où ils cesseraient de n'y plus être que l'opposition. La personne qui m'a apporté la lettre du Comte de Frotté l'a vu embarquer hier, et croit qu'il a dû arriver à l'Isle St. Marcouf ce matin, au moyen du vent qui a constamment régné depuis son départ."

J. S. DE FROTTÉ TO M. DUTHEIL.

1797, April 5, Portsmouth.—"Nous arrivons, et je trouve à mon débotté un courier qui m'arrive de France avec beaucoup de lettres où dans toutes l'on me demande de l'argent et tout ira bien. Les élections sont meilleures qu'on ne pouvait l'espérer. Les Jacobins sont dans la boue, et nous fort tranquilles. Nous organisent fort bien. Nous avons dans le seul département, le moins bon, de La Manche, trois mille nouveaux déserteurs rentrés depuis le mois. Tous les propriétaires sont parfaitement disposés, et l'on fera de ce pays tout ce que l'on voudra. Il est bien douloureux d'être obligé d'abandonner ces bonnes dispositions, et nous y serons forcés, n'ayant plus d'argent pour les soutenir. Le département du Calvados est excellent, et M. le Comte de Turgot est nommé électeur à Falaise; à Caen, M. de Lisle ——— et partout à peu-près le choix est aussi parfait. Mais il faut de l'argent pour endormir la surveillance du Directoire, qui a donné des ordres pour nous faire tous arrêter en Normandie, où l'on me cherche depuis six semaines; heureusement que l'on commence à s'en lasser. Il faut de l'argent pour payer les déserteurs qui reviennent, et les matelots qui ne veulent pas partir, si on veut les faire subsister. Il faut de l'argent pour les officiers Républicains que l'on a travaillé, et aux quels déjà l'on a donné, mais qui se dégouteront si on cesse de tenir les promesses qu'on leur a faites. Il en faut pour tout, et je suis effrayé de ma position dès l'instant où j'en manquerai, ce qui ne sera pas long attendre, que ce que j'emporte est à peu-près à payer en arrivant. Si je pouvais être sûr au moins, en attendant les événements, de continuer à toucher chaque mois ce que j'ai eu jusqu'ici, je prendrais patience, en donnant aux autres les moyens d'en avoir; autrement je ne pourrai rester en Normandie. Sans argent, j'y serais inutile au parti, et serais poursuivi comme un lièvre par le parti contraire. Tachez, je vous prie, de me faire toucher les mois comme par le passé, mais payez chaque mois.

"Je vous envoie une note dont je vous prie de vous occuper, pour que l'on envoie les ordres nécessaires à St. Marcouf afin d'en retirer les prisonniers, et surtout, de ne jamais les échanger. Tout mon monde se trouve fort bien en Normandie; l'on m'y attend avec impatience, et je pars."

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1797, April 6, Cleveland Row.—"J'ai l'honneur de vous rendre un papier de veille date, mais que vous aviez désiré de ravoïr; et que Monsieur Pitt, à qui je l'avais communiqué, ne m'a restitué qu'hier.

"Nos nouvelles de Tyrol ne sont pas bonnes; mais il ne me paraît pas qu'il y ait en aucun événement décisif. On montre encore beaucoup de fermeté à Vienne, et j'espère que nos dernières nouvelles viendront assez à temps pour rassurer les esprits un peu abattus."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, April 9, Cleveland Row.—“In submitting to your Majesty the minute of Cabinet with the annexed drafts of despatches which Lord Grenville has the honour to lay before your Majesty in pursuance of the opinion of your Majesty’s servants, he feels it his indispensable duty to assure your Majesty that nothing but the most thorough and deliberate conviction of the necessity of the measures there recommended could have induced him to lay them before your Majesty. As long as the financial resources of the country seemed to be such as to afford the means of making vigorous exertions both for the prosecution of your Majesty’s part in this extensive war, and for the support of your Majesty’s allies, Lord Grenville allowed himself to hope that, by firmness and perseverance, it would be possible to avert the many evils which must result from the conclusion of a peace on inadequate terms, and that under all the circumstances of the present moment. No man can be more deeply sensible than he is of the extent of those evils, but, without resources of finance, it is impossible to resist them by war, and to prolong the attempt would only be to increase the difficulty of those measures that must now be resorted to.

“Lord Grenville is sensible that this view of the subject includes a very small part of it only. The military difficulties of Austria form another very material branch of it; and though it is possible that by energy and skill these may be surmounted now, as at the close of the last campaign, the experiment at the best is doubtful, and the failure would produce effects almost beyond the power of calculation. But he forbears to trouble your Majesty any more on these points which are, in great degree, developped in the drafts themselves; and he entreats your Majesty to believe that nothing but the most thorough persuasion of the utility and even the necessity of these measures could induce him to advise your Majesty to have recourse to them.”

MINUTE OF CABINET.

1797, April 9, Downing Street.

Present :

Lord Chancellor, Lord President, Duke of Portland, Marquis Cornwallis, Earl Spencer, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Dundas, Lord Grenville.

“It was agreed humbly to submit to your Majesty as the opinion of this meeting, that, under the various circumstances of difficulty and danger in which his Majesty’s dominions and those of his allies are placed by the result of the late unfavourable events, and most particularly by the increasing embarrassments of the public finances of this kingdom, it is become indispensably necessary that steps should be taken for making a joint application on the part of his Majesty and of the Emperor to the Emperor of Russia for his intervention, with the view of opening and conducting negotiations for peace; and also that measures should be adopted for concurring with the court of Vienna in any immediate negotiation which may be rendered necessary by the urgency of increased pressure from any further progress of the French in Carinthia.

“And the instructions which have been prepared with this view to Sir M. Eden having been read and considered, it was agreed that they should be laid before your Majesty, with the humble opinion of this meeting, that, under the circumstances above mentioned, it is indispensably necessary that these instructions should be sent to Sir M. Eden; and that it would be advisable that Mr. Hammond should be made the bearer of them, and that he should have full powers to enter into negotiations jointly with Sir M. Eden, and on the grounds therein stated."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, April 10, Queen's House.—"Lord Grenville is too sensible of my opinion on the whole business to doubt of my sorrow at finding myself obliged to acquiesce in a measure that I think big with evils; but he has in his note, which accompanied the Minute of Cabinet, shown he is equally impressed with the same opinion, that it would be a waste of time for me to add more on the present melancholy occasion.

Postscript.—"Having cast my eye over the paper for Sir Morton Eden, I should not do right if I did not in the strongest manner, as a member of the German Empire, declare that in that capacity I never can accede to the Emperor's gaining any acquisition at the expense of the Empire, but shall as Elector think myself in duty bound to object to any such unjust measure."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, April 11, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has this instant received the letters which he has now the honour to transmit to your Majesty. He does not presume to say anything upon their contents, but humbly requests to be honoured with your Majesty's commands respecting the answer to be returned to Baron Rieger."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, April 11, Windsor.—"Lord Grenville will not be surprised that I am rather astonished and displeased at the inconsiderate step the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg has taken of suddenly arriving at Harwich when another line of conduct had been recommended. If Sir John Hippisley can persuade him, when he arrives to-morrow in London, to depart with him into the country a[nd] visit its different parts till the treaty returns from Wurtemberg, that would be the best arrangement; but should he, on the Prince's arrival, find that not practicable, if the Prince privately notifies his arrival to Lord Grenville, I will not object to receiving him in private at the Queen's House, introducing him to my family; after which I hope he will continue his tour into the country, a[nd] view the various objects worthy of his notice."

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

1797, April 11, Cleveland Row.—"I am very sorry that it is so wholly impossible for me to promote the object of your request contained in your No. 13, the difficulties attending which would, I am quite sure, have been wholly insurmountable. At the same time you may be persuaded that I shall be always happy to bear my testimony to your merit and services.

"We have been a little embarrassed by the signature of the treaty of commerce which did not allow us time to send you the few remarks that occurred to us on the projet. I perfectly understand and do full justice to the reasons which made you anxious to hasten the conclusion of it, both as a proof to others and as in itself a pledge of continued friendship and union. But it would be a very unfortunate circumstance if either of the difficulties which I have adverted to in my dispatch should be found insurmountable obstacles to the ratifications being exchanged; and yet I dread the effect and impression of that respecting America, though I really do not see how it is possible for us to relax either on that point or on the other.

"The circumstances and situation of public affairs render the friendship of Russia more and more important. It is only by the intervention of that power that a precipitate peace on the part of Austria can be prevented, if at all. You cannot therefore take too much pains to urge this point. The assistance we had once hoped for from Russia was not more than was wanted to enable Austria to stem the torrent. But even the time for that is now past, and we could no longer furnish the means which were to have put that force in motion, and to have maintained it in action."

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR MORTON EDEN.

Private.

1797, April 11, Cleveland Row.—"This letter, together with my public despatches, will be delivered to you by Mr. Hammond. The sentiments which you expressed respecting him on a former occasion render it, I trust, unnecessary for me to assure you that the sending him to assist you in one of the most difficult situations in which it is possible for any body to be placed, does not arise from any diminution of confidence towards you, but from a sense of the extreme importance of the crisis, and of the aid which you must derive from the co-operation of a man whose situation puts him in possession of all the details of our foreign affairs, and enables him to follow up the points which arise with a local knowledge and observation which can no otherwise be acquired.

"From the tenor of the last despatches, I greatly fear that we are still too late. If it is not so, we prefer sharing with our ally the difficulties of an unfavourable peace, to being entirely abandoned and left to our own resources; though these are still such as would, I trust, in such case suffice to bring us safe out of the contest.

"I am uneasy at one point in your last letters. It would surely be much more worthy of the firmness and uprightness of M. Thugut's character, having stood with energy and resolution against so many adversities, not to yield to them even in the last extremity; and rather to take such measures (whatever they may be) as the interest of his Sovereign and country really requires, than to leave that task to be performed by others, who will add to the mischief of a disadvantageous peace those of a total subversion of that system which will then be, more than ever, the protection of Europe. These are the sentiments on which His Majesty's servants are acting; and I could wish that you would take an opportunity to express them in our name to him, if the thing is not over before this letter reaches you.

"You will easily judge that this is no time for the appointment of ambassadors, and that all questions on that subject must stand over for more favourable circumstances.

"If the Arch-Duke has not succeeded to stop Bonaparte, and even to drive him back, I fear even an armistice would be unattainable. But that is the point to be aimed at, because the advantage of having time to look about us, and, if possible, to establish something like a congress, would be beyond all calculation when compared with treating for a peace precipitately, and in a moment of dismay, such as seems to prevail at Vienna."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, April 12, Queen's House.—"I lose no time in transmitting to Lord Grenville the letter I have copied for the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg, which I desire may be delivered to M. de Zepelin. I shall be ready to see the Prince of Wurtemberg on Saturday evening; the Duke of York will go and fetch him, which all the family think, as he is to be incognito, is certainly more honourable and less formal than my sending the lord in waiting. I desire therefore by three o'clock on Saturday to hear from Lord Grenville whether and where the Prince is arrived in town, when the hour for the Duke of York going for the Prince shall, in return to the notification, be fixed."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, April 13, Stowe.—"In consequence of a communication which was directed to be made to my private ear, informing me of the object of an interview which has been requested from you, I am tempted to write, for fear you should be detained in the country, to request you to see that person without loss of time; as it is most essential that no time should be lost in discussing (with another person just arrived) a new and most important chapter. Pray be assured that I have no object in all this but what arises from the firm persuasion that every moment is most critical; and that the secret may be detected if the interview is delayed, and the third person detained by that delay.

"I am indeed most impatient to hear from Vienna. If the Emperor must make his peace, God send that Mr. Hammond may arrive too late to include this country in the chapter of concessions, which, to my comprehension will, so far from purchasing security to us, only add to the gloom of a prospect already too alarming. I see daylight in risking another campaign detached from our Imperial alliance, though I well know the risk, but I see none in a peace such as Austria and we must make jointly. You will of course keep your secret; but mine is, as you see, very short."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797, April, London.]—"Encore un songe creux de ma part qu'il faut que je vous communique immédiatement. En réfléchissant au danger réel que nous courrons en Italie, et à l'extrême activité des Français, je ne vois en vérité pas d'impossibilité à ce que Buonaparte ne tente de nouveau de marcher sur Vienne. Nous savons qu'il a déjà été au-delà de Trente, il y a quelques mois. S'il ne marchait que sur un point, il y aurait des grandes ressources de défense même avec le reste d'une armée entamée; mais il peut se mettre en chemin tout à la fois par la Stirie et par la Tirol. Chacune de ses armées sera plus forte que celle qu'on pourrait lui opposer, et qui serait commandée, Dieu sait par qui. Il y a un moyen néanmoins encore de ranimer l'enthousiasme et se procurer des renforts par le zèle et l'énergie des sujets auquel leur amour pour leur souverain rendra tout possible; c'est que l'Empereur, accompagné de Mack, Lascey, ou Clerfaye aille lui-même à cette armée. Je vous réponds que l'effet en serait magique, et le succès le couronnerait. Il est militaire, adoré de ses troupes; il a fait plusieurs campagnes, et cette mesure serait bien plus à place que la postillionade aux Pais-Bas à laquelle vous vous appellerez que j'ai toujours été contraire, et qui s'est terminée comme vous savez. Ne pourriez-vous pas écrire au Chevalier Eden de laisser tomber cette idée? peut-être y mordrait-on; mais, au nom de notre amitié, ne me compromettez pas. Mon désir du bien me suggère cet expédient, et ma confiance sans bornes la dépose dans votre sein, et la soumet à vos lumières."

French.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, April 15, Queen's House.—"On returning from Kew I have found Lord Grenville's note. He may acquaint the Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg that the Duke of York will call a little before eight this evening to conduct the Prince here. I, at the same time, return the paper Lord Grenville left with me, to which I have put down all the answers necessary for the present; I think they ought to be translated into French and Monsieur de Zepelin seems to be the best person to treat with, and most in the confidence of the Prince; therefore these answers should be communicated through him."

EARL CAMDEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, April 18, Dublin Castle.—"I am much obliged to you for giving me notice of your correspondence with Lord Mountnorris, and for not having deviated from your rule in his instance. It is certainly very often inconvenient to the King's Government to be assailed by English application; at the same time it is frequently the most satisfactory way to one's own feeling, to dispose of the patronage which belongs to this office. Allow me to say, however, if I may venture thus far, that it must have been a very pressing application of yours that would have made it very satisfactory to one to load that noble earl, your courier, with any very essential marks of his Majesty's favour.

"I cannot indeed doubt of the kindness and attention which I have experienced from the English Government, and I should be extremely insensible to your public as well as private friendship, if I did feel with much gratitude the testimony you have been so good as to give of your good opinion of me.

"The situation of this country requires the indulgence of Ministers to whomsoever may be sent to attempt to govern it; and it is impossible to disguise that its situation is extremely critical. The system of United Irishmen has spread in a manner almost incredible in the north; and by threats and actual assassinations, they have driven all their gentlemen from their residence, whom they have not forced into a sort of compliance with their views. I am endeavouring to find some opportunity of letting them feel the weight of military arguments; but it is so difficult to meet with that opportunity that I begin to think Mr. Grattan's charges of cruelty and violence will be converted into those of want of energy and inactivity. In the mean time this system has been introduced with some success into the south and west of Ireland. The Roman Catholics are again extremely active, and some of their popular preachers (Doctor Hussey particularly) are endeavouring to inflame their congregations against Government.

"Add to this, the mischievous effects of Fox's speech; the ill-success of our ally's; the difficulty of procuring money; the prospect of invasion; the speculation, not an idle one, of a change of Government, and you know enough of the world, and of the Irish world particularly, to be aware of the difficulties we have to encounter.

"You speak with so little confidence of the success of Hammond's mission that I should lament the step had been taken if you did not say it was unavoidable. The situation of Ireland seems to me to press for a peace more than that of any other part of the King's dominions, and whenever that event takes place, no time should be lost in relieving ourselves from the very inconvenient terms upon which the two countries are at this time.

"I have trespassed upon you much longer than I had intended."

GEORGE HAMMOND TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, April 20, Cuxhaven.—"I arrived here this morning after a passage of seventy-nine hours. I am very sorry to add that the wind is at present so contrary that I dare not risk making any part of my journey by water; I shall therefore be under the necessity of proceeding by the common route from Cuxhaven to Vienna. I, however, hope that I do not hazard too much in expressing my expectation that I shall be at Vienna in ten days, at the farthest, from this date. Your Lordship may be assured that I shall travel with the utmost expedition in my power."

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT STARIEMBERG.

1797, April 26, Cleveland Row.—"Je crois qu'il serait fort à propos qu'vous envoyiez un courier, vendredi. Je reserve le mien jusqu'à mardi, quand je pourrai probablement annoncer la conclusion définitive de notre affaire; à moins que, dans l'intervalle, nous ne nous voyons arrêtés par la plus désastreuse de toutes les nouvelles, celle d'une séparation de mesures entre la Grande Bretagne et l'Autriche. Jusqu'ici, il faut l'avouer, l'Empereur s'est montré bien digne de son rang et de sa position élevée; et son ministre s'est acquis un nom immortel. Mais, vous le savez peut-être mieux que moi, tout le monde n'est pas de même, et il se pourrait qu'à la fin le petit nombre sage et bien pensant cédât à la majorité faible et intimidé.

"Je reçois les ministres demain, et peut-être que j'aurai le plaisir de vous voir. Mais si vous préféreriez une heure fixe, je vous prie de m'en prévenir."

French. Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT DE ZEPPELIN.

1797, April 26, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville fait bien ses complimens à Monsieur le Comte de Zeppelin, et le prie d'avoir la bonté d'informer Sa Altesse Sereine Monseigneur le Prince Héréditaire de Wirtemberg que, d'après les arrangemens pour lesquels le Roi lui a donné ses ordres aujourd'hui, le mariage sera déclaré au Conseil Privé mercredi prochain, et sera communiqué le même jour par un message de Sa Majesté aux deux Chambres de Parlement. Les mesures à prendre en conséquence demandront encore quelque jours, et l'appartement que Sa Majesté destine au Prince au Palais de St. James sera prêt le mardi suivant (c'est-à-dire le 9 de mai). Si Monsieur le Comte de Zeppclin veut bien prévenir Lord Grenville du chemin par lequel Sa Altesse Sereine retournera ce jour-là à Londres, les ordres nécessaires seront donnés pour les carrosses que le Roi envoie, suivant l'usage, à la rencontre du Prince à dix milles de Londres, ou à la première poste au-delà.

"Lord Grenville prend la liberté d'ajouter que le Prince jugera sans doute qu'il serait convenable qu'il fit sa cour au Roi et à la Reine le mercredi et le jeudi suivant son arrivée à Londres."

French. Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, April 27, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville begs leave humbly to mention to your Majesty that he finds, on reference to the proceedings previous to the marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, that the full powers given to Lord Malmesbury were approved in Council, and the treaty signed, previous to your Majesty's declaring in Council your Majesty's royal consent to the marriage. In order therefore to follow this precedent, Lord Grenville has transmitted to the Lord President the draft of the full powers, in order that it may, if your Majesty approves it, be laid before your Majesty in Council to-morrow. And the treaty may, with your Majesty's permission, be signed on any day between that and the Wednesday following, when the declaration in Council, and the communication to the two Houses may be made as your Majesty had intended."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE

1797, April 28, Queen's House.—"Provided Lord Grenville follows in the example established by the treaty of marriage in the case of the Prince of Wales I cannot object to it; though different from the other instances to which, in great measure, the treaty of marriage for the Princess Royal had been proposed as precedents."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797, May 1-2, London].—"Après les nouvelles affreuses que nous avons reçu hier par la voie de la France, il est impossible que je n'aie pas l'honneur de vous entretenir dans le courant de la journée. Vous m'avez, d'ailleurs, dit expressément de passer à votre bureau aujourd'hui, mardi. Comme je sais que vous avez conseil, à moins que vous ne me fassiez dire de venir plutôt, j'irai vous attendre au bureau vers une heure. Daignez en croire une honnête homme qui est trop dévoué à la bonne cause pour ne pas vous l'être entièrement, je connais mieux les individus de mon pays que ceux du vôtre qui s'y trouvent. Rassurez nous bien vite, et assurez-vous de nous plus que jamais. Je sais de bonne part que les derniers malheurs nous ont extrêmement allarmés, et je crains toujours les premiers effets de la première impression. Je vous en dirai davantage quand nous nous verrons."

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT STAHERMBERG.

1797, May 3, Cleveland Row.—“Je viens de lire dans le True Briton la traduction du papier Français dont je n’ai pas encore vu l’original. Il est impossible de ne pas croire à une nouvelle si positivement annoncée, quelque répugnance que j’ai à admettre la probabilité d’un événement auquel, réellement, je ne m’attendais pas.

“Ce ne sera qu’après l’arrivée du courrier que le Chevalier Eden doit m’avoir envoyé que je pourrai juger quelles seront pour l’avenir les relations politiques entre vous et moi; mais je n’ai besoin d’aucune nouvelle information pour vous assurer que je rends toujours justice à l’honnêteté de votre cœur, et à la probité de votre caractère; et que je ne cesserai jamais de vous estimer et aimer en particulier, quoiqu’il en soit du Ministre Autrichien. Je suis désolé de ne pouvoir vous recevoir ce matin, mais je dois me rendre à midi chez le Lord Chancelier pour la signature du traité de mariage, et de là au levée pour faire ma cour au Roi sur un événement si intéressante pour sa famille. Après cela il y a Conseil Privé, et alors message à porter à la Chambre Haute, et ensuite Cabinet Dinner. Ainsi voilà la journée assez bien occupée.

COUNT STAHERMBERG TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, May 3, London.—J’ai de nouvelles raisons de croire à l’infamie de la paix. Je sais qu’un papier Français nommé Le Republicain est arrivé hier en ville, et porte que, le 26, on a appris à Paris la nouvelle de notre ignominie. Il y a eu des réjouissances à ce sujet le 27 et le 28. Vous me connaissez trop bien pour ne pas apprécier tout ce que je souffre. La honte, l’indignation, et la douleur la plus profonde se déchirent alternativement mon cœur. Permettez-moi de vous voir un moment dans la matinée; je passerai vers midi chez vous, et ensuite au bureau. Ce sera un instant de consolation pour moi que de parler de mes peines à un homme tel que vous, que j’aime, que je respecte, et qui me rend justice.”

The MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797], May 4, Stowe.—“I am prepared for the news of this day by the full persuasion that we shall more easily obtain such a peace as I shall deem most insecure and most calamitous; but such as will meet the opinions of a very large proportion of those who, in as well as out of Parliament, will discuss it. And if France is to attempt to force us by invasion, it may be more practicable to unite all ranks to that object, than to the undefined object of Austrian frontiers, which the cowardice and ignorance of this country is ready to deem wholly uninteresting to us. But whatever may be the result of it, the die is cast, and we must abide the event with the sure and heartbreaking reflexion that our peace must assuredly be purchased at a price infinitely beyond its real value, if every circumstance is considered of the very many which ought to give us good terms, and will be counted for nothing, from the disaffected poltroonery of the commercial men on whom Mr. Pitt has leant, and who have been the first to betray the public cause. It is however now become a serious matter of great doubt how Ireland is to be saved from the storm which this peace will thicken tenfold. You have no alternative between the most decided measures, and an absolute capitulation (hands and feet tied) with all that is ill-disposed in that country. I know that those who are most interested in the struggle think the worst of it; and, unless some immediate blow is struck, I fear that the oath of the United Irishman which is spreading will run all over the country. Nugent, whose opinions have weight with you, thinks very gloomily of the whole business.

"Your Prince was here for some hours yesterday complaining, entre nous, of his reception at Blenheim, and very much gratified by the attentions I showed him. I gave him a very handsome cold dinner which Sir J. Hippley (who, par parenthèse, is not very wise) told me was the only dinner he had got upon his tour. He seems a sensible and observant man, and cautious not to give the least offence. I am much obliged by the recollection of the picture which I was to have of you. I cannot judge whether red or blue becomes you best, or which is most like; pray therefore be so good as to desire Lady Grenville to decide which is most like you."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, May 5, Queen's House.—"I have just read the despatch from Sir Morton Eden with the account of the signing of preliminary articles of peace between the Emperor and the French. Though the situation of the Emperor was highly critical, yet it by no means excuses his not having avowed the intention of treating, and much less the keeping the stipulations secret when called upon to explain them."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, May 5, Harley Street.—"Je me flatte que vous me rendez la justice de croire que je suis tout aussi affligé que vous, et notre ami commun Starhemberg, de ce qui s'est fait aux environs de Vienne. Je vous envoie la lettre que m'a apporté votre courier de la part de Razoumowski.

"Je l'ai montré à Starhemberg, et comme il m'a dit que vous désirez que la chose ne soit pas ébruitée, je vous promet de n'en parler à personne, pas même au Prince de Wurtemberg, qui m'a prié de l'informer si j'apprens quelque chose sur la réalité de la paix.

"Je vous supplie de me renvoyer l'incluse."

COUNT RAZOUMOUSKOI to COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, April 22, Vienna.—"Vous savez, Monsieur le Comte, que c'est aux deux petites villes de Bruck et Loeben en Styrie que ce sont arrêtés les Français dans leur marche sur Vienne. Là ont commencés les armistices.

"Le I. en conséquence d'une lettre de Buonaparte à l'Archiduc.

"Le II. pour donner le temps d'apporter des pleins pouvoirs.

"Le III. pour celui de les produire et les échanger. Nous en étions là; et je n'ai pas besoin de vous dire que la crise qui menaçait cette capitale a fait saisir avec empressement l'occasion de gagner du temps. Tel était le motif des délais et du désir de prolonger les armistices quelques semaines encore si on pouvait y parvenir, et là-dessus étaient basées les instructions très succinctes des plénipotentiaires.

“ L'ambassadeur de Gallo fut associé au Comte de Merfeld pour la soi-disante négociation, mais, quand il fut question d'exhiber les pouvoirs dont ils étaient munis, Buonaparte avoua qu'il n'en avait point. Vous jugerez, sans doute, que cet étrange incident, joint à l'esprit même de la négociation, devait nous présager d'autres délais conformément au plan de Thugut. Figurez-vous donc notre surprise en apprenant hier que ces Messieurs ont signé, le 18, les préliminaires d'une paix. Je me représente le votre cas; chose pareille est peut-être sans exemple. Vous ne vous persuaderez point, sans doute, que ce ne soit un jeu de Thugut. Je peux vous assurer que son étonnement n'a pas été feint, et qu'il ne s'y attendait pas plus que moi. Voici comme la chose s'explique, de vous à moi bien entendu. Gallo (je ne sais si vous le connaissez) est par état et par caractère dans le commérage intérieur de la Cour. L'épouvante pour la ville de Vienne aura porté à lui dire à son départ de chercher à conjurer l'orage. Buonaparte lui a déclaré fermement qu'il ne souscrirait plus à un nouvel armistice, et que le 21, au matin, il marcherait à moins que les préliminaires ne fussent signés. Je ne vous en marquerai point les conditions. Je les sais très imparfaitement pour n'avoir eu qu'une demie-heure de conversation hier avec Thugut, qui m'a demandé d'ailleurs ma parole d'honneur de ne faire aucun usage du peu qu'il m'a dit, jusqu'à ce que, sous peu de jours, il puisse en faire une ample communication aux alliés.

“ J'observerai seulement que l'ensemble en est infiniment meilleur qu'on n'aurait pu s'y attendre; mais l'incohérence des idées y jette une telle confusion, qu'il est persuadé de l'impossibilité d'y donner de la consistance. Dès préliminaires signés, sans pleins pouvoirs d'un côté, ne peuvent présenter qu'une stipulation très précaire. Aussi Clarke, qui arriva au quartier-général peu d'heures après, jeta feu et flamme contre la précipitation de Buonaparte. Une clause porte la ratification dans un mois, mais dès que celle de l'Empereur sera montrée au général Français, il évacuera aussitôt le pays jusque par delà le Tagliamento. Vous sentez qu'on n'aura rien de plus pressé maintenant que d'exécuter cet article, et de voir venir ensuite; je présume donc qu'ils se mettront en marche de retraite au commencement de la semaine prochaine. Vous aurez de la peine à concevoir la conduite du général Français. Il chasse les Autrichiens, délabrés, désorganisés, annulés, depuis la Piave jusqu'à dix postes de Vienne, où la terreur panique qui les prend lui aurait livré sans obstacle une ville sans défense, vuide de troupes, la noblesse en fuite, l'habitant confus, mécontent, et dans les transes. Il entame une ouverture de paix, convient d'armistices, donne le temps aux renforts d'arriver, à l'esprit public de se remettre, et, enfin, précipite des préliminaires, dont le premier fruit et le plus essentiel est l'évacuation des provinces.

“ Ce petit Corse, qui passe pour un grand homme dans l'opinion de bien des gens, ne me paraît pas fort admirable en tout ceci. Il n'avait, à la vérité, que 32,000 hommes avec lui, et point d'artillerie de siège. Son plan sur le Tyrol a manqué, mais il ne l'a su que pendant la première armistice; Moreau n'a point passé le Rhin, mais les renforts Autrichiens n'étaient point encore à portée d'ici, car il a fallu crever hommes et chevaux pour en faire arriver une partie, il y a trois jours, afin de se donner au moins une contenance. Enfin, puisqu'à Loeben des préliminaires ont été signés quand il l'a voulu positivement, combien n'eût-il pas été plus facile de dicter la loi sous les murs de Vienne? La Providence a veillé sur nous; c'est tout ce que j'en peux conclure, et je m'y abandonne encore pour l'avenir. Je crois vous avoir dit qu'on a réclamé d'ici chez nous les secours stipulés par les traités; nous ne pouvons en avoir réponse que dans trois semaines. Thugut a jusqu'ici attendu impatiemment ceux des Anglais; il désire encore qu'il en arrive, car, je l'ai dite plus haut, il ne regarde point les bases de cette paix comme solides. Il est sûr, Monsieur le Comte, qu'on est bien lent et bien timide chez vous. Si les Ministres n'osent point encore terminer le traité, pourquoi ne fournissent-ils pas les arrérages de trois mois à compte de la future stipulation qu'ils ont promis sur leur parole sacrée? Les finances ici sont abimées; et c'est le grand épouvantail dont on s'est servi à l'égard du Souverain, qu'à trop juste titre malheureusement, car le discrédit du papier menaçait de la banqueroute."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, May 5, Cleveland Row.—"Mille graces, mon cher ami, pour la communication de vos nouvelles. Quelqu'affligeans que soient les détails qu'elles renferment, ils le sont moins que ceux de mes dépêches, parceque la réserve envers notre Ministre relativement aux stipulations de cette paix était faite pour autoriser toute sorte de soupçons; tandis que votre lettre paraît annoncer une communication ample et prochaine.

"C'est cette réserve, ou plutôt ce refus de communication, que j'ai souhaité d'adoucir vis-à-vis du public d'ici, dans l'espérance que dans peu de jours on se sera expliqué avec plus de franchise, comme, en vérité, notre conduite l'exige.

"Il est difficile de concevoir la nécessité d'une paix aussi précipitée, dans une position que tant de circonstances pouvaient, de jour en jour, rendre plus avantageuse. Mais il ne peut y avoir des motifs suffisans pour en cacher les conditions à des alliés, qui, de leur côté, ont toujours agi avec franchise et bonne foi. Quelle que soit la paix qu'on a faite, notre union n'en deviendra que plus nécessaire. Il faudra bien nous attendre pour empêcher que les principes Révolutionnaires ne deviennent le droit public de l'Europe. C'est pourquoi je désire de ménager l'honneur de la Cour de Vienne même au moment où elle paraît avoir le plus oublié ce qu'elle doit à nous et à elle-même.

"Un peu de temps nous mettra à même de débrouiller ce chaos. Dieu veuille qu'il en résulte des moyens pour le maintien de l'ordre public."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, May 6, Harley Street.—"Je suis bien aise de savoir que la lettre que j'ai reçu de Razoumoukoi vous a satisfait sur l'assurance positive qu'il me donne de la prochaine communication qu'il annonce de ces maudits préliminaires qui ont été visiblement signés à l'insu de Thugut. Vous avez dû observer que ce même Ministre a dit à Razoumoukoi que l'incohérence et la confusion de ces préliminaires rendent presque impossible leur exécution; ainsi la chose peut encore tourner autrement qu'on ne le voit. Nous saurons le tout dans quatre à cinq jours.

"J'ai passé ce matin au Bureau, espérant de vous y trouver; mais puisque vous êtes à la campagne, faite-moi la grace de me faire savoir à votre arrivée en ville, quand je pourai vous voir pour le moment. Notre ami Starhemberg est désespéré et indigné de ce que sa Cour vient de faire."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, May 6, London.—“J’ai écrit hier assez longuement à ma Cour par l’occasion de votre courier, et je ne lui ai point caché mon étonnement et ma douleur personnelle de tout ce qui vient d’arriver. Je sais bien que cela ne remédiera point à un mal déjà fait ; mais il me semble qu’il y a des occasions dans la vie où un honnête homme se doit à lui-même (surtout quand il est en place) de faire connaître que tout ce qui est contre l’honneur le révolte.

“J’ai eu soin de relever, comme je le devais, la noblesse de votre conduite amicale en ménageant notre réputation intacte et glorieuse pendant six ans, mais qui malheureusement ne donne depuis quinze jours que trop de prises à nos ennemis. J’ai ajouté que je savais qu’on nous estimait trop encore pour n’être pas convaincus que nous ne nous soyons sérieusement occupés de l’intérêt de nos alliés, et que nous ne nous empressions de leur donner incessamment une entière et pleine communication de nos dernières transactions. J’ai profité de la circonstance pour rappeler la fidélité constante que vous nous avez montré pendant toute cette guerre, et je n’ai point balancé à prouver que vous étiez le seul allié véritable et utile que l’Autriche ait eu depuis longtemps ; en conseillant, en même temps, de vous ménager comme nos intérêts l’exigent, et comme nous en avons tous les moyens en redoublant de confiance vis-à-vis de vous ; ce qui serait une manière certaine de faire oublier une démarche précipitée, occasionnée d’une part par la crainte, et de l’autre par des plénipotentiaires trop avides de faire. Mon zèle m’a porté à faire appercevoir à ma Cour tout le parti qu’on pourrait néanmoins tirer encore de cette besogne si mal entamée, si on vous y plaçait convenablement et à propos ; et, d’un autre côté, les malheurs incalculables qui résulteraient d’une séparation d’intérêt avec l’Angleterre (quod Deus avertat) dont le moindre serait son rapprochement de la perfide Prusse, et le pire, la subversion des trônes et le triomphe complet de l’Anarchie. Je désire qu’on profite des avis que j’ai pris la liberté de dire hardiment dans ce moment, comme je m’y suis cru obligé. Ils feront sûrement effet si M. Eden m’a secondé à propos, et surtout sans aigreur. Il est bien important d’en éviter jusqu’à la moindre apparence. Cette raison m’a fait lire avec peine dans les papiers d’hier que M. Pitt avait déclaré ne vouloir plus faire d’avances à l’Empereur. Je conçois que, d’ici à une plus ample information, il ne nous avance rien. Mais pourquoi le dire ? Pourquoi s’oter aussi la possibilité de nous être utile un jour s’il le voulait ? Ne peut-il pas arriver que le Directoire refuse ses ratifications ; que le Congrès assemblé se sépare au bout de quelques semaines, et qu’on commence de nouveau à se battre ?

“Quoiqu’il en soit, le désir de conserver cette intimité si nécessaire entre nos deux Cours, si indispensable au bonheur de l’Europe et au maintien de l’ordre contre les attaques de l’Anarchie m’a fourni l’idée de trouver après l’événement désagréable qui vient de se passer un moyen de cimenter de nouveau encore les liens qui nous unissent. Il faudra que, tôt ou tard, nous fassions un emprunt, au moins pour le remboursement de ce que nous vous devons. Cet arrangement exigera une espèce d’acte ou de convention, dans laquelle je voudrais qu’on renouvellât d’une manière solennelle les assurances de la solidité de notre alliance, ainsi que la promesse de se tenir étroitement liés de vœux et d'intérêts conjointement avec la Cour de Russie. On pourrait y ajouter telle autre stipulation que la circonstance ferait juger convenable ; et cette convention en passant l'éponge sur le passé (sur lequel je suppose que nous vous satisferons tout à fait par nos aveux sincères) ranimerait entre nos deux Cours ces sentimens dont je suis si pénétré, et la durée desquels seuls dépend, en vérité, la sûreté future des trônes.

“Permettez que je profite de cet instant pour vous prémunir contre les embûches et les pièges que je sais que la Cour de Berlin va vous tendre pour vous détacher de nous. Il y a plusieurs mois qu'elle prépare ses filets, et elle croit avoir trouvé le moment de les jeter. Il ne suffit pas de les éviter ; mais il faut encore que nous ne puissions jamais soupçonner que vous soyez disposés à prêter l'oreille un seul instant aux insinuations perfides du Cabinet qu'est la cause de tous les maux de l'Europe. N'oubliez pas, de grace, que notre faiblesse et nos torts mêmes nous rendront plus inquiets à cet égard. Voilà en vérité assez de radotage ; il y a longtemps que vous me permettez mes nonsense ; je ne vous en ennuierai plus avant de me retrouver en droit de vous parler à coeur ouvert officiellement, comme en mon particulier. Croyez que jusqu'à cette époque, qui ne sera, j'espère, retardée que de peu de jours, je ne serai ni heureux ni tranquille. Le passé me tourmente, le présent me déchire, et l'avenir m'inquiète.”

French.

GEORGE HAMMOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, May 9, Vienna.—“In addition to what I have stated in my public letter of this date, with regard to the concealing from the Austrian Minister the instructions which I had received to proceed to Berlin, I beg leave to mention to your Lordship that, having no direction either to communicate those instructions or to conceal them, I was left entirely to my own discretion in this respect. In this situation, as it appeared to me by no means improbable that the knowledge of the hasty manner in which the preliminaries had been concluded might induce His Majesty's Ministers to make some alteration in the system which they had previously formed, or that His Majesty might accede to the invitation of assisting at the congress, I felt it incumbent upon me not to preclude any beneficial use which might be made of these circumstances, by the premature disclosure of a determination that had been taken at a time when they were unknown. I, farther, thought it right not to put the Austrian Government at present in possession of the fact that His Majesty's Ministers had taken any measures founded on the probability of this country's having made a separate peace ; more especially as I knew that the messenger who carried the intelligence to England of that event, had sailed from Cuxhaven on the 29th ultimo with a fair wind, and that, therefore, answers to the dispatches sent by him might be received in the course of a very few days. At the same time, however, I thought it proper not to quit Vienna without taking leave of M. de Thugut. With regard to my intention of remaining for a day or two at Dresden under the hope of learning there your Lordship's sentiments, subsequent to the arrival in England of the intelligence of the preliminaries being signed with France, I trust no ill can result from that measure, as Dresden is in the direct road both to Berlin and Cuxhaven ; and I can, therefore, prosecute my journey to the former place if your Lordship should still think it necessary, or to the latter, if I should perceive that his Majesty's Ministers have adopted any other system."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, May 10, Cleveland Row.—"Je viens de prendre les ordres du Roi au sujet de votre note. Sa Majesté m'a chargé de vous prévenir que Madame la Princesse vous recevra demain dans les appartemens de la Reine, avant le cercle, si vous voulez bien vous y rendre à une heure et demie. Vous aurez la complaisance d'apporter l'ordre que vous présenterez alors à s'Altesse Royale.

"Le Roi m'apprend que j'ai un compliment à vous faire. Vous savez que c'est de bon cœur que je me réjouis de tout ce que vous est agréable.

"J'ai des lettres de Vienne qui vont jusqu'au 29. M. de Thugut persistait encore dans son incroyable mystère sur un secret que les papiers de Paris nous ont dévoilé. Si vous avez encore quelques particularités, vous m'obligerez infiniment en me les communiquant.

"Nos lettres de Portsmouth sont meilleures aujourd'hui, et l'on peut espérer que l'arrivée de Lord Howe apaisera tout. Mais quel malheur d'en douter encore !"

French. Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, May 10, Harley Street.—"J'ai reçu votre lettre, et je ne manquerai pas de me rendre demain à une heure et demie à l'appartement de la Reine au Palais de St. James pour avoir audience de Sa Altesse la Princesse Royale, et lui remettre la lettre et l'ordre de Sainte Catherine que l'Impératrice lui envoie.

"Je suis très mortifié de ne pouvoir vous donner des nouvelles de Vienne. C'est le cher Chevalier Eden qui en est la cause, car, toutes les fois qu'il a averti le Comte Razoumousskoi de l'expédition de ses courriers, jamais dans aucun cas, jamais il n'a manqué de m'écrire sur les affaires, et quand ce cher Chevalier ne l'avertissait pas, et qu'il apprenait après qu'il y aurait un courier Anglais départi sans qu'il l'eût su, il me témoignait combien il était fâché de ce peu d'attention de l'Ambassadeur d'Angleterre.

"J'ai été au Bureau, et j'ai tourmenté le bon Monsieur Canning pour savoir s'il n'y a pas de lettre pour moi de Vienne, et il m'a protesté qu'il n'y en aurait pas, qu'il l'avait demandé au courier, et que celui-ci l'a assuré qu'il n'avait d'autre paquet que ceux qu'il lui a remis. Je ne doute pas que le courier qui doit venir de Vienne à notre malheureux ami Starhemberg m'apporterait des nouvelles sur les affaires de la part de Razoumousskoi, et je vous donne ma parole que je vous communiquerai tout, et s'il y a quelque chose que je ne pourrai pas faire voir au Secrétaire d'État, je le ferai voir à mon ami Lord Grenville que j'aime, que j'estime, et auquel je serai attaché toute ma vie dans quelque situation que, lui et moi, nous nous trouvions un jour.

"Je vous rend mille et mille grâces pour la bonne nouvelle que vous m'avez donné par réport à l'affaire de Portsmouth ; cette maudite affaire m'a privé de sommeil les deux nuits dernières. Il est affreux que des Anglais cherchent à renverser la constitution Anglaise, la seule où l'homme soit dans toute sa dignité.

"J'ai cru avec un plaisir extrême que vous avez eu le noble courage de dire au Duc de Bedford que c'est lui qui est cause de ce qui est arrivé sur la flotte, et je suis fâché que dans la Chambre de Commune quand l'opposition parla que l'armée va ou peut se révolter, on ne lui a pas répondu qu'elle parle d'après ses désirs, et d'après les billets qu'on repandait parmis les troupes pour les révolter, et qu'il est clair que ceux qui parlent de la révolte prochaine de l'armée, la désirent et l'excite. En vérité ceux qui veulent bouleverser le pays ne méritent aucun ménagement."

French.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, May 11, York Farm.—"Quoiqu'il ne me soit encore rien parvenu d'officiel sur nos dernières transactions avec l'ennemi de l'autel, des trônes, et du repos de l'Europe, je ne puis m'empêcher d'avoir l'honneur de vous entretenir un moment sur un objet aussi important, et dont la douloureuse image me poursuit sans cesse et en tous lieux. Je me suis réfugié à la campagne pour m'en distraire un peu ; mais l'idée insupportable de ces malheureux préliminaires m'y accompagne et ne me laisse point de repos. Comme je cherche néanmoins tous les moyens de me procurer des renseignemens sur ce qui s'est passé, j'ai tâché de lire le plus de lettres que j'ai pu parmi celles qui sont venues dernièrement du Continent ; et, en comparant leur contenu, j'ai crû pouvoir fixer une opinion vraisemblable sur les derniers événemens.

"Il paraît, hors de doute, que l'Archiduc est celui qui a porté le découragement à son comble. Il est bien certain que le 12 encore, on était résolu de tenir ferme ; et la meilleure preuve en est le départ subit des jeunes archiducs, menés à Prague par mon père, et les préparatifs très sérieux faits pour la défense de Vienne. J'ai lieu de supposer, avec un apparence de certitude, que Buonaparte avait fait, avant cette époque et depuis sa première lettre à l'Archiduc en date du 31 de Mars, plusieurs propositions de différens genres que M. de Thugut que j'aime, respecte, et regrette, a néanmoins déjà eu tort de ne pas communiquer dans leur entier à M. le Chevalier Eden ; lequel a, peut-être, en un autre tort de ne pas les deviner, et de les apprendre par tous les moyens dont un ministre étranger un peu adroit doit se servir en pareil cas. Toutes les notions que j'ai, s'accordent à me prouver que la nature de ces propositions portait sur un démembrement de l'Empire, et que mon maître s'y est toujours refusé avec horreur. Je ne pardonne pas encore à M. de Thugut de n'avoir point communiqué à M. Eden les pouvoirs donnés à M. de Meerfeld, car ou ces pouvoirs étaient insuffisans, comme il l'a dit depuis, et, alors, il ne courrait aucun risque de les montrer au ministre allié qu'il rassurait ainsi ; ou ils étaient suffisans, et il avait défense de les montrer, et dans ce cas il devait quitter immédiatement, et dès qu'on manquait à ce qu'on devait à l'Angleterre ; c'est du moins comme j'aurais certainement agi à sa place. On me trouvera peut-être exagéré, mais je m'en fais gloire ; et je suis trop vrai pour ne pas vous avouer que ces assurances du 17, données par M. de Thugut, font une petite tâche dans la belle histoire de sa carrière politique, puisqu'elles ne pouvaient pas être sincères, aucun pouvoir quelconque n'ayant pu être expédié à Meerfeld, sans être contresigné par lui. Je n'en dis pas de même à l'égard de ceux de M. de Gallo, qui peuvent (quoique je ne le crois pas non plus) être émanés directement de l'Empereur par l'influence de l'Impératrice. Je trouve en outre que, puisqu'on était décidé à faire cette paix que j'abhorrer, il y avait un moyen plus honnête, qui eut été que M. de Thugut eut dit tout franchement à M. Eden, Nous ne savons plus que faire. Nous sommes à bout de voies, et je ne vous cacherai pas que la nécessité la plus urgente va nous forger à la paix si nous obtenons des conditions supportables. Cette manière était loyale au moins, parcequ'elle était vraie, et l'Empereur l'eut certainement adoptée, si on la lui avait suggérée.

“Le secret qu'on garde encore, vis-à-vis du Ministre d'Angleterre, est inexcusable selon moi; et je crains aussi, de vous à moi, qu'il ne tienne un peu à l'humeur de notre Ministre qui, décidé à quitter honorablement, n'est point fâché de se faire regretter par vous, et ne parle pas à l'Empereur sur la circonstance. Daignez en croire un ami sans préjugé, et qui connaît bien les personnages dirigeans dans son pays, Si on représentait à mon souverain ce qu'il serait obligé de faire actuellement, il s'y conformerait, parcequ'il est bon, et qu'il ne veut manquer à rien. J'en suis certain. M. Eden aurait encore eu entre les mains un moyen de parvenir à obtenir la communication que M. de Thugut quittant ne s'est pas donné la peine de prouver qu'on lui devait, et ce moyen était de demander une audience à l'Empereur. Vous savez que tout le monde et même les Ministres étrangers voit l'Empereur tête-à-tête dès qu'on le veut. Il lui aurait démontré que l'on ne pouvait pas faire un mystère à un allié aussi fidèle et aussi utile d'une transaction essentielle. Votre Ministre, seul à seul avec mon maître, eut pu en dire davantage, et on l'aurait écouté.

“On ne peut nier néanmoins que, si on en avait agi autrement envers nous, car je ne pardonnerai jamais cette conduite, les bases de notre paix, dès qu'on est réduit à en conclure une avec ces infâmes régicides, seraient très honorables; puisque.

I. Ce sont les Français qui, sous les murs de Vienne, ont demandé la paix;

II. Que nous avons eu le bon esprit de décliner jusqu'au bout la médiation perfide de la Prusse, qui voulait pêcher en eau trouble, et piller l'Empire en ayant l'air de nous rendre un service important;

III. Qu'enfin, l'Empereur aura à jamais le mérite incontestable d'avoir sacrifié les plus grands avantages, et des acquisitions considérables, à l'intégrité de l'Empire; et qu'ainsi, quelques soient les pertes qu'il éprouve, il aura la gloire d'avoir sauvé l'Allemagne du plan de destruction combiné contre elle par la France et surtout par la Prusse.

“Je ne veux pas manquer de vous faire observer ici combien il serait déplacé que le Ministre Anglais fût actuellement, dans son premier moment d'humeur, des ouvertures amicales à Berlin. Je sens bien vivement nos torts, mais ils sont loin d'approcher encore de ceux que la Prusse a déjà eu, et aura sans cesse. Chaque démarche de cette Cour est marquée au coin de la trahison, et de la perfidie; et je sais à n'en pas douter que, depuis très peu de temps, les conférences intimes de Caillard et de M. de Haugwitz redoublent encore, et sont plus fréquentes qu'auparavant. Ne croyez pas que la prévention, bien justifiée par l'expérience, que j'ai contre la Prusse m'aveugle dans ce moment; mais la même justice qui me fait rougir de notre dernière conduite, me force à tâcher de vous prémunir contre les embûches qu'on vous prépare. Six années de constance, de fidélité, et d'héroïsme peuvent contrebalancer un instant d'un oubli coupable. Mais je ne vois pas un seul trait de vertu dans la chronique Prussienne qu'on puisse opposer à son Machiavélisme non interrompu. La Cour de Petersbourg nous rend justice dans ce sens; elle est entièrement détachée de Berlin. Ses derniers offices au Roi et chez nous le démontrent évidemment; peut-être même que sa lenteur à se prononcer dans la guerre des souverains a hâté nos déterminations. Nous les excuserons à ses yeux quoiqu'on ne les excusera jamais aux miens. Dans cet état de choses, l'Angleterre peut-elle balancer et songer un seul instant à préférer la Prusse aux deux Cours Impériales indissolublement unies de coeur et d'intérêt, et à l'abri de toutes les insinuations Berlinaises qui voudraient les diviser.

"C'est parceque je n'ignore pas que ces mêmes Prussiens vont s'efforcer de nous persuader que vous vous rapprochez d'eux, et que je crains que nous n'ajoutions trop aisément foi à leurs discours atroces, que je m'empresse de vous parler aussi vivement sur cet objet. Ne voyez, au reste, dans tout ce que je viens de vous dire, que l'expression de la douleur, des regrets, et des craintes d'un honnête homme, attaché à ce pays-ci comme au sien, et à vous-même plus qu'à personne."

GEORGE HAMMOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, May 13, Lobositz.—"The messenger Basset having overtaken me here, I avail myself of this circumstance to add to my letters from Vienna, of which he is the bearer, that it is not my intention to wait at Dresden (at which place I shall be to-morrow) for the messenger who, as I understand from your Lordship's dispatch of the 2nd instant to Sir Morton Eden by Scott, would be dispatched last Friday week, longer than Thursday next; on which day, if he be not then arrived, I shall proceed to Berlin. With respect to my immediately communicating to the Prussian Minister the object of my journey thither, I shall be guided by the instructions which I may hope to receive there, or by those which Lord Elgin may have received upon the subject. I am the more inclined to use some discretion in this respect, as I am apprehensive that the delay in receiving the answers from St. Petersburg to the dispatch sent by Shaw, may be longer than that which I stated in my letter from Vienna; since I learn from Sir Morton Eden that, subsequently to my departure, Count Razoumowsky has received information from his court that the Emperor intends to visit some of the distant provinces of his empire previously to his return to St. Petersburg. In which case, if the ratification of the preliminaries be now received at Vienna, it is not absolutely impossible that the invitation to His Imperial Majesty to send a Minister to the congress, may reach him almost as soon as the communication transmitted by Shaw.

"I flatter myself that your Lordship will have the goodness to forgive the anxiety which I have expressed with respect to the receiving farther instructions previously to my arrival at Berlin; for although, in the delay which I have proposed, I conceive myself to be acting in opposition to the letter of your Lordship's last instructions, yet I venture to hope that, with my knowledge of what has passed at Vienna, I shall be justified in your Lordship's opinion for exercising some discretion on this point."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797, May, York Farm].—"Voici enfin des nouvelles plus consolantes. J'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer la dépêche que j'ai reçue; j'en ai une autre chiffrée, dont je vous rendrai compte après le déchiffrement. On veut bien sérieusement rester intime avec l'Angleterre. C'est beaucoup pour mon cœur. Je suis plus tranquille. Mandez-moi, ou faites moi de grace savoir, avec la même franchise, ce que M.

Hammond vous dit sur les conditions de la paix ; s'est-on ouvert à lui ? Je verrai cela dans le chiffre, vraisemblablement."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, May 30, Queen's House.—"In consequence of Lord Grenville's note, I have persuaded the Prince of Wurtemberg to defer his journey till Friday, but I do not believe it will be possible to get him to put it off longer ; indeed his servants and cloaths are gone to Harwich, and he is obliged to send after the baggage waggon that he may have linen to stay till that day. I hope therefore no time will be lost in sending out cutters to look into the Texel, and that Admiral Duncan will have orders to get his fleet out to secure the passage of the frigates."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, May 31, Downing Street.—"Lord Grenville has the honour humbly to submit to your Majesty the draft which was agreed upon this evening at the meeting of your Majesty's servants, for the official note to be sent to Paris. Lord Grenville trusts that your Majesty will find this paper as unexceptionable as the nature of the circumstances, and the occasion to which it is adapted will allow."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, June 1, Queen's House.—"I should not do justice to my feelings if I did not, in confidence, state to Lord Grenville that the many humiliating steps I have been advised to take in the last nine months have taken so deep an impression on my mind that I undoubtedly feel this kingdom lowered in its proper estimation much below what I should have flattered myself could have been the case during the latter part of my reign ; that I certainly look on the additional measure now proposed as a confirmation of that opinion ; at the same time that Lord Grenville has certainly worded it as little exceptionably as its nature would permit. I cannot add more on this occasion but that if both Houses of Parliament are in as tame a state of mind as it is pretended, I do not see the hopes that either war can be continued with effect or peace obtained but of the most disgraceful and unsolid tenure."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1797, June 2, Cleveland Row.—"Quoiqu'il serait difficile dans ce moment de faire des confidences au Ministre d'Autriche, je ne veux pas laisser ignorer à mon ami le Comte de Starhemberg que j'ai envoyé hier une lettre, par un bâtiment parlementaire, avec la proposition au Gouvernement Français de renouveler nos négociations pacifiques. Un peu de confiance de la part de votre Gouvernement aurait pu nous autoriser d'attendre l'invitation à un congrès. Peut-être qu'on préférerait à Vienne de nous forcer de faire ce que nous avons fait. Peut-être ne s'en soucie-t-on du tout. Peut-être même tout ceci tournera en bien. Dieu le veuille !"

COUNT STARHEMBERG TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797, June 3, York Farm.—“Vous veniez de quitter le bureau quand j’y suis arrivé hier. Immédiatement après la réception de votre premier billet, j’avais pris mon cheval pour me rendre in full speed à vos ordres. J’ai trouvé à mon retour ici le billet confidentiel que vous m’avez fait l’honneur de m’écrire. Croyez que votre bien tendre et véritable ami Starhemberg à été, on ne peut pas plus, sensible à votre touchante attention pour lui, mais il aime à se flatter que, même en qualité de Ministre Impérial, il a et continuera d’avoir des droits à la confiance du Secrétaire d’État. Je suis convaincu que mon courier, qui n’est pas arrivé puisque le vent ne le lui permet pas, m’apportera de quoi vous satisfaire. Il ne m’appartient aucunement de juger votre dernière détermination, mais je suis trop vrai pour ne pas vous répéter encore que je regrette beaucoup que M. Hammond ait témoigné autant d’humeur à son départ, et ait quitté Vienne si brusquement; je regrette également l’envoi de votre dernier courier. Il est plus essentiel que jamais de s’entendre, et il faut le vouloir des deux côtés. Un premier tort ne doit pas en occasionner un second. J’espère qu’on sentira cette vérité chez nous et ici. Nous ne pouvons nous passer l’un de l’autre. Tout ce qui y supplierait ne serait que des convenances factices. Cette idée me rassure et me console en dernière analyse. La Russie ne remplirait pas plus pour vous le vide de l’Autriche que ne le ferait la Prusse. Elle ne serait point perfide, et voilà tout. Ce n’est pas d’aujourd’hui que vous connaissez celui qui ne voit de bonheur pour lui que dans votre estime et votre amitié, et de prospérité pour son pays que dans l’intimité avec le votre.”

Postscript.—“Ne croyez pas que Thugut soit étranger à tout ce qui se passe. Comptez sur la parole de votre ami, ce ministre trouve la paix honorable. Gallo n’a été qu’un instrument ignorant et intrigant, et un étranger dont on a sacrifié la réputation déjà peu florissante. Ce vilain Archiduc a fait la paix. Thugut n’en est pas fâché au fond, mais il l’affecte. Ceci est le vrai, mais dans notre intimité. Je connais mieux mon pays que M. Eden, et vous pouvez ne pas douter de mes renseignements, que je ne donne qu’à vous.”

EARL SPENCER TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, June 5, Admiralty.—“It has occurred to me that, as it appears very improbable that the four ships in Yarmouth roads will join Admiral Duncan, it might not be amiss to apply to Woronzow for an order to the Russian Admiral (who is there with three sail of the line, a frigate, and a sloop) to join Duncan on his rendezvous off the Texel for a little time.

“I fear the change of wind to-day will retard the junction of Sir Roger Curtis who sailed only yesterday from Spithead, and facilitate the going out of the Dutch fleet.

“No satisfactory news from Sheerness. The delegates have hanged two men; but were obliged to do it with their own hands, as not a man in the ship would assist them.”

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, June 5, Cleveland Row.—“Il paraît qu’il n’y a guères lieu de se flatter que les quatre vaisseaux qui sont à Yarmouth se résoudront à rejoindre l’Amiral Duncan avant que la révolte à Sheerness ne soit entièrement calmée par la soumission des équipages.

“Duncan a avec lui deux vaisseaux, et Sir Roger Curtis est parti de Spithead pour se mettre sous ses ordres.

“Tous nos avis annoncent que la flotte Hollandaise est prête à mettre à la voile avec des troupes pour venir nous attaquer soit ici, soit (comme il est plus probable) en Irlande.

“Si dans ces circonstances vous pourriez persuader à votre Amiral de retarder son départ, et de se joindre à Duncan, la force serait suffisante; et je pense que, bien loin d'être désapprouvé, vous vous feriez un nouveau mérite auprès de l'Empereur en le mettant à même de rendre, au commencement de son règne, le plus grand service à l'Angleterre qu'elle ait jamais reçu de quelque autre nation ou puissance que ce fut.

“Je ne vous écris pas officiellement, parceque j'ai voulu savoir vos sentimens sur cette affaire avant de vous passer une note ministérielle. Si la chose est faisable, je suis bien sûr de vos dispositions personnelles.”

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, June 16, Downing Street.—“Your Majesty will receive from Mr. Pitt the minute of the meeting of your Majesty's servants this morning at which the draft of the answer to be returned to the late communication from Paris was finally settled. Lord Grenville would not discharge his duty to your Majesty as an honest man or as an attached and dutiful servant if, with the opinion which he cannot help entertaining on the subject of that paper, he omitted to declare to your Majesty without reserve how it appears to him to fall both in tone and substance below what the present situation of your Majesty's kingdoms, even under all the pressure of the moment, might have entitled your Majesty's Government to assume when speaking in your Majesty's name; and how much even the object of peace itself is endangered by a line of so much apparent weakness.

“It is the more necessary for Lord Grenville to submit to your Majesty, with all humility, his sentiments on this point from the circumstance of their relating to a matter so immediately connected with that department in which your Majesty has condescended to think his councils and services might be useful, and from the necessity of the measure receiving its execution in that department, and under the signature of the person placed by your Majesty at the head of it. In other times and circumstances he should have thought that with his opinion of this measure there remained for him but one line, that of most humbly requesting your Majesty to dispense with his farther services, and laying at your Majesty's feet, with every expression and sentiment of duty and gratitude, an office in the execution of which his opinions do not coincide with those of the majority of your Majesty's servants. But the crisis of the present hour is such that the withdrawing even of the most insignificant member of the Government might weaken it in the public opinion at a moment when every good man must wish it strengthened. And he feels that no motive short of the most uncontrollable necessity could justify to himself his deserting in a moment of so much danger that post in which your Majesty has been pleased to command his service. If in this respect he is led, from whatever sentiment, to attach too high an importance to any step which he might take, he humbly entreats your Majesty to pardon his presumption, and he submits himself entirely to your Majesty's disposal, anxious only to conduct himself according to the best dictates of his conscience, and thus to merit, what he knows he can no otherwise obtain, the continuance of your Majesty's gracious and favourable opinion, in whatever station, public or private, he may be placed."

Note by Lord Grenville.—"This letter written during the time of the mutiny in the fleet."

Enclosure.

MINUTE OF CABINET.

1797, June 16.

Present:

Lord Chancellor, Lord President, Duke of Portland, Earl Spencer, Lord Grenville, Marquis Cornwallis, Earl of Chatham, Mr. Secretary Dundas, Mr. Pitt.

"It is humbly recommended to your Majesty than an official note conformable to the accompanying draft should be transmitted to Paris in answer to the last communication from thence. Lord Grenville desires to express his dissent."

Copy by Lord Grenville.

GEORGE III. to [W. PITT].

1797, June 17, Windsor.—"I am sorry to find the note officielle, and consequently the Minute of Cabinet could not be drawn up agreeable to the sentiments of all the ministers; for, though Lord Grenville is the only one that has dissented, yet I perceive neither Lord Liverpool nor Mr. Wyndham attend, which I must suppose was to avoid taking the step which, with Lord Grenville's manner of viewing the paper, he could not honourably avoid.

"I do not deny, though I shall not object to its being sent to Paris, that I rather think the tone taken is too low; and that I fear the object will be destroyed, as it will probably raise that of that horrid nation, and must oblige us to come to some explanation which might have been done more advantageously at present.

"I am happy to find, however unpleasant this business may be to Lord Grenville, that he is too sensible what he owes to me at this time to think of wishing to change his situation, and I am certain his talents will be very material in conducting the present negotiation should it really come to be the serious object of both nations."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, June 17, Windsor.—"The explanation which I have received in writing from Lord Grenville for his dissent to the Minute of Cabinet, and the proposed note officielle in answer to the last communication from Paris, so much more tallies with my own view of the business than the opinion of those who have drawn it up, that I can fairly approve of the whole of his conduct on this occasion; but however I think the tone adopted is below that which I should think advisable, I fear the having sought from hence a negotiation precludes our instantly breaking it off.

"However it may be irksome to Lord Grenville to hold the pen on this occasion, I must feel at this particular moment his remaining in his situation absolutely essential, for he will be able to stave off many farther humiliations that might be attempted from having shown a mind jealous of what seems in the outset an attempt to draw us into future embarrassments.

"I shall not be surprised if the note now prepared may not open a scene of chicane that may prevent the negotiation, in which case the conduct of Lord Grenville will be as highly thought of by his colleagues as it is now by me."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, June 17, Cleveland Row.--"Je vous restitue, avec bien des grâces, la lettre du Comte de Razoumowski. J'ai enfin reçu ce matin, par un courier du Chevalier Eden, ces fameux préliminaires. Ils sont tels que nous les connaissons déjà. Il n'y a, donc, rien de nouveau, mais on ne peut lire sans éprouver un sentiment d'indignation mêlée de douleur, des stipulations entre l'Empereur et le Directoire Français pour s'indemniser au dépens de la République de Venise. Cet objet était consigné à des articles secrets, dont on ne nous a pas communiqué la copie. Mais comme Eden a eu la permission de les lire, il me rend un compte fidèle de la teneur de ces stipulations indignes. Tout ceci est bien fait pour donner gain de cause aux Jacobins partout."

French. Copy.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, June 18, York Farm.--"J'aime à croire que vous voulez bien me rendre assez de justice, et que vous me connaissez assez, pour juger de tous les sentimens que j'ai dû éprouver à la lecture de ces maudits préliminaires que j'ai enfin reçu hier, avec ordre de vous les communiquer. Notre ami commun le Comte de Woronzow m'a dit que vous en aviez déjà connaissance, ainsi que de l'infâme stipulation secrète pour la spoliation de Venise, dont on me rend compte également. Je ne puis vous peindre ma peine et mon indignation. C'est la virginité jusqu'à présent intacte de la probité, de la dignité, et de l'honneur Autrichien que nous venons de perdre. Marie Thérèse dans des temps malheureux a prouvé qu'elle savait faire des sacrifices sans se déshonorer. Le système de brigandage et d'avilissement, après six ans de constance, devait donc tomber en partage à son petit fils. La conduite de Thugut n'a point de nom. Il est aussi coupable que Gallo, puisqu'il a tout laissé faire. Il est plus vil puisqu'il reste. Faut-il que mon malheureux païs, où il y a néanmoins tant de grands seigneurs parmi lesquels il se rencontre cependant quelques talens, soit toujours gouverné par des espèces comme Spielmann et Thugut, ou des pantalons Italiens comme ce poliçon de Gallo. Hélas! hélas!! Quoiqu'il en soit, toutes mes dépêches et mes lettres sont pleines du désir de rester bien avec l'Angleterre. Vos propres principes coïncident à cet égard avec notre volonté. Je vois encore des moyens de remédier à beaucoup de choses, quoiqu'on ne puisse pas tout réparer. Daignez me nommer un jour pour aller vous faire ma cour, vous faire cette pénible communication, et convenir avec vous du langage que nous tiendrons à Vienne. Adieu. Conservez-moi bonté, amitié, et estime; mes sentimens ne méritent pas qu'on me confonde avec mes ——— supérieurs. Je vous assure que je suis bien malheureux. Je ne me consolerais jamais de ce qui vient d'arriver."

French.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, July 2, York Farm.--"J'ai reçu une longue dépêche chiffrée de ma Cour, dont le sens roule sur les difficultés qu'on entrevoit à pouvoir ratifier notre convention pour l'emprunt. On me promet à ce sujet des détails ultérieurs par ce courier, attendu comme le Messie, et qui n'arrive pas. Ce sera par la même occasion que je recevrai l'instruction (que je n'ai pas encore) de vous entretenir officiellement à cet égard. M. de Meerfeld est allé par ordre de l'Empereur à Milan pour insister positivement auprès des Plénipotentiaires Français sur la fixation positive de l'endroit et du moment de l'ouverture du congrès. Nos troupes ont déjà occupé la plus grande partie de l'Istrie et de la Dalmatie. On craint des troubles dans ce dernier pays où l'anarchie prévaut. Voilà les fruits de la paix, et de toute communication avec ces infâmes Français. Puisse le ciel préserver votre bon pays des maux inévitables de la pacification avec l'anarchie; il ne l'a sûrement pas mérité. Je suis trop accablé, honteux, et désolé pour vous en dire davantage. Plaignez-moi; ceux qui pensent comme votre ami le méritent. Le Lieutenant Raigersfeld vient d'être échangé. C'était la seule chose qui s'opposait à son avancement. J'ose donc de nouveau le recommander à vos bontés, et à votre souvenir."

French.

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1797, July 4, Dropmore.—"J'avais déjà appris par les dernières lettres du Chevalier Eden qu'il était encore question d'ajouter à tous les autres torts celui de manquer à ses engagements pécuniaires, et de rejeter sur nous les pertes qui ne résultent que de ce que nous avons fait, et voulu faire pour nos alliés. Je vous ai dit tout ce que je pense à ce sujet. Il me paraît que la question est bien autrement importante pour l'intérêt de Sa Majesté Impériale que pour celui de l'Angleterre. Nous y perdrons quelque argent pour avoir cru à la bonne foi et à la probité du Gouvernement Autrichien. La Cour de Vienne y perdra pour jamais son crédit, son honneur, et la possibilité de trouver ici en quelque cas que ce fut une assistance quelconque en fait de finances. Tout compté, je crois véritablement qu'il si nous sommes les dupes, ce sera le Dupeer qui perdra.

"La fraternisation Istrienne et Dalmatienne n'était pas difficile à prévoir, non plus que tout ce qui se prépare dans l'Empire. Dans la perspective de tant de maux, c'est toujours une grande consolation de pouvoir dire qu'on n'y a pas contribué; et cette consolation le Gouvernement de mon pays partage avec vous, et le très petit nombre d'honnêtes gens qui ont soutenu, jusqu'à la fin, la bonne cause.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, July 6, Windsor.—"Lord Grenville will be surprised when he finds that the letter he has forwarded to me is from the uncle of the King of Sweden, and on the business I have already declined his proposing to come to England; I therefore desire an explicit answer may be prepared for me disapproving of any such idea, as I certainly shall not consent to any union of him with either of my daughters. How shameful a deceit in his sister's sending this through the Duchess of York?"

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, July 6, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has the honour most humbly to submit to your Majesty a draft to Mr. Craufurd on the subject of the Condé army; to which he has taken the liberty to annex a draft of a letter in your Majesty's name to the Prince of Condé, which he trusts your Majesty will not deem improper, and which, if your Majesty were graciously pleased to send it under your Majesty's royal hand, would certainly on that account acquire great additional value in the eyes of these unfortunate and meritorious men."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, July 7, Windsor.—"I return to Lord Grenville the drafts, and the letter to the Prince of Condé which I have copied, and send also that it may be forwarded to Mr. Crauford. In the other box is the letter to the Duke of Ostragothia, which I desire may be sent to Mr. Hales, and that he may be instructed to communicate the contents to the King of Sweden, that I may be no further troubled on this subject."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

Private.

1797, July 13, Cleveland Row.—"I have to acknowledge your two private letters which accompanied the despatches by the two messengers. I was the more anxious to use expedition in sending the present despatches in order that you might have a messenger with you so as to enable you, as fast as possible, to feed our anxious expectation. I do not think much conclusion can be drawn from what has already passed, though the three demands made by France are more unreasonable and unconciliating than was generally expected here.

"The negotiations between France and the Emperor were at a stand, and the latter appears by the last letters from Vienna to have insisted on the concluding his definitive treaty only at a congress. How far the knowledge of your mission, and the avowed object of it may change this determination, I cannot say; but if the court of Vienna suffers from this separation of interest and conduct, it has only to thank itself for it. Some good may perhaps result to our negotiation from any rub which that with Austria experiences, but, in the end, Austria unsupported by England must acquiesce in almost any terms that France will give her.

"Buonaparte seems to be settling Italy (if a total subversion of a country can be called settling it) without any reference either to the Directory or their treaties."

Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

Private.

1797, July 20, Cleveland Row.—"The complexion of your last despatch is certainly much more unfavourable to peace than I thought the Directory could have ventured, under the present circumstances of the country in which you are. My only hope is in firmness, without asperity of tone. We have purposely postponed saying anything on the two points, of the King's title and of the Toulon ships, till we see more clearly into the intentions of the French Government respecting terms; for, in truth, neither those points nor any other in such a treaty as this are separate, or can be insulated (as they call it) from the general consideration of the whole. Good terms as to matters of substantial importance might make us more disposed to overlook points of form, which are however, as you well know, matters of real substance when they relate to the intercourse of two great powers, whose most valuable possession is national dignity, and a due sense of their own importance and weight. I think the first point might be arranged (but this is merely my own private opinion) by using in the treaty the style of Great Britain only, for which you will see there are precedents enough down to the peace of Utrecht, but retaining the present style in the full powers, the ratification, and all other instruments to which this Government alone is a party; perhaps the words Britannic Majesty would be better than King of Great Britain, and these are now very often used even in our latest treaties and connections. As to the acts of our own Government, the French have no more right to object to any style the King takes than we have to quarrel with the denomination of their councils, or any other branch of the Government. Beyond this we might go so far as to add to the separate article some such words as the concluding part only of those which you mention in your letter to Canning, not admitting it to be only a genealogical title, but declaring that it is not meant to prejudice the King's acknowledgment of a Republican form of government in France.

"The Toulon question is more difficult, and has more of substance in it. We do not quite understand how far the demand is meant to go; whether to restore those ships which can be restored, and to compensate those which are burnt; or to restore, and if not to compensate those only which are now in our possession. If the former, it is a question of 18 sail of the line and as many frigates, the value of which is perhaps fully equal to some of the conquests we restore. I confess I hardly see how we can in any case do more than let some words be inserted in the article of our restitutions, in which they shall be said to be made in compensation for the ships. This, however, is also private opinion only, and on a point on which the King's Government think an ultimate decision cannot be taken without some reference to the terms of peace.

"This subject brings me by too natural and easy a connection to one which has given me much uneasiness. I mean the constant publication of almost every circumstance of this negotiation within a few hours after your couriers arrive here. I have been at some pains to trace the channel of this breach of trust, but to no purpose. Such measures have now been taken here as will, I think, make it impossible that any thing should for the future be known through any person admitted to a knowledge or perusal of your dispatches. You will also see in one of my public letters to you some steps taken to prevent the means of intercourse from France. I am far from suspecting carelessness or indiscretion on this subject from any of the persons attached to your mission in whatever situation; but at the time I am imposing the strongest restrictions on the persons belonging to my own Office, it is due to them, as well as to the importance of the subject, that I should request you to converse upon it with every one of the persons now with you, and to beg them to use the utmost caution, not only not to reveal any thing secret, which I am confident none of them would, but not even to suffer the remotest inferences to be drawn from any thing they write. It is not only with a view to political consequences that this is so important, but also from the effects which this public discussion of every point and turn of the negotiation must have in promoting ruinous speculation in the funds."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WOROUZOW.

1797, July 22, Dropmore.—“Je viens de recevoir une dépêche de notre Ministre à Pétersbourg, par laquelle il m'informe de l'approbation entière que l'Empereur a donné à votre conduite en acquiescant à la demande que je vous fis par ordre du Roi pour retenir les vaisseaux Russes qui avaient reçu l'ordre de partir. Je ne manquerai pas de saisir le premier moment pour charger le Chevalier Whitworth de l'expression des sentimens de reconnaissance du Roi pour cette nouvelle marque d'amitié de la part de Sa Majesté Impériale, dont je vous prie d'être aussi l'interprète auprès de votre Cour, connaissant, comme vous le faites, l'attachement du Roi à la personne de l'Empereur, et aux liens d'alliance et d'intérêt commun qui unissent les deux monarchies.

“Sa Majesté a bien voulu aussi me charger de nouveau de vous témoigner, M. le Comte, combien Elle est sensible aux preuves que vous avez donné dans cette occasion de votre désir constant de contribuer à maintenir cette union si importante au bonheur de toute l'Europe, et de marquer votre attachement aux intérêts de ce pays, si intimement liés avec ceux des états de l'Empereur.

“C'est avec un bien vrai plaisir que je m'acquitte de cette commission, en vous priant d'agréer les assurances de mon attachement inviolable, et de l'amitié sincère que je vous ai vouée.”

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WOROUZOW.

1797, July 22, Dropmore.—“Permettez-moi de joindre à ma lettre d'aujourd'hui deux mots par rapport à l'entretien que vous avez eu avec Canning.

“Je suis dans le cas de plusieurs grands Ministres, moi indigne; c'est à dire que je garde très scrupuleusement le secret, n'ayant rien à dire.

“Notre négociation n'est pas encore assez avancée pour qu'il soit possible de juger des résultats. Nous sommes encore à tatonner. Peut-être qu'il faudra encore que le Directoire connaisse à quoi se tenir par rapport aux deux Conseils, avant d'entrer sérieusement en matière. On dit que de nouveaux acteurs paraissent sur la scène, et que d'autres reparaissent aux quels, sans doute, on aurait peu songé il y a un an. Mais pour dire quelle influence le ministère de l'ex-evêque d'Autun aura sur la paix, ou la guerre, il faudrait être meilleur devin que je ne me crois.”

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

Private.

1797, July 27, Cleveland Row.—“Brooks arrived here with your despatches of the 25th this morning. The picture which you draw of the state of affairs at Paris is exactly conformable to my other information, and I make no doubt that the question of peace and war depends much more on the issue of that crisis than on any thing we can do or say in the way of negotiation.

“Lord Mornington, who takes his brother with him to India, is anxious to have him over here as soon as possible. I conclude therefore that you will send him instead of Lord Granville Leveson with whatever you may have for us next week. I have not yet exactly determined how to replace him, but I shall probably have settled this point in a few days, and I will take care to keep you as little a time as possible without a secretary."

Copy.

LORD MALMESBURY TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, July 29, Lille.—"I have made my dispatches to day exceedingly short as it was my wish that everything material should be reported to you by Mr. Wesley, who, in consequence of the strong desire expressed in Lord Mornington's letter, leaves Lille in a few hours. Mr. Wesley is perfectly master of the subject, and will not only be able to give a very accurate account of what I referred to in my last private letter, but also to answer any questions which may be put to him; and I am sure you will derive more information and more satisfaction from conversing with him than from the longest official account I could send. I am very glad to find that the intelligence you receive relative to the present situation of affairs in this country, corresponds with that I collect here, and that you draw from it the same inference that I do. I think what you hear from Wesley will confirm you in this idea. My strong motive for giving credit to the persons who inform me is, that they are, according to every reasonable conjecture, acting with a view to their own interests, and that they personally are and must be anxious that the negotiation should succeed. It will be nearly a week before I can hope to be able to write to you again. It is just possible that I shall be sent back to make my own report; but it is much more probable that the return of the courier from Paris will furnish me with such important matter as to authorise me to send over Lord G. Leveson, which I shall not hesitate doing if it appears to me tantamount.

"In regard to a successor to Mr. Wesley, I really should consider myself as much obliged to you if you would not send over anyone. I have such pleasant and ready assistance from Lord Morpeth, Lord G. Leveson and Mr. Ellis that, with the help of Mr. Ross, I have no employment for a Secretary of Legation; and as we necessarily must from the total want of society and from other very obvious reasons live entirely by ourselves, and, in a manner, always together and in the same house, the addition of any person with whom we are not in as strict habits of intimacy as we were with Wesley previous to his leaving England, would very much break in upon our comforts, and perhaps be not very pleasant to him."

1797, July 31, Lille.—"Un courier adressé à une seule personne, et apportant des dépêches pour elle seule, arrive à l'instant. Elles font pressentir, que des sentiments d'honneur ne permettront pas de revenir sur la mesure antérieure. Il ne reste donc à cet égard que très peu d'espérance de changement dans l'état présent des choses. Un résultat plus heureux dépendra uniquement des intérêts moins directes. La personne qui a reçu le courier est autorisé à faire par écrit les communications nécessaires pour amener à des dispositions plus faciles sur ces intérêts moins directs. Elle se propose d'expédier cette nuit un courier vers les lieux d'où doivent être adressées les intentions des co-intéressés dont les agents doivent bientôt se rendre à Paris, afin d'influer utilement sur les instructions qui leur seront remises, et auxquelles tient tout espoir d'accommodement.

"Il serait sans doute précieux de connaître les bornes dans lesquelles pourraient être restreintes les prétentions énoncées contre eux. On concevra, qu'en sollicitant des indications d'une nature aussi grave et aussi confidentielle, on ne peut avoir d'autre but que de favoriser le désir réciproque de succès, et d'autres règles de conduite que celles que doit prescrire la plus prudente réserve. Ce qui serait confié servirait uniquement de direction dans les efforts qui vont être faits près des co-intéressés, et aucune personne quelle qu'elle fut ne serait initiée dans ces détails de pure et d'entière confiance. On réclame également dans les rapports à faire à qui que ce soit, l'oubli absolu de la communication présente, offerte comme un témoignage de la plus véritable estime."

[LORD MALMESBURY to M. MARET.]

1797, July 31, Lille.—"On regarde le billet remis comme une preuve également loyale et obligéante des sentiments de la personne qui l'a écrite, et on se fait un plaisir d'y répondre dans le même sens. On voit avec chagrin dépendre le seul espoir de succès d'un rapprochement d'intérêts aussi difficiles, pour ne pas dire impossibles, à concilier. On assure bien sincèrement que les instructions sont positives. Tout ce qu'on peut faire c'est de promettre d'employer toute son influence personnelle pour se procurer la permission de co-opérer avec l'auteur du billet en obtenant, s'il est possible, quelques modifications pour les intérêts moins directs.

"En attendant, pour répondre à une confiance dont on sent tout le prix (et comptant sur le même secret qu'on promet à son tour) on n'hésite pas de dire qu'on recevra sans difficulté toute proposition de cette nature, et même qu'on l'appuyera autant que cela est compatible avec son devoir."

[GEORGE CANNING] to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, July 31, 10 p.m., Spring Gardens.—"Wesley arrived this evening, and would willingly have proceeded at once to Dropmore, but that as he had already been two nights without going to bed on his journey, and as he could not have arrived at Dropmore in such time as to have any chance of much conversation with your Lordship this evening, I confess I rather discouraged his doing so, and recommended his making the sort of précis, which is herewith sent, of what he had to communicate to your Lordship, and deferring his going to waiting upon you at Dropmore till tomorrow morning.

"Lord Malmesbury recommends so earnestly the keeping a profound secret the particulars of all that has passed at Lille upon this subject, that Mr. Pitt had thought it right that the enclosed bulletin (written under his direction) should be circulated among the members of the Cabinet, as containing all that was fit to be communicated of what Mr. Wesley brought with him.

"But since seeing Mr. Pitt, a doubt has arisen in my mind (which I should state to him if he were still in town, and which I hope your Lordship will pardon me for suggesting to you) that the members of the Cabinet might feel some degree of displeasure at so professed a limitation of confidence in them, and that it might be better (if it is thought right not to communicate the whole) to withhold every thing from them, until a future opportunity. The ostensible dispatch (No. 15) is as much as Wesley need have brought, considering the circumstances which occasioned and will account for his coming over. No. 16, in which he is referred to for details of great importance, must of course in this case be entirely suppressed. I have separated the dispatches with this view, and with a view of leaving it open to your Lordship to send as much or as little as you may think right to the King. Your Lordship will determine how far these views are right ones. I have only to request that you will have the goodness to let me know your determination as early as possible tomorrow; as you must be aware in how very awkward a situation I am placed with regard to the rest of the Ministers, until I know how I am to answer any questions that may be put to me.

"Till I hear from you I shall confine myself to saying that Wesley is come over in consequence of Lord Mornington's summons; that he brings a dispatch of form; and rather promises of future communications than any thing of immediate importance."

HENRY WESLEY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, July 31, 9 p.m., Spring Gardens.—"I arrived in London this evening, but not so early as to enable me to reach Dropmore in any reasonable time. I have therefore thought it better to put upon paper as accurately as I could the substance of what Lord Malmesbury entrusted to me to communicate to your Lordship. I cannot but be sensible that, in the haste in which I have written, there may be much upon which your Lordship may require further explanation; and I shall therefore do myself the honour of waiting on your Lordship at Dropmore tomorrow by twelve o'clock."

MEMORANDUM OF MR. WESLEY.

1797, July 31.—"On the 14th of July an Englishman, whose name is Cunningham, who has been for some years resident at Lisle, called on Mr. Wesley and said he was come on a business of the utmost importance which he had been desired to communicate to some person in Lord Malmesbury's suite. He then produced a note which he said he had received that morning from a M. Pein, a most intimate friend of his, and a near relation of Maret's. The following were the words of his note. 'Il seroit peut-être nécessaire que, pour presser la négociation, Lord Malmesbury eut des moyens de s'entendre et préparer les matières avec la personne qui est vraiment la seule en état de conduire l'affaire; dans ce cas on pourrait ménager au Lord un intermédiaire qui a la confiance entière de la personne en question, et qui, comme elle, n'a d'autre but que l'intérêt de tous, et un arrangement également convenable.' As soon as Mr. Wesley had read the note, Mr. Cunningham proceeded to state that his friend was in possession of the entire confidence of Maret, by whom he had been authorised to make the above overture. Mr. Wesley immediately informed Lord Malmesbury of what had passed between Mr. Cunningham and him, and it was agreed that Mr. Ellis and M. Pein should meet in the evening. At that interview M. Pein repeated nearly what Mr. Cunningham had said in the morning, and added that Maret's opinions on all political subjects were very different from those of the other Plenipotentiaries; that he was the intimate friend of Barthélemy through whose means he had been appointed one of the Ministers to treat for peace with England; that therefore his sentiments could not be doubted, as it was well known Barthélemy was sincerely desirous of the restoration of peace. M. Pein added that Maret had his suspicions with respect to the intentions of the Directory; but that the cry of the whole nation was so decidedly for peace, and the majority of the Representatives in the two Councils so convinced of the impracticability of carrying on the war for a much longer term, that, if the negotiation was prudently conducted, the Directory must in the end give way. M. Pein, in the course of this conversation, frequently insisted on the necessity of gaining time; on which he said the success of the whole business chiefly depended.

"Mr. Ellis saw him again on the 16th, and he then assured him on the part of Maret that the note of the Directory in answer to Lord Malmesbury's project had appeared no less offensive to the French legation than to the English; that even Le Tourneur had expressed the most violent indignation on the subject, and that they had sent to the Ministre des Relations Extérieures the most pointed remonstrance that they could venture on the subject. His own opinion was 'que c'était une infamie de Charles De la Croix.' He added that the Directory had kept Maret five days at Paris after Le Tourneur and Pleville, with a view of giving him the fullest private instructions; during which time they never hinted at the secret articles of the Spanish or Dutch treaties. He begged Mr. Ellis to tell Lord Malmesbury that the French legation adjured him to palliate the measure as well as he could to his Court. Mr. Ellis has seen him several times since, and the following is a general statement of what has passed between them. He said that Maret being personally known to and liked by Barras, was promised by him, as well as by Carnot and Barthélemy, to be promoted to the place of Minister of Foreign Affairs, but that knowing Talleyrand to be his rival for that place, he had waited on him to say that his wish was to begin by some foreign mission; that he should prefer London, for which his appointment to the legation at Lisle was a natural preparation; that he would willingly quit his pretensions to the Ministry if he (Talleyrand) would assist him in his other views. He added that Delacroix could not stay in long, and that his dismissal and the nomination of Talleyrand (both of which have since happened) would tend very much to further the views of the English. He said that Le Tourneur was so dull and obstinate that Maret found it very difficult, with all his address, to guide him right. That he had with some trouble managed Pleville, and through him Le Tourneur; but that Pleville's appointment to the Ministry of the Marine would be very inconvenient to him unless he could procure the appointment of Colchen in his room. He seemed very anxious about the answer to be brought by our courier, and begged to know in time what that answer was, in order that Maret might be prepared to act in concert with Lord Malmesbury, both by preparing Le Tourneur for the conference, and by making the earliest favourable impression in Paris. Mr. Ellis agreed with him about a sign of intelligence by which Lord Malmesbury and Maret might understand each other, without attracting the attention of Le Tourneur and Colchen. Immediately after the conference, in consequence of the arrival of our courier, he sent for Mr. Ellis and told him he had two requests to make; one was that Lord Malmesbury would delay sending his note to the legation for 24 hours; the other that the note might be communicated to Maret before it was delivered. Mr. Ellis acceded to both, and received the note back from him the next morning. He read to Mr. Ellis a few words from Maret to himself in which he says, after some handsome things about Lord Malmesbury, 'qu'il n'y aura plus entre eux d'autre dispute que celle de franchise et de loyauté.' He then put into Mr. Ellis's hands a note for Lord Malmesbury, in which Maret says, that in consequence of the temper with which the note is written, it cannot but do good; that far from wishing to weaken any part of it, he thought it might be strengthened still farther by a reference to the arrêté of the Directory of 27th November last. He then said that in order to prove to Mr. Ellis that he had not insisted without reason on the necessity of delaying our note, he would read to him a letter which Maret had the night before received from Barthélemy. It was expressed very nearly in these words; 'J'ai parlé hier au nouveau Ministre des Relations Extérieures sur l'affaire de notre ami commun Colchen, et il m'avoit promis de proposer aujourd'hui au Directoire sa nomination à la place vacante dans votre Légation. Il n'en a cependant rien fait, je ne sais pour quoi, peut-être le fera-t-il demain. J'en aurais fait moi-même la proposition si je n'avois craint de vous nuire. Pleville, grâce à vos soins, me parait bien disposé pour la paix, mais j'ai de fortes raisons de croire qu'une CERTAINE PERSONNE revient ou se dispose à revenir à l'avis de ses anciens collègues; (the certaine personne means Le Tourneur); j'ai les plus grandes inquiétudes sur l'absurde obstacle qu'on a mis en avant pour retarder la paix, c'est à dire, nos liaisons envers nos alliés. Comment, avec du sens commun, peut-on insister sur un raisonnement aussi absurde, dans un tems où la paix nous est absolument nécessaire, et où nous sommes sûrs de la faire glorieuse. Cependant cela est. Vous ne sauriez vous figurer la jalousie, les sottises préventions de certaines gens.' Towards the end of the letter he says, 'Nous sommes dans une crise abominable, mais, avec le tems et la modération, on vient à bout de tout. Patientez, je vous prie, et cherchez s'il est possible à gagner du tems.'

"A few hours before Mr. Wesley left Lisle Mr. Ellis had another interview with M. Pein. M. Pein said that Maret had written him word that he had that morning received private letters from Paris containing very favourable intelligence. Pein believed these to be answers to the letters written by Maret to prepare his friends at Paris for Lord Malmesbury's note. He said he did not think it likely that the official answer to Lord Malmesbury's note would arrive at Lisle before Monday or Tuesday, but that he had little doubt of its being such as would enable him to go on with the negotiation. It would not be possible for him, he said, to see Maret before the departure of Mr. Wesley, as he was gone out of town and was not to return till the next day. He then told Mr. Ellis that an article had appeared in one of the French newspapers stating that Carnot had had an interview with La Revellière Lepaux for the purpose of endeavouring to bring him round to the moderate party. This he said was not true; that it was Pichégrou who was the real mediator between the Modérés and the violent part of the Directory; and that, from the style of Pichégrou's report to the Council upon the conduct of the Executive Power in having violated the constitution, which report is much more moderate than was expected, it is probable he has succeeded in bringing about something like a reconciliation. It seems that the Modéré party in the Council, though generally alarmed beyond measure at the Jacobins, are now perfectly fearless under Pichégrou; and that, though they cannot easily attack the authority of the Directory immediately, they can get the better of them through the medium of the Ministers. They have driven out Delacroix, Truguet, and very lately Lenoir Laroche; should they succeed against Merlin, which seems probable, they will greatly diminish the preponderance of the Jacobinical part of the Executive Power. A committee is at this moment framing a report on the comptabilité des Ministres; and they are passing a bill for the purpose of reorganising the National Guard, which, when under the influence or control of such men as Pichégrou, will become a most formidable body, entirely devoted to the moderate party. It should seem from all these circumstances that the Directory, divided as it now is, must grow weaker every day. And this is certainly an argument in favour of Peiu's maxim, that everything depends on gaining time. He told Mr. Ellis that every day that passed over our heads put us upon surer ground; and that it is impossible for the Directory to hold out much longer against the clamour for peace, when the impracticability of furnishing funds for the continuation of the war is notorious to everybody."

CIRCULAR TO CABINET MINISTERS (not sent).

1797, July 31.—"Mr. Wesley arrived in town this evening with despatches from Lord Malmesbury, and charged with communications, the details of which are of such a nature that Lord Malmesbury feels himself bound to require that they should be kept entirely secret for the present. The substance of these communications is:—

"That some of the persons accompanying Lord Malmesbury have found an opportunity of establishing a secret communication with a person confidentially connected with a part of the French mission. From a number of circumstances (which it is stipulated shall not be disclosed) there is little doubt that this person expresses the real sentiments of those for whom he professes to speak; and that they are in direct communication with the leading persons of the moderate party at Paris. This party, so far as can be judged from these reports, is sincerely inclined to peace. The business has not yet gone so far as to lead to the mention of any particular terms of peace. But the extravagance of the pretension advanced in the last note of the Directory is not only admitted, but seems to be strongly felt; and the equity of the original principle of compensations is acknowledged.

"The persons in question recommend above all things our endeavouring to gain time, which is considered as particularly material during the present state of parties at Paris. And they appear to be persuaded that, by patience and firmness on our part, the difficulty arising out of the present pretensions of the Directory will be overcome; and that the negotiation may be carried on with a considerable prospect of success."

GEORGE CANNING to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, August 1, Downing Street.—"I am infinitely obliged to your Lordship for your early answer to my letter, without which I should have felt myself very much at a loss how to measure my language upon this occasion.

"The memorandum which your Lordship has sent me will be a very safe guide to me. And I have thought indeed that the safest mode of making any communication upon the subject will be to make a transcript of it, to be circulated (sealed) among the members of the Cabinet.

"I wrote to Mr. Pitt last night, after having dispatched the messenger to Dropmore, as fully and to the same effect as I had done to your Lordship. He is not to be in town today, but I shall see him in a few hours at Wimbledon, where I am to meet him at dinner, and where I will take care to arrive (with my memorandum) before him.

"This engagement at Wimbledon prevents me from having the pleasure of waiting upon you at Dropmore today, which I would otherwise gladly have done. Tomorrow I think it not improbable from what Wesley tells me that a messenger may arrive from Lille, with the answer of the Directory to Lord Malmesbury's last note, which was expected at Lille yesterday, or this morning.

"The new boxes will not be ready till this evening. In the meantime, I send to the King with all the precautions which your Lordship recommends.

"I enclose the copy of your letter.

"I open my packet again to tell your Lordship that I have received an answer from Mr. Pitt to my letter of last night. He says that 'he feels very strongly the force of the objections to the bulletin; that half the secret is enough, if disclosed, to do a great deal of the mischief; and there is perhaps less security for its being faithfully kept, when any part is withheld. On the other hand, he does not see how it can be kept back altogether. He inclines to think that it would be best that the whole narrative should be confidentially circulated in a most secret and sealed packet.' He concludes with saying 'that it is impossible to decide anything until I shall have received your Lordship's answer, which he presumes I shall have done before we meet at Wimbledon; and that he will not arrive at Wimbledon till just before dinner, in order to avoid saying anything till he has seen me.'

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, August 1, Dropmore.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to transmit to your Majesty the dispatches received last night from Lord Malmesbury. He has not yet seen Mr. Wesley, whom he expects here in the course of this day, he having been much fatigued with his journey from Lisle. But he understands that the result of Mr. Wesley's account of the state of things at Paris, as far as it was known to Lord Malmesbury, confirms the opinions before entertained by him that the event of the negotiation depends almost entirely on that of the present struggle at Paris; and that an indirect communication has even been made to Lord Malmesbury to that effect."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, August 2, Weymouth.—"I should hope from the intimations in Lord Malmesbury's dispatches that Mr. Wesley's will have much curious intelligence to communicate to Lord Grenville, who, I trust, will write to me the material information. Every account from Paris proves that the struggle at Paris must be very great, and on the issue of that, not on the state of any proposition from hence, will the fate of peace or the continuation of war depend."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, August 4, Dropmore.—“Lord Grenville has been honoured with your Majesty’s commands, and he thinks that the best manner in which he can execute them to your Majesty’s satisfaction will be by humbly submitting to your Majesty the paper herewith enclosed, which was drawn up by Mr. Wesley immediately after his arrival here as the substance of what he was to report, though it has been docketed by mistake as a communication from Lord Malmesbury.

“Lord Grenville had near two hours’ conversation with Mr. Wesley on the different points to which this paper relates, on every one of which he examined him as particularly as possible, but he did not find that any material circumstance had come to Mr. Wesley’s knowledge which is not there stated; and, indeed, the whole of the information which Lord Malmesbury has been able to obtain of the state of affairs at Paris seems to arise solely from this channel of communication. He particularly questioned Mr. Wesley whether anything had been said about terms of peace, as, without this, all other assurances seem to him to be extremely vague and little to be relied on. It appears however that nothing had passed on that head beyond the general expression of reasonable terms, and an implied concession that your Majesty was entitled to some compensation, but without intimating anything of its nature or amount.

“Lord Grenville does not therefore flatter himself that much more results from this communication than that the moderate party were desirous to prevent the negotiation from being abruptly terminated pending the struggle at Paris; but, if they should succeed, there seems no sufficient ground to rely on their being actuated by any other disposition for peace than what would arise from a motive to the operation of which their adversaries would, under the like circumstances, be equally, or even more exposed, the great difficulty which they would find in continuing the war.

“Lord Grenville has, however, thought that the peculiar nature of this communication, and the danger to which any knowledge or suspicion of it would subject the person there named, justified him (particularly under the unfortunate circumstance of the publicity which the former part of this negotiation has been exposed to, from some cause which he cannot ascertain) in withholding from all his colleagues in office except Mr. Pitt, the name and situation of the person with whom Lord Malmesbury has communicated; and in stating to them only the general result of that communication; and he humbly hopes that in so doing he has not deviated from the usual course of your Majesty’s service on similar occasions, or transgressed the rules which your Majesty would be pleased to prescribe to him for his conduct if the time would have admitted of such a reference.”

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797, August 4] York Farm.—“Malgré ma meilleure envie d’être utile à ma Cour dans tous les instans de ma vie, il me paraît que celui-ci est un de ceux pendant lesquels il doit lui être absolument indifférent que je me trouve à Londres ou à Broadstairs. Ce dernier endroit n’est pas d’ailleurs tellement éloigné de la capitale que je ne puisse pas y recevoir régulièrement les informations nécessaires pour remplir ma gazette politique called dépêche. Cela posé, pourvu que vous ne le trouviez pas mauvais, je me propose d’aller passer huit autres jours avec Madame de Starhemberg et mes enfans. Je partirai mardi prochain, et serai de retour le mardi d'après. Si dans l'intervalle vous jugiez ma présence nécessaire, un mot de vous me ferait arriver à Londres 24 heures après l'avis reçu. Je me recommande à vos bontés pendant l'intervalle, dans le cas de l'expédition d'un courier, et j'attendrai votre permission avant de m'absenter.

"J'aurai soin d'informer M. Canuing du moment de mon départ et de celui de mon retour, pour éviter que vos bontés pour moi ne deviennent inutiles, comme dans l'occasion du départ du courier Hunter. Agrérez mes hommages ; le bruit public m'apprend que les négociations de Lord Malmsbury cheminent. Je ne demande point un secret auquel la dernière conduite de ma Cour ne me donne aucun droit, selon moi ; mais je ne puis me refuser à vous parler ici de tous les vœux que je forme dans mon cœur pour la réussite de tout ce qui peut contribuer au bien ou à l'utilité du pays que j'habite, et que je regarde comme ma seconde patrie."

1797, August 5, Dropmore.—"Je ne prévois rien qui puisse vous retenir en ville, mais, si quelque chose arrivait, nous serions toujours assez à temps de vous en prévenir à Broadstairs, où je vous souhaite très sincèrement toute sorte d'amusemens propres à vous faire oublier les chagrins auxquels notre métier nous expose, et les tristes réflexions qu'on ne peut guères s'empêcher de faire en songeant à l'avenir. Mes lettres de Vienne par cette dernière malle ne m'apportent rien de bien positif sur l'état des choses. La négociation paraît ne s'avancer que très lentement, et il semble qu'on n'est rien moins que content de M. de Gallo. On a même dit au Chevalier Eden que si nous pourrions, l'Angleterre et l'Autriche, résister de concert encore pour quelques mois, nous obligerions l'ennemi à se soumettre à des conditions raisonnables. Oh si cette vérité eut été sentie il y a trois mois, quand il était encore temps !"

GEORGE III. TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, August 5, Weymouth.—"I have copied the letter for the Duke of Ostragothia, and desire it may be sent to Mr. Hailes with the same instructions that were sent on board the packet, and sunk when she was taken

"I have read with attention the paper drawn up by Mr. Wesley, and perfectly coincide in opinion with Lord Grenville that it by no means holds out any view that can found an opinion that peace will be effected ; but it certainly shows that the gaining [time?] may be advantageous.

"I thoroughly approve of Lord Grenville's having only communicated this paper to Mr. Pitt, as it can be of no use in forming any opinion, and the less papers not necessary towards effecting that are circulated the better."

LORD MALMESBURY TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, August 6, Lille.—"Mr. Wesley will have acquainted you with the secret channel of communication that has been opened here, and with such information as I had derived through it up to the day of his leaving Lille. Since, still more material intelligence has come to my knowledge, and the same motive which induced me to employ Mr. Wesley determines me now to send Lord G. Leveson to England. I have no doubt you found Mr. Wesley exact and accurate. You will, I am sure, find Lord Granville equally so ; and, besides the advantage this mode of communication has over all others in point of secrecy and safety, you derive from it the power of question and inquiry, which, for my own satisfaction and comfort, is one that I am very desirous of affording you, since what is now passing ex-officially is so much more important than what passes officially, that I do not feel at all justified in venturing to act upon it on my own judgement ; and am very anxious to have it stated so correctly, and examined so carefully, that its real value may be ascertained, and Lord Granville bring me back orders in consequence.

“Had I no other grounds at this moment to form an opinion but the conduct of the Directory, I should look upon the negotiation as in a very precarious state, and apprehend its breaking up to be a very near event. But, if what I hear from this secret quarter can be relied on, I must hold a contrary belief ; I must suppose the French will contend only for terms and give way in substance, and that they will affect to perform their engagements (real or supposed) in appearance, but break them in fact.

“It required no great art to see through the object of Maret’s note of the 31st July. I hope my answer will be thought sufficiently guarded and, at the same time, as explicit enough to encourage him to continue his communications ; at all events, it is to be recollected that the originals of both our notes are restored and that they never can be produced.

“It is clear from what M[aret] writes that, if the Directory wish to make peace at all, it is at the expense of their allies ; and from the step they have taken, they probably are in earnest. If this should be the case (which must shortly appear) the negotiation will soon be brought to a discussion of the more or less we are to keep from the Dutch, since, if what is told us could be credited, the interests of Spain and Portugal will not throw any great obstacles in the way of the treaty ; but this is so contrary to the conduct observed by the Directory during their last negotiation with the court of Lisbon, that I fear, on this particular point, our informer is either not trusted or not sincere.

“From every thing you read and hear to-day you will, I am sure, be confirmed in your opinion that on the upshot of the present contest at Paris depends the fate of the treaty ; that it cannot possibly be forced on here by any means in my power ; and that the best and only line of conduct I can adopt is, by temper and patience, to prevent its premature rupture from being imputed to us, and by prudence and caution to let nothing escape me which may betray an over-eagerness for its success, or pledge me directly or indirectly to any unbecoming conditions when we really begin to negotiate.

“If the delay, which from the confidential channel is accounted for as being purposely managed for good ends, should, after all, arise from direct contrary motives, and be concerted on the part of the three hostile Directors for the purpose of gaining time in order that they may the better accomplish their views of power, I do not see, even in that case (except that every additional day of war is to be regretted) any particular evil which will result from it. If the treaty is ultimately to break off, it must be done on the part of the French Government in a more offensive way after they have allowed it to go on for a length of time than at its beginning. I have no good grounds to suspect this, but it is possible that the three Directors, who are certainly more daring than able, may, either by reckoning on support from Buonaparte, or by means of the armed force with which they are surrounding Paris, or perhaps after the signing of the definitive treaty with Austria, think events may turn up in their favour of which they are desirous to take the chance.

"I shall conclude this letter by saying that, with respect to our secret information, Mr. Ellis has been troubled, at my request, after each interview to write down a detailed and circumstantial account of any conversation which passed, in order that I might, by comparing the whole together, be enabled to judge whether it tallied exactly; and, as I cannot discover that his informant has been betrayed into any contradiction, I really do not think there is any internal evidence against his credibility."

Postscript.—"The note just received from Maret, and at the moment I am making up my letters, is very curious and very satisfactory. It need not, however, produce an alteration in, or addition to my official dispatches, as I have anticipated his advice."

[M. MARET to LORD MALMESBURY.]

1797, August 6, Lille.—"Il était difficile d'après la manière dont se sont écoulés les moments très courts que l'on a passés ensemble, qu'ils offrisent des ouvertures plus positives. La personne qu'on avait disposée à s'expliquer, a besoin d'être amené par des circumlocutions un peu plus longues. On a répété, dans l'intention de supplier à tout, que dans l'état des choses, les délais disent précisément ce qu'on ne peut exprimer positivement. Ne peut-on pas s'en autoriser pour écrire avec le ton de la certitude, l'état vrai dont on a été informé particulièrement? Ce rapport, s'il pouvait devenir public, ne saurait être désavoué; et celui qui l'aurait autorisé ne se trouverait nullement compromis, en convenant qu'une sagacité supérieure a su démêler la vérité à travers des expressions qu'il avait désiré rendre, tout à la fois, obligeantes et mystérieuses."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

1797, August 8, Dropmore.—"Mr. Wesley on his return to Lisle will state to you the extent of the caution which has been observed in order to prevent the possibility of any disclosure of the particulars which he was charged to communicate. In order to adhere to this line, it will be proper that you should carefully put into separate dispatches all that has reference to that communication, keeping the ordinary chain of your correspondence complete by the relation of all other facts and reasonings not necessarily connected with that circumstance, or leading to it.

"Wesley has a separate note of names to be used for still greater caution, in order that the personal safety of those who communicate with you may be secured as far as possible against accidents.

"I am impatiently waiting to hear from you, though, from what Wesley said, I am prepared to think that all delay is for the best."

NEGOTIATIONS AT LILLE.

1797, July—August.—“On Monday, July 31st, Mr. Ellis had a message from M. le Pein desiring to see him immediately; his friend Maret had received letters from Paris; the news contained in them was certainly not altogether satisfactory; at the same time, however, that the Directory refused absolutely to give way, they showed anxiety that the negotiation should not break off; they had recourse to an expedient which, if we thought fit, he said, still left us hopes of peace. They had invited the Batavian Republic to send Plenipotentiaries to Paris, in hopes that the Ministers would advise them to make concessions on the part of the Dutch; that the new Minister of Exterior Relations had written to his friend only, informing him he had delayed the public messenger in order that he might first privately consult with us, and then dispatch . . . to Noel (who was directed to pay the greatest attention to his advice) to urge him to procure such instructions for their Plenipotentiaries as might lead to peace. His friend had written upon this subject a note to Lord Malmesbury, which he would first read, and then put into Mr. Ellis’s hands, desiring him to copy and return it to him. He begged to have a written answer, which he would in the same manner return after communicating it to his friend. When he came to that part of the note which requests a communication (in confidence) of our ultimatum, he said, ‘Je vous prie de croire que mon ami sent comme vous la délicatesse de la demande; mais enfin, on ne croit pas que votre premier projet soit votre dernier mot. S’il vous est permis de vous relâcher un peu, d’accorder quelques facilités, il s’agit de savoir si vous avez assez de confiance dans la probité de mon ami, pour lui confier votre secret, afin qu’il puisse de son côté prendre les mesures les plus propres à faciliter votre marche.’ After he had done speaking, Mr. Ellis answered him that he would willingly take the note to Lord Malmesbury, and would promise him a written answer on the same terms; but that he could tell him beforehand, the answer could not possibly quite meet the wishes of his friend. You must consider, Mr. Ellis said, this is not our first offer of peace. Your Directory affected to believe our first offers insincere; they would willingly persuade the world that we do not now wish for peace; but you know that if we now broke off the negotiation, they would incur in the eyes of Europe the whole responsibility. Will the French Legislature and nation devote their lives and fortunes in the prosecution of a war which has no longer a national object? You admit this is not very certain; you admit that it is certain that France would incur much more than her natural share of misery from the continuation of the war; nay, you urge this as a plea to induce us to make further sacrifices; but surely this argument ought to weigh a little with your Directory. He admitted all this, but convinced that we were sincerely desirous of peace, he wished to know whether we would make any farther sacrifices to obtain it. You know, said M. Pein, that the Legislative Body gains ground every day; that the majority of the Directory grows weaker in the same proportion; consequently every day that the negotiation continues advances your cause. You best know how far you have any confidence in my friend, how far you wish, how far it is in your power, to co-operate with him. The Directory have, in their distress for money, very meanly, very foolishly, very unconstitutionally, pledged themselves to the Dutch to procure the restitution of all your conquests. Perhaps this money transaction cannot be defended under the terms of the Constitution as a secret article of treaty. Of this you are certain, that they will not break off immediately, nor force you to break off immediately. Judge for yourselves and tell me your decision. What passes between us is not binding till it is avowed by your Cabinet, and till Lord Malmesbury receives orders to act in consequence at his conferences with the French Legation. Mr. Ellis told him that Lord Malmesbury's instructions were positive; that our first object had been to evince our sincerity by the reasonableness of our proposals; that as to Ceylon, any definite demand of the island (which we should retain only as means of additional security to our East India possessions) must be dictated by the previous desire of recommencing hostilities in that country as soon as the finances of France should enable her to send a fleet there. That the Cape was ours at present, and that he had not heard a shadow of reason why we should part with it. Lastly, that our demand of Cochin was only in return for Negapatnam, which was, he conceived, of much higher value to the Dutch. Here Le Pein said, 'si vous vouliez rendre le Cap, je suis bien persuadé qu'il ne tiendrait qu'à vous de signer la paix dans quinze jours.' Mr. Ellis told him that Lord Malmesbury could not consent to any such thing; that his proposal to him was, in three words, only a proposal to gain time, to which he was persuaded that Lord Malmesbury from his confidence in Maret would consent, and that he would go immediately and bring him a written answer to his note. But, said Le Pein, if we put the answer which will come from the Directory tomorrow into civil words, will you answer it civilly, and wait? Mr. Ellis said, certainly. But your Cabinet, Le Pein then added, will think we are doing nothing; will you send over a confidential person (for we entreat you not to write) who will explain verbally, under the seal of the most sacred secrecy, that Lord Malmesbury and my friend are jointly labouring on the same subject, and that, unpromising as the negotiation now appears, we have still great hopes of concluding it by an honourable peace. Mr. Ellis then returned home with Maret's note, and on the same evening returned it with Lord Malmesbury's answer.

"On the following morning, Tuesday 1st August, Mr. Ellis called upon M. Le Pein, who returned to him Lord Malmesbury's note. He said that Maret had written to Noel in conformity to what had been agreed upon; stating that he was desired by Talleyrand to insist on the necessity of some complaisance on the part of Holland; to remark that it was probable no future opportunity of making peace would be so favourable as the present; that the penury of the French finances was notorious; that it was impossible for the Directory to look forward to the formation of such a marine as, with the fullest assistance of Spain, aided by the navy of the Batavian Republic, could face that of England. That the remainder of the Dutch colonies must probably soon fall; that the Directory were ready to go all lengths for the purpose of fulfilling its treaties; but that the Dutch must feel the difficulty of continuing a war, which must henceforward become a naval war, without money, or ships, or effective allies, and contrary to the decided wishes of all Europe and the French nation. Mr. Ellis said this was all very good sense; but observed, at the same time to him, that it was impossible that the Directory, if truly desirous of peace, should be unable to force the Dutch to compliance; that certainly the Directory were not bound to the performance of the secret articles by which they pretended to be confined, since it was absurd to suppose that any such money transaction as he had alluded to could have been kept secret in Holland. Le Pein said, you certainly misunderstood me. The sum of money to which I alluded is mentioned in the public articles, great part of it has not been paid, and the Directory in their distress are very solicitous for its payment. It was stipulated in a secret article that we should compensate for the large sum demanded by obtaining from you the restitution of all you had taken, or might take from them. How can they now press for payment on one side, and refuse the condition to which they had bound themselves? It is for this reason that address is necessary. I answered, in this case why did the Directory in November last agree to the principle of mutual compensation? And why did they lately propose to treat in the name, and on the part of their allies, since it appears by what you now say, if I understand you right, that you had not, and have not, full powers. His answer, according to Mr. Ellis's recollection, was nearly in these words; 'Je pourrais vous remarquer en général que le Directoire ne sait ce qu'il dit. D'ailleurs pour répondre à votre première question, le Directoire ne voulait pas la paix; il voulait savoir votre dernier mot, décourrir où se bornaient vos prétentions, vous faire une querelle d'Allemand, et vous renvoyer. Quant à la seconde, il a encore agi sottement; il espérait vous faire la loi; il espérait forcer la nation à continuer la guerre; il espérait dominer les circonstances; et il se trouve dominé par elles. Vos objections sont sans réplique; mais que voulez vous? la paix. Je vous avois déjà dit dès notre premier entretien, que le biais qu'on vient d'imaginer pourrait nous y mener; et je le crois encore, pourvu que vous y consentiez. Le moyen que nous employons nous fait peu d'honneur, il est vrai; mais que vous importe, s'il vous mène où vous voulez arriver.' Mr. Ellis then observed to him that his friend's note of yesterday requested, and indeed stipulated, perfect secrecy on the part of Lord Malmesbury, and that this night, he was afraid, defeat the whole object that his friend had in view; that while the Directory persisted in keeping such untenable ground he could not guess how his friend could frame an ostensible answer that should at all convey the spirit of his private assurances. That Lord Malmesbury, acting under orders which had been submitted to the confidential servants of his Majesty, must satisfy the Cabinet that he was not so far hurried away by his private wishes for peace, as to act in opposition to those orders. He interrupted Mr. Ellis, and said, we will take care that the communication which we shall make to you shall not put you under the necessity of breaking off the negotiation. It shall express that the Directory will consult with their allies; and this will give Lord Malmesbury an opportunity of taking our answer, if he pleases, ad referendum. If Noel should succeed in his commission, which we shall know in a few days, it will then be for your Cabinet to determine what instructions they will give on the subject, and to relax or persist in their present demands. You are hitherto bound to nothing. If this cause were pleaded before a jury of Frenchmen, or before the whole French nation, they would certainly think your present demands not exorbitant; because it is just that your gains by the war should be in some measure proportionate to ours. I have already explained to you that the Directory are unlike such a jury, but you can lose nothing by a little delay. The strength of the Directory sinks every hour. Mr. Ellis said this might be true; but that it was possible the Directory might, in some respects, be great gainers by delay; that the signature of the definitive treaty with Austria for instance—Mr. Ellis was here interrupted by Le Pein, who said, the mere approach of peace has given strength to the Councils, and every additional step towards it must add to their strength. The wish for peace is, as you know, universal in France, and has long been so; but the many complicated interests which it would have been necessary to reconcile, had we negotiated when we had Austria and all Germany for our enemies, would have eternally offered new subterfuges to the Directory. The question is now become so plain, that they will soon have no means of evading it. Mr. Ellis then asked him why the French Plenipotentiaries intended giving in any written declaration at all? And why they would not ask for a conference? You must feel, said he, that your note, word it as you will, cannot meet all the objections stated to you in our last. It is notorious that you did invite us to treat with you as Plenipotentiaries for your allies. You now say you are not so. Why put this proof of your evasion on paper? He answered that he would not fail to convey this proposal to his friend. Mr. Ellis then said, you have hitherto taken no notice either of Spain or Portugal; and yet the last instructions of the Directory relate to the interests of Spain as well as those of Holland. He replied, 'il est vrai, mais ne vous inquiétez pas sur l'Espagne. Nous saurons bien la mener où nous voulons. Ce n'est pas qu'elle ne soit honnêtement déraisonnable; ce n'est pas l'embarras. Cabarrus a bien remis au Directoire des prétentions excessives; et Del Campo s'évertue, depuis quelque tems, pour qu'on y passe un peu d'attention. Mais on trouve tout cela si absurde qu'on ne songe pas seulement à y répondre. Non, vous pouvez être tranquille là-dessus.' Mr. Ellis then pressed him on the subject of Portugal, observing to him that the integrity of the Portuguese possessions was so much a sine quâ non, that if he foresaw any difficulty on that subject, he had better save further trouble by stating it, as that would certainly compel us to put an end to the negotiation. He said 'Non; Le Portugal ne fera jamais un . . .; si les intérêts des Bataves s'arrangent, vous pouvez compter que nous arriverons, sans difficultés considérables, à la paix.'

"On Wednesday, 2nd August, Mr. Ellis and M. Le Pein again met. The despatches from the Directory, Le Pein said, were not arrived, and that they would not arrive till Friday, because they were to come by the common post, and not by a special courier. He said both Maret and Le Tourneur had received private letters from Carnot and from Guiraudet, but that these letters contained nothing beyond what we knew already, except that the present delay had been owing to the ceremonies and forms at the reception of the Turkish Ambassador, and to Talleyrand not being completely settled in his Office. Mr. Ellis then observed upon the strange conduct of the Directory, and expressed his apprehensions that Lord Malmesbury would be unable to state the matter at home in such a way as to convince the Cabinet that there remained even that slight hope of success which his friend had admitted in his note to be the only hope. Le Pein here said with eagerness, I feel this as strongly as you do, and it is my greatest cause of anxiety. Certainly if the Directory sincerely wished for peace, they would force the Dutch to withdraw all opposition; but the Directory are not sincere. It was proposed to them to compel the Dutch to come into terms; the proposal was rejected. My friend proposed to them to order the Dutch commissaries to this place, where he hoped to bring them to terms; this too was rejected. Talleyrand proposed to appoint a special Minister at the Hague for the same purpose, and we hoped to fix the choice on Sémonville; in this too he failed. All he could obtain, after the Directory had ordered the Dutch Ministers to repair to Paris, was the permission to send some fresh instructions to Noel; alleging as a reason for it, that the Directory would only make themselves ridiculous by affecting to consult their allies if those allies should afterwards appear to pay no regard to their remonstrances. Talleyrand has written to Noel, who is very well disposed. He has referred him to my friend for further instructions, and we too have written. Noel, I am sure, will exert himself to the utmost. Talley-rand will not be inactive at Paris. We may expect an answer in eight days from the Hague, and shall then be able to judge whether our hopes are well or ill founded. I trust we shall not be disappointed, but, if we should, and here he hesitated, 'il faudra nous remettre à guerroyer.' Mr. Ellis, wishing to know exactly what his ultimate expectation was, said 'Comment! vous voulez encore continuer la guerre.' He replied, No, certainly. We have still means of success in our power, means which the Directory seem not aware of. It will be very disagreeable to employ them; but they must be tried, if all others fail. The moment of the return of peace, and dismissal of the armies, must be the moment of confusion and civil discord, if we have not a strong and well regulated government; if we cannot put an end to that unfortunate and disgraceful struggle which the majority in the Directory so foolishly, and wickedly, desire to provoke between the constituted authorities. But even at this risk, we must defend the Constitution. The Directory have a right to conclude secret articles without the immediate participation of the Councils, but the Councils have a subsequent right to demand the communication of such articles; and finally to break them, if they appear incompatible with the happiness of the people. Sooner than submit to the further continuance of the present war, the Council of 500 will certainly try this desperate remedy; but they will not try it till every other attempt has failed. Souvenez-vous, he added, que je vous parle à cœur ouvert, et sous le sceau du plus profond secret. Les longueurs de cette négociation vont vous désespérer; mais tachez de ne pas perdre patience; elles sont accablantes pour nous aussi. It was then settled that they should meet on Friday, the day on which the dispatches from Paris were expected. On the morning of that day, about eleven o'clock, Mr. Ellis was sent for by M. Le Pein, and informed by him that the dispatches from the Directory were arrived; and that the French Plenipotentiaries had sent to propose a conference with Lord Malmesbury, when they would declare officially what Mr. Ellis had so often heard from him by private communication. Le Pein said, his friend conceived that disagreeable effects might be produced by the total interruption of the public conferences; and that it would be proposed to Lord Malmesbury today to meet every post day, in order that, although neither party should have any thing to communicate, they might not let the public into the secret of their inactivity. He then added, my friend has received today a private letter from Talleyrand, which gives us great hopes of success. He writes word that Lestevenon is arrived at Paris, that he has seen him, and is perfectly satisfied from his conversation that he may easily be brought to hear reason. I have no doubt, he said, that, in consequence of Noel's efforts, the other commissaries from Holland would be equally tractable; and, in the mean time, my friend has been, I hope, usefully employed. Le Pein then talked of Cabarrus, and described him as a vain talkative man without abilities, but possessed of considerable influence through his daughter (Madame Tallien) who is the mistress of Barras. He arrived here in his way to Amsterdam, where he is going to transact some money business. He received a few hours after his arrival here a note from Del Campo by a courier, stating that the French Government had just communicated to him the present state of the negotiation; that, with a view to show their respect for the engagements contracted with their allies, they had for the present suspended all discussion on the articles of the British projet; but that they hoped their allies would, on their part, consider the fatal consequences likely to arise to all parties from the continuance of the war; and that they would not render such a continuance necessary by the exorbitancy of their pretensions. Cabarrus immediately transmitted this note to the French Legation, and Maret, having personally flattered him a good deal, was treated by him with great confidence, and was shown the answer he had written to Del Campo, which was conceived in terms of the most perfect conformity to his wishes. Maret then persuaded him to stop at the Hague in his way to Amsterdam, in order to second Noel's efforts to bring the Dutch Commissaries to a compliant and peaceable disposition. Le Pein then added that Lord Malmesbury would find the French Legation very civil and cordial. Mr. Ellis observed that the important point was to satisfy our Cabinet that the French Government was in earnest; and for this purpose it was necessary that Lord Malmesbury should be assured officially that the allies had been applied to. He again repeated that this would certainly be done; that indeed he had not seen the official dispatches; but that Talleyrand's letters were such as to leave him no apprehensions on that score. On Saturday, August 5th, Mr. Ellis called upon M. Le Pein to inquire into the reason of Lord Malmesbury not having received at the conference of the day before the official communication he expected. Le Pein said that, in fact, the despatches had not been exactly such as he had looked for from Talleyrand's private letter; that indeed they communicated what had been done, but referred them to a future letter for instructions; and that Le Tourneur had not thought himself authorised, under such orders, to communicate the step which the Directory had taken, but had contented himself with assuring Lord Malmesbury that the delay augured well for the final success of the negotiation, and that the other two Commissaries had hinted at the truth as plainly as they could venture to do. Mr. Ellis said, although we may be satisfied with the knowledge afforded us by private communication, you should consider that it is not official, and therefore cannot be satisfactory to the English Cabinet. Le Pein admitted this, but added, if the Directory had made this application to their allies with a mere view to gain time, they would of course have been ready enough to announce the measure as an excuse. The conduct of our Government is certainly unsatisfactory, but if it is not such as to force the British Cabinet to break off the negotiation, and even if Lord Malmesbury were ignorant of all that we have communicated to him, I cannot think they would feel this necessity at present. I trust we shall yet bring matters to a favourable conclusion.

"This was the last interview Mr. Ellis had with M. Le Pein, but, on Sunday about an hour after Lord Malmesbury's conference, Maret sent privately by him the enclosed note."*

LORD GRENVILLE TO LORD MALMESBURY.

Private.

1797, August 9, Dropmore.—"At Mr. Wesley's request, I send him back to you with the acknowledgment of your public dispatches by Lord G. Leveson, whom I have seen here today. The communications which I have received from him have not tended to remove the anxious suspense in which we before were respecting the final termination of this important discussion. I am inclined to believe that the person with whom you have communicated is so far sincere that he and his friends wish that peace may be concluded; but it is, I am afraid, very doubtful whether even they wish to conclude it on such terms as we must unavoidably insist on. And the attempt to learn the further modifications to which they supposed you were authorised to agree, before the least ground had been yielded on their part, was one which does not seem to me to promise well as to their further intentions. I am extremely glad that this attempt was defeated in the manner in which it appears to have been, nor do I think it possible that we should advance one step in the very little we have to concede, till they have shown that they have not only the will (as they profess) but also the power to be of some service to us.

"In the meantime I have no doubt that it is on every account proper that the communication should be kept up, as one from which much good may arise, and from which no inconvenience is to be feared. I observe that the conduct of the Directory clearly shows them to be as anxious for delay as those who profess themselves better disposed to us. In these things it is sometimes a rule that what your adversary wishes must be injurious to your interests. But I do not think this rule applies here. The Directory appear unwilling to hazard a rupture at this precise moment, and probably rely on the measures they are pursuing for being enabled to break off with less danger to themselves a little time hence. But if pushed to the wall, I think they would rather hazard the rupture now, than give way and suffer peace to be concluded. By delay therefore we take the chance of events that may be in our favour, and we lose no means of peace at present, because none such exist.

"Such at least is my reasoning on this most complicated and interesting subject. I have never thought that the business could be speedily brought to any favourable end, and I am much confirmed in that opinion by finding that it agrees with yours, formed on the spot, and with much better means of judging.

"The principal ground of apprehension which I feel is from the apparent weakness and hesitation of the Councils who, while the Directory are keeping no measures with them, seem nevertheless to distrust their own strength, and to want that confidence in themselves which is, in truth, in affairs of this nature the first principle of strength. I am, however, not ignorant how difficult it is to judge on such points as these without knowing all the interior circumstances by which they are governed; and, at the end of all my speculations, I feel that we can do no more than wait the event which will decide much more certainly on peace and war than all that we can write or do by volumes of correspondence.

"The argument that was used to Mr. Ellis about money I take to be a mere pretence. If I am rightly informed, all that could be squeezed from the Dutch has already been taken, and more cannot be had at this time whether the French observe their secret article or break it. Does it not therefore look as if this subject of money was introduced with other views, and as preparatory to demands of which you are apprized that we have received some intimation from a quarter from which we have frequently had our best intelligence of what was to happen?

"I was much struck with the intimation that no difficulty would arise as to Spain. Can it be possible that Spain can mean to cede Trinidad to us? Or are they already prepared with an equivalent which they think we shall accept? Or have they said this without reflecting on the nature and consequences of our demand in this respect?

"I feel that I have run into an unconscionable length with these speculations and doubts, and I will therefore conclude with expressing my impatience to have something on which we may reason with more certainty."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, August 10, Weymouth.—"I cannot say that I admire the state in which the negotiation is getting, and though by Lord Granville Levison's paper, Mr. Le Peint and his director Maret pretend to much good intention, I strongly recommend that all answers from hence may be of the most cautious kind. At the same time I will confess to Lord Grenville that I see no disadvantage to us in letting the negotiation draw into length, and that events at Paris may effect that which the bad intentions of the three warmest Directors wish to prevent."

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, August 14, Lille.—"I have many thanks to return to you for your two private letters by Wesley. I am much obliged to you for sending him back, and I have a hope (though perhaps not a well founded one) that before he may be called upon to attend his brother to India, our negotiation will be drawing so near its conclusion, as to make it unnecessary to appoint a successor to him here.

"I am very sorry that my official letters of today will tend so little to remove the state of suspense in which we have been kept so long. The French plenipotentiaries themselves appear to think this delay unreasonable, and endeavour in our conferences to make up by personal attentions and civilities the deficiency in their ministerial communications. Whatever may be my private opinion as to the effects of this delay, you will perceive that in my conversation with them I always complain of it, represent it as calculated to create uneasiness, and give rise to the most unpleasant suspicions. Every thing, however, that I hear and observe convinces me no real evil will result from it provided it is not carried too far, and I am glad to find that your opinion coincides with mine on this point.

"The person who is alluded to in my separate dispatch is M. St. Simon, who (though of a very great family) has lived through the whole of the revolutions at Paris, and increased very considerably his family property by the purchase of church lands. He is a shrewd, sensible, strong-headed man, and there can be little doubt but that he spoke his own genuine sentiments and those of the public in general; but you must consider what he says as the consequence more of opinion and observation than of positive information, and make allowances accordingly. It tallies exceedingly well with what we have heard from Henry,* though certainly no communication subsists between them; and one of the great inducements I had in being so accurate in stating the conversation between Ellis and his friend was that it may serve to convey a great deal of what Henry has told us without being under the necessity of committing either him or William.† I could wish you would be so good (unless it be absolutely necessary) not to mention M. St. Simon's name to any one but Mr. Pitt.

"You will see by the very strong and recriminating answer sent by the Directory to the Councils that I was not mistaken when I said that no real conciliation had taken place, and I wish I may not be equally justified in my apprehensions that the Directorial party will end by maintaining, consequently by strengthening, its power and authority.

* M. Pein.

† M. Maret.

But whether, even in this case, in the present temper of the country and in the ruined state of its finance they will venture to break off the negotiation I own I have my doubts, but that they will make it as unpleasant and difficult as possible, I have none. If the moderate party had a regular leader, if they prepared their measures before-hand, and above all, if they confined themselves to popular questions, there is little doubt but that in the end the Directory must be beat; but there cannot exist a stronger proof of this not being the case than the weak debate on Thursday, when this answer was read from the Directory. Vaublanc alone spoke to any purpose, and no strong resolution was come to.

"It was perfectly evident to me, and I really thought I had mentioned it in one of my private letters, that the question of money when connected with the Dutch cessions was precisely what you say. The French were to have had about five millions from the Dutch. They have received about two, and would certainly be very glad to get the remainder from us as the price of the Cape.

"In regard to the Portuguese peace, M. d'Aranjo is so very strange a man, so very partial to revolutionary principles and modern philosophy, that I am almost inclined to believe that he acted under their influence, and very much from his own head. His never acquainting me with his having resumed the negotiation, and his now only communicating to me such a very general account of the treaty looks very suspicious. Possibly Almeida may be able to throw some light on this mysterious and reserved conduct. The copy of the treaty I enclose in my official letter I obtained through Henry, with the consent of William; and as I did not get it till a late hour yesterday, I thought it better to detain Brooks till after our conference of today. You will observe that Le Tourneur declared almost officially that no great difficulty would arise in regard to Spain. I cannot solve this problem.

"Since I began this letter I have read a much more detailed account of Vaublanc's speech on Thursday, and I must retract what I said concerning it. I have thought it so good a one and such an able defence of the Councils against the Directory, that I have enclosed the paper in which it is inserted in one of my dispatches."

"The French Legation within these few days seem allowed to associate with us. Maret came into my box at the play on Friday, and yesterday I went into theirs, to the great surprise and, I believe, satisfaction of the audience, who were much more attentive to us than to the play."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

1797, August 18, Cleveland Row.—"This Portuguese business is of bad omen for what is to come from Talleyrand. You may be assured that the whole has been settled entirely by him and d'Aranjo, and the Court of Lisbon is no party to it; as indeed the enclosed dispatch to him, sent here under flying seal, sufficiently demonstrates. If the Directory refuses to listen to any discussion upon the subject, our negotiations must break off. If the business is referred to Lisle, it will much embarrass your proceedings, because it will be of course more difficult to make them recede from any advantage gained, and which they have made matter of triumph at Paris, than it would have been to have stood firm upon this point which they have no pretence to insist upon. The best expedient that I can devise is that (supposing the two parties agreed on all other points) the Directory should declare, for which the words would afford some grounds, that these stipulations had reference only to the present war, and expire with its termination. This, if coupled with the signature of peace, and made part of it, we might accept, but not otherwise, as in any other case it would afford to the enemy both a motive and a means of continuing the war. But I greatly doubt whether the period of peace is yet arrived. There seems so much insolence, and such an overbearing opinion of their own consequence and power even among those who profess themselves the best disposed, that I fear it will be impossible yet to obtain such terms as we must require. Our best chance is in patience and firmness; but these are no security against such dispositions as we have to contend with.

"I have done as you desire about the name you sent me in your private letter, and will continue to do so as to all names that you may have occasion to mention to me with the same reserve. The conduct of the Councils seems to me even weaker and more childish than Mr. Ellis's friend describes it; and yet such is the force of opinion with them that they may ultimately triumph in spite of themselves.

"We have no other account than through you of the Emperor's resolutions to treat for definitive peace at Udine, but I have no doubt of the fact."

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private and Secret.

1797, August 22, Lille.—"On Friday last a Mr. Melvil of Boston in America desired to speak with me, but being informed by my servants that I never received anybody who was not either personally known to me, or brought with him letters of recommendation, he asked whether any of the gentlemen with me would see him, and, in consequence of what he was told, he wrote a note to Mr. Ellis to request an interview. This was complied with. The motive of his journey (for he said he came from Paris on purpose) was precisely the same as that which brought Mr. Potter to London a few days before my departure. Mr. Melvil said he had been employed in making the Portuguese peace and negotiated the pecuniary part of it; that he would undertake we should obtain any peace the Directory had the power of signing if we could employ him in the same way; that it must, however, cost us somewhat more than it had cost Portugal; and on being asked what this meant, he said fifteen million of livres would be the sum required. He asserted with the greatest confidence that he had full authority for what he advanced, and that if I would see him, he would give me incontestable proofs of it.

"Mr. Ellis (as we had previously agreed) told Mr. Melvil that my seeing him was neither possible or material, since he might open himself with equal confidence and with equal security to him. Mr. Melvil then intimated (like Potter) that he was trusted by Peter,* and, like Potter, he was l'ami intime de Perregeau, but, on being pressed for further proofs, he had none beyond these to produce, and these rested solely on assertions. Mr. Ellis asked him whether from what he said it was to be inferred that the Directory, or at least some of its members, intended to apply to their own use the sum to be paid by Portugal, and which, from his statement, appeared to be at least ten millions of livres. Mr. Melvil said yes, they certainly do intend to share it amongst themselves as they did that which was received from Naples. The utter impossibility of this being fact because, on one side, it is universally known, though not officially published, that some pecuniary stipulations made part of these treaties, and on the other, that these sums are paid into the hands of officers accountable to the Councils if called upon, and never can pass through the hands of the Directory, made the whole of Mr. Melvil's story so improbable that Mr. Ellis, after representing the enormity of the sum asked for, which, when given as a bribe, exceeded any one ever yet heard of for such a purpose, declined listening to Mr. Melvil's proposal; and he, after having seen Mr. Ellis again in the evening and repeating nearly what he had said in the morning, left Lille on Saturday about 10 a.m., and as he took the road to Arras he is probably returned to Paris. Mr. Melvil was different from Mr. Potter as being much less talkative, and much more reserved and on his guard when questioned. He appeared to be between twenty and thirty.

"Although I am nearly satisfied in my own mind that both of them acted with a view to their own personal interests, and without any direct authority, yet, as it is material to ascertain whether they really have any grounds whatever for what they say, and whether, if they have, the means they allude to might (when reduced into a reasonable shape) become practicable, after turning the matter over and over again in my mind and conversing with Mr. Ellis on the subject, it appeared to me that there could be no risk whatever in communicating the whole of it to Henry, that it might be done as a proof of the great confidence placed in him, and by making him acquainted with it, we might possibly get at the bottom of this business, and be able to derive advantage if any was to be obtained from it.

"It is necessary to premise that I should not have been so ready to promote a communication of this sort to Henry if what had passed a few days ago between him and Mr. Ellis had not prepared the way. It had been surmised as to that Henry having lost his office (which is true) was reduced to very narrow circumstances, and that, although he expected (could he remain here) to be chosen as a representative of this commune at the next election, yet that he was obliged to quit Lisle shortly and return to Paris in order to try to obtain employment. To obviate this (which it was supposed we much wished to do) it was hinted by this friend of his that, if I would advance him 200*l.*, he would lend that sum to Henry. This was communicated to Ellis by a note. To this note, as it came from one who had no right to interfere (although he had been occasionally employed to settle the meetings between Ellis and Henry) no answer whatever was given, but Mr. Ellis, at my request, immediately called on Henry and communicated it to him, reproaching him at the same time in the language of confidence and friendship with his not having stated directly and at once his situation to him. Henry's behaviour was perfectly proper on this occasion, and not at all that of a person who had been laying a little cunning trap to obtain money. He disclaimed the having authorised the person to write the note, but he acknowledged his situation to be such as was described in it; and when Ellis pressed him to accept that sum or even a larger as from himself and simply as a loan, Henry persisted to decline it with apparent confusion and with strong expressions of gratitude; and the next day wrote Mr. Ellis a very well-turned note, which I believe he has sent to Canning. This incident established between Henry and Ellis a different kind of intimacy from that which arose from their political communications, and naturally placed Henry in a situation to be told what had passed between Mr. Ellis and Melvil, without its appearing to be an artful confidence, or as touching on an indelicate subject. Henry was not surprised at it. He said that Peter was capable of the greatest étourderie, although he scarce would send such a man with such an errand; that Peter and Paul* were both venal, and that it would be well worth while to get one or both of them if possible. Henry did not speak as a person at all apprised that anything of the sort had happened or was likely to happen; and, although he approved the dismissal of Melvil, yet he wished the business could be resumed. Mr. Ellis here stated the difference between money given privately to an individual to promote a measure, or money stipulated in the negotiation as the price of that measure. The first was one that might perhaps be listened to, but, as to the latter, it could not be heard of. We would not consent to give un écu de six francs if it was to come under such a description. Henry acquiesced completely to this distinction, and repeated his wish that Melvil's commission might again appear in another and in a more admissible form. I rather think from his manner what Ellis said sunk deep on his mind, and that we shall hear again from him on this subject. Towards the end of the conversation, Ellis pressed again, if he was distressed in order to continue his residence at Lille, to accept the offer he had made, and Henry promised that, when that was really the case, he would not hesitate to apply to him.

"My reason for entering so fully into this subject is that Mr. Melvil, although he took the Paris road, expressed an intention of carrying his proposals immediately to England; and, as he may possibly try to gain access to your Lordship, I thought it my duty to tell you all that has passed. My suspicion is that he is a mere adventurer, and has a view to stock jobbing. Mr. Ellis has written to Perregeau by the person who carries the letter to Aranjó, requesting him to give us whatever information he can on the subject."

1797, August 15.—"Je n'ai pu vous témoigner hier toute la reconnaissance que m'inspire votre généreux procédé. Mes expressions étaient embarrassées; et je vous avoue qu'il se trouvait quelq' émotion de peine à ce que j'éprouvais. L'idée qu'un rapport maladroit vous eut fait supposer un projet formé m'avait saisi au même instant que le ressentiment de votre obligeance; et malgré les ménagements délicats dont vous enveloppiez votre démarche, il s'est fait dans mes sentiments une mélange d'attendrissement et de douleur.

"Soyez bien convaincu qu'aucun calcul n'a décidé l'aveu peu réfléchi que j'ai fait à la personne en question. Je lui ai parlé d'abondance dès le premier moment où je vis que mes propres intérêts m'allaient faire la loi d'abandonner une affaire où j'apporte plus de bonne volonté que de véritables moyens, et dont le succès serait ma plus précieuse récompense. Cette circonstance m'afflige réellement; et lorsque j'en parlai à C[unningham] je m'abandonnai trop à ma sensibilité. Je lui avouai que mon plus cher désir serait de suivre la marche de cette importante affaire, et que je déplorais la nécessité où je me trouvais d'aller à la fois solliciter un nouvel emploi, et la rentrée des arrières qui m'étaient dus. Ne m'accusez pas d'ingratitude si je me reproche d'avoir été plus confiant que prudent. Peut-être ma peine vient-elle de ce que votre offre est Je suis pénétré de votre procédé, et j'y réponds en vous avouant qu'il n'est aucun sacrifice que je ne fasse pour continuer ce que vous voulez bien nommer des services ; que ce motif me rendra ma gêne supportable ; et que vous ne me feriez pas justice si vous m'en supposiez quelqu'un d'intéressé."

1797, August 15, Lisle.—"Je regrette infiniment qu'une démarche très simple de ma part, et qui n'a pu être mieux amenée parce que les circonstances ne m'en laissent pas le temps, vous ait causé de la peine, ou même occasionné un moment d'embarras. Assurément si l'un de nous devait supposer à l'autre des vues intéressées, c'est bien plutôt vous qui auriez le droit de me les imputer, parce que nous avons un intérêt bien puissant à ne pas nous voir privés des services que vous avez bien voulu nous rendre ; et quoique la levée du principal obstacle qui, sans votre secours, eût déjà rendu votre succès impossible, nous donne actuellement des espérances fondées de réussite, nous sommes très éloignés de croire que vos conseils nous soient désormais indifférents."

"Je reviens donc à la charge, et vous supplie de vouloir bien vous ouvrir à moi avec franchise et en détail sur la manière d'éloigner un malheur qui nous serait bien plus sensible qu'à vous. Surtout, que tout ceci se passe de vous à moi, et sans intermédiaire. C'est sur quoi il m'est prescrit d'insister par des raisons les plus importantes. Songez que les confidences que vous m'avez déjà faites sont bien autrement essentielles que celle que je vous demande, et croyez en même temps que celle-ci me sera bien plus sensible."

LORD MALMESBURY TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, August 22, Lille.—"After having written so very long a private letter as I have already done, it is not quite reasonable to trouble you with a second ; but I wish to thank you for yours of the 18th, and to assure you, although I did not think it necessary to expatiate on them, that I felt all the perplexities and dangers into which d'Aranjo's disgraceful conduct has plunged us, to their full extent. They present themselves in every direction, and I confess I see no safe, certainly no easy way out of them. It is possible before you get any answer from Lisbon we may here either have broken off our negotiation, or be so far advanced in it as, in a certain degree, to smooth these Portuguese difficulties ; but this is but a faint hope, and we must be prepared for the worst. I really believe peace is the general wish of this country, but I also believe that they are so elated by success, so drunk with their own importance, that it will be a work of infinite patience, labour and forbearance to arrive at peace on such terms as they shall think they ought to grant, and we think we ought to demand.

"As nothing that has passed lately between Henry and Ellis has been of a nature sufficiently secret to put it quite apart from the rest of my correspondence, and as I conceive it as well to avoid as far as is possible this most secret mode of conveying intelligence, I have put all that is come to our knowledge into a separate dispatch. William now begins to be less fearful of associating with me ; and all I say about the answer from Holland, and of Edward's* sending it back for amendment, comes from him. The rest comes from Henry, with whom I am not yet personally acquainted, but, unless I am much mistaken, the incident which I have related to you in my other private letter will, in the end, not only procure me his intimate acquaintance, but also that of William. I hope you do not think I judged improperly in coming to a determination to communicate what Melvil said to Henry. It cannot commit me, and, if there is any substance or reality in what either Melvil or Potter prepared, I think it will now appear. As it is just possible you may not be in town, and that Melvil may arrive and find means of getting at Mr. Pitt, I have desired Wesley to copy my letter on this subject to you, and I have sent this copy to Mr. Pitt."

RUFUS KING to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, August 25, Great Cumberland Place.—"Having just received despatches from Philadelphia, I take the liberty to send your Lordship several newspapers containing the proceedings of the Congress relative to Thomas Blunt, who was on the 8th of July expelled from the Senate of the United States by all the voices except one.

"It has given me great satisfaction to perceive (because it corresponds with my wishes, as well as my uniform reports to the American Government) that his Majesty's Government so distinctly disapproved the project of Mr. Blunt and his associates the moment that they were apprized of it; and, with my sentiments concerning the existence of a perfect harmony and good will between the two countries, I shall always lament that Mr. Liston did not, at least confidentially, communicate to the American Government the existence of a scheme so full of mischief, and so hazardous to our peace.

"I pray your Lordship to be so obliging as to return to me the papers when you shall have perused them."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, August 28, Hollwood.—"Mr. Melvill, of whom Lord Malmesbury gives an account in one of his private communications, has come to me here to-day. You know, of course, the subject of his conversation. It does not amount to anything very precise, but it seems worth consideration. I have only heard what he had to say, without giving him any answer on the point in question, but he must either have one, or be told that he is to have none, in two or three days. If his account is a true one (which from his manner I rather incline to believe it) we shall have no contre-projet nor any material communication from Lisle, till some answer is returned through him, or some other of the various channels through which a negotiation of the same sort appears to be solicited. If you could conveniently meet me in town or at Wimbledon, at any hour either on Wednesday, Thursday, or Friday morning, I should be very glad to talk it over with you. I should rather wish to be able to come back here to dinner."

1797, August 29, Lille.—"Wesley says he has stayed to the last moment and must now return to accompany his brother to India. I am truly sorry to lose him.

* M. de Talleyrand.

"My separate despatch contains the substance, or rather the detail, of everything which we have collected from Henry and William since I last wrote. Indeed I now have such frequent opportunities of conversing alone with William, and find him always so ready to converse, that the mysterious meetings with Henry are no longer so essential as they were before this intercourse was practicable.

"I thought it advisable to put this intelligence rather in the shape of a despatch than to convey it in the secret manner hitherto employed. It contains the only plausible account for the delay in the negotiation so essential to be accounted for, and I have so far endeavoured to disguise the motive which induced my informant here to speak, as without materially altering the fact, to prevent his being committed.

"The other two channels of intelligence to which I refer are St. Simon, and a person of the name of René de Lagarde. He is one of the editors of Perlet's Journal, and came here to apply for the release of his brother, who was an officer in the late expedition against Ireland, and now a prisoner at Litchfield. He wrote me so very well turned a letter that I easily perceived he was above the common class of spies, and I directed Mr. Ross to meet him at the time and in the manner he appointed. He certainly was well informed, as he stated a great many facts we know to be true, and which are certainly not generally known. He said he derived his intelligence from a confidential and private secretary of M. Taylerand [Talleyrand]. It went in general to confirm everything we had been told by Henry and William, with some few immaterial variations, and some not very important additional information, which Wesley will acquaint you with. He made no scruple of taking money, and I have settled to pay him for the future in proportion to the value of the intelligence he transmits, and also for any articles which I may choose to insert in Perlet. All this was managed by Mr. Ross, who has done it with great discretion and economy.

"I think it is very probable that the Dutch will make a point of having their ministers here. I do not see how they can assist at our conferences, as they are not directly a party to the treaty or supposed to sign it. But I see no objection to their coming and to my seeing them separately, or at the same time with the French, provided it be understood that they make no part of the congress if it may be so called. The same reasoning may also apply to Count Cabarrus. I wish however to hear your opinion before I take any step.

"To my great concern Mr. Ellis talks of leaving me in about ten days. As I am now quite sure there would not be the smallest objection made here to Lord Pembroke being with me, I have thoughts of writing to him, if my endeavours to prevail on Ellis to stay should fail."

LORD GRENVILLE to RUFUS KING.

1797, August 30, Dropmore.—"I am much obliged to you for the communication of the American papers you sent me. I am not sorry for the accident which has afforded the means of proving the principles and rules by which our conduct is guided in every thing that effects the peace and tranquility of the United States; but I hardly think that Mr. Liston would have been at liberty to communicate to the Government of the United States a proposal of this nature, the communication of which might have involved the proposers in much personal risk; while the plan itself could be productive of no inconvenience to your Government, since it could never be acted upon but by the co-operation of the King's ministers, a co-operation which Mr. Liston had every reason to presume never would be given, and which was accordingly refused in the most distinct and pointed manner on the first intimation we received of the business.

"I own I think that Mr. Liston (though acting for the best unquestionably, and with great means of judging of the line which he was to pursue) has nevertheless gone at least to the utmost extent of what his situation allowed, if not somewhat beyond it, when he answered the letter of Colonel Pickering by an avowal which may prejudice individuals supposed to be implicated in it. I have however no reason to regret, in the present instance, that the subject did not strike him exactly in the light in which it might perhaps have struck me in the same situation; as the consequence has only been to evince still more clearly the correctness of our principles and conduct."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797, July-October] 25; Wimbledon.—"I have this moment received your despatches from Mr. Wickham when Lord Spencer was with me. I have no doubt of agreeing to the terms, as the intelligence of the general intention is worth that compensation, but the knowledge I have of the person in question renders it very necessary indeed to watch over the execution, for, as I shall mention to you when we meet, it is not impossible to be a double treachery for the purpose of involving us in a great scrape. I have given the two enclosures to Lord Spencer to lock up in his private repositories, and I have kept the despatch itself, which I shall restore to you. I do not know what fault De Pres has to find either with the East India or the Board of Control. He may be angry at me for having detected him in his former treachery."

W. WINDHAM to W. PITT.

1797, September 2.—"You are aware that there are still some matters remaining to be settled with respect to the Royalists, though this is the last statement with which there may be occasion to trouble you. As such, you may be willing to give to it a more ready attention. Extremum hunc, Arethusa, mihi, . . .

"I will lay before you in one view, but in a few words, the whole of what has been done, that you may judge better, and more readily, what further is necessary.

"The first assistance ever allotted to the Royalists, as far as I can find, in the way of pecuniary succours, was the 10,000*l.* sent out with Sir S. Warren at the time of the expedition to Quiberon. But of this only 2,700*l.* was ever sent into the country, the rest having been laid out in the purchase of provisions, the payment of persons making part of the expedition, and other expenses incurred during the time that the troops remained upon that service.

"From that time, till the evacuation of the Isle D'yeu [Dieu] various sums were sent into the country, all of them to the armies of Charette, Stofflet, or Scepeaux, amounting in the whole to about 12,000*l.*, and forming what may be called the first part of the remittances to the Royalists; which I wish to distinguish from the other, inasmuch as the sums remitted afterwards either passed through my hands, or came more immediately within my own knowledge.

"These latter, counting from the evacuation of the Isle D'Yeu down to the present day, and including remittances of all sorts and to all parties, paid or unpaid, amount to 62,680*l.*; so that the whole sum remitted to Royalists of any denomination in the provinces on this side of France, from the beginning of the war down to the present time, amounts to 78,180*l.* This account, stated somewhat more in detail, and distinguishing the parties as well as the periods, may be otherwise given as in the margin, amounting to the same sum of 78,180*l.*

Nota Bene.—The period of January 1797 has been chosen as that at which I gave you in a statement of these accounts, and obtained an order for the payment of 9,000*l.* to be issued at the same times as the 60,000*l.* that was to have been remitted to Paris.

“What is meant by remittances unpaid is money paid by our authority in the interior, but not repaid here. The amount of the part so unpaid is about 3,737*l.*, a small sum in itself, but affecting cruelly the persons to whom it is due, and not very creditable to our punctuality in money transactions.

“From the time when the troops were withdrawn from the Isle D’Yeu, though it was signified that nothing further was to be expected in the way of active force, yet the fullest assurances were given that there would be no want of pecuniary assistance, whenever it should appear that such assistance was likely to be fairly and advantageously laid out. Such assurances had in fact been given from a period long antecedent to that in which I had anything to do in these affairs. They were given, I conceive, to Puisaye before his coming into this country. They were certainly given to him at his leaving it. They were renewed to De Moustier when the question was of his going. They were contained, I have a notion, in two letters written about that period by Lord Grenville to the Duke of Harcourt. They were at length repeated in a more formal manner on the 13th February 1796; when, to bring the matter to an issue, and to put an end to the appearance of dealing only in general professions of which nothing was to come, a specific promise was made of remitting 30,000*l.* per month, to be continued for three months, half to the armies of Charette, Stofflet, and Scepeaux, and half to those of Brittany.

"In comparing the terms of this promise with the amount of the sums remitted, it is plain that no account is to be taken of sums sent over before the promise was made, nor of those that had another destination than that to the armies there specified.

"Of this latter sort, were the sums given to Frotté, amounting to 9,266*l.*

"It is true also that, in strictness, a deduction ought to be made for the 22,425*l.* (namely 7,425*l.* in dollars, and 15,000*l.* in notes) landed by Sir Edward Pellew; it having been agreed that this should not be considered as part of the sums engaged for, but stand in the form of an extra allowance. But without insisting upon that circumstance, particularly as I continued to keep it in great measure from the knowledge of the parties, wishing rather to surprise them with something beyond their hopes than to run the risk of furnishing them with a ground of additional complaint, let there be deducted only 9,266*l.* remitted to Frotté, 23,558*l.* not having any part common with the preceding and remitted before the 13th February 1796, making together 32,824*l.*; leaving a balance of 45,356*l.* as money, that may be carried to account in discharge of the 90,000*l.* promised.* Observing always that much even of this, having been paid at a later period, could by no means answer the same purpose as if it had been remitted within the time stipulated.

"Such is the state of the transaction, as it appears on the face of the account, and is founded merely on a comparison of the sums sent with the extent of what was engaged for.

"Some circumstances, however, must here be stated which may tend to acquit us, in part, of a breach of engagement; even though the sums remitted should fall short, in a considerable degree, of those held out in the letter above referred to.

"Before this letter was finally agreed on and the measures in consequence carried into effect, before, in fact, the first payment had reached its destination, news arrived of the unfortunate death of Stofflet, which was followed soon after by the capture of Charette, and the suppression of the whole of the Royalist force on that side the Loire.

"In consequence of this, and of the distressed state in which they were for want of money, the army of Scepeaux was soon after obliged to make its peace; and, long before the expiration of the three months, all the other parties had submitted, and the whole of the Royalist war was at an end.

"It is certain that, however we might have been accessory to those events by not fulfilling earlier the promises which we had never failed to make for more than two years before (as I have not the least doubt in my own mind that we were) it could not be expected that we were to make good engagements, when the objects for which they were entered into, by whatever means it so happened, no longer subsisted.

"It is clearly by this test that the question of any further assistance to be given to the Royalists is to be tried, so far as the same is matter of good faith; namely, whether there still exist the means of applying the money conformably to the views and in pursuance of the principle on which it was originally granted.

"To facilitate the application of this rule, I must proceed to state that part of the account which relates separately to Puisaye, the only surviving claimant, and who does claim with great earnestness, and with a force of argument on his side which I confess myself wholly unable to withstand.

"Of the 90,000*l.* promised in all, in the letter of the 13th February, Puisaye was to have 45,000*l.*

"He has received since that time (or rather there has been sent to him, including much that has been lost or diverted from its destination in different ways, exempli gratia, 5,000*l.* lost with Comte de Serent, 1,000*l.* lost by M. de Cointré, 800*l.* of it afterwards recovered and applied to other purposes) 27,901*l.* leaving a difference between the sums promised and the sums sent of 17,099*l.*

"It seems to me that of this difference he ought to have whatever there is reason to think will be fairly laid out in any of the following ways:—

"1st. In discharging engagements contracted under the faith of our assurances.

"2nd. In making compensation, as far as may be, to those who have suffered more immediately in consequence of these assurances not having been fulfilled.

"3rd. In maintaining that party in such a state of intelligence, connexion, and organization, as to them, and for their future views and interests, shall appear to be desirable.

"The objects comprised under these several heads have been detailed on different occasions, and will of themselves readily occur.

"Several debts have been contracted for goods purchased on the prospect of our remittances; and now remain undischarged. If the persons we are treating with had a mind to act unfairly, it would be easy for them to state the amount of these much greater than they make it.

"Upon the prospect of reimbursement out of the funds expected from hence, many persons advanced money for the use of the army, exclusive of those who took bons for the repayment of such advances here.

"And many more lent their services to an extent which they could not afford, or would not have been disposed to go but upon some prospect of remuneration.

"A great many are in a state still more to call for consideration; namely persons who, upon the invitation formally held out by Puisaye in consequence of the assurances and in obedience even to the instructions sent from here, abandoned their houses, or came over from the Republican armies; and are now, in consequence, in a situation in which they have no means of escape or subsistence but what they derive from the good will of the country people, who, in consequence, partake of this grievance, and of the discontent that must be produced by it.

"These are all claims of direct justice. There are others which, though not excluding the consideration of justice, as these do not exclude that of policy, belong more to the head of policy; and of a policy which, I cannot but think, we shall some day feel, in spite of all that may be done by the negotiations at Lille.

"It cannot be supposed that the Royalists can subsist as a party, even in the state of inaction in which they are at present, and from which no one at this time thinks of removing them, without a continued expense, trifling as a national object, but great as the contribution of a people in such circumstances as theirs.

"They must have money for intelligence, money for communication, money to buy off the vigilance of guards and officers, to get their friends out of prison, their names erased from the list of emigrants, to compensate losses sustained in their service, to support those who by engaging with them have thrown themselves out of every other means of subsistence.

"Do we not owe it to them to employ whatever means are in our power to enable them to make head against these expenses, to preserve themselves as a party, to keep in readiness for events which may happen at any instant, and which may reasonably be expected sooner or later; but which are never likely to take place wholly without a struggle wherein the existence of the Royalists in more or less force may be of material consequence?

"If we do not owe this to them in justice I am sure we owe it to ourselves in policy, as well with a view to the influence it may have, in possible cases, on the fate of the Republic, as to the difference to be made by leaving this part of France friendly or hostile to us, full of distrust or full of confidence.

"To both of these considerations something will perhaps be allowed. The question will be of the extent to which they should go, as measured by what we should do in consequence. Without attempting to state the utmost that we ought to do, which must be regulated principally by the consideration of our means, I will state my opinion that we cannot follow up the principle above laid down, nor acquit ourselves of what is strictly due from us, without approaching so near to the sum before stated, namely the 17,099*l.* by which our remittances in this part fall short of our engagements, that we shall act illiberally if we do not give the whole of that sum. The expense will fall more easy as it will not be necessary to pay the whole at once.

"It will be sufficient at first, after paying the 3,737*l.* due long since for bons (which I have considered among the remittances and not as part of the balance, and which is really a scandal to us every hour that it remains) to make an advance of two or three thousand more, and then to proceed by instalments of four or five thousand pounds per month, or in any proportions that you may like better, till the whole 17,099*l.* is discharged.

"Such is my idea of what is further due from us to the Royalists if not in point of justice, which however I am not prepared to give up, at least in conformity to those principles which ought to govern a great nation in a transaction of this sort; particularly if we feel conscious, as I am afraid we must, that the whole of our conduct towards these unfortunate people will not bear a very accurate examination.

"There are still two other matters necessary to complete the whole of what is connected with this subject. The one is a sum of 3,287*l.*, the balance of an account which in two years and upwards, and while it was confined to its proper objects, amounted only to less than 9,000*l.* Even of this 9,000*l.* near 1,000*l.* was for expenses attending the expedition to Quiberon. The other, what concerns the situation of Puisaye, personally.

"The account from which the former of these articles arises, and which began in the spring of the year 1795, consists of a multitude of little particulars growing out of our communications with the Royalists, and not important enough to find a place under any regular department. Of this sort are allowances to persons going backwards and forwards; subsistence to some of them during their stay here; assistance to persons desirous of returning to France finally; occasional charges made by the Prince de Bouillon for the conveyance of persons and letters which he has considered as peculiarly addressed to me, and has not thought right to put down in his general account. The whole of this amounted, in the present year, to no more than 1,077*l.*, till a sum was added of 1,345*l.* for the conveyance of priests, which cannot be charged particularly to the Royalist service, but is part of the general assistance given to the French clergy, and calculated in the end to produce a considerable saving under that head. The balance, including that sum, is only 3,287*l.*, which I shall of course be glad to get paid as soon as convenient, as it has been partly advanced by myself, and partly taken from other heads of service to which it must be replaced.

"The question of Puisaye himself I must leave entirely to your discretion. In a letter to him from Mr. Dundas, written towards the close of last year, when it was wished probably that he should withdraw from the country, an offer was made, as I collect from his answer, of furnishing him with some means of support in case he should choose either to come over hither or to retire into some other part of Europe. He declined the offer, thinking that his presence in France might still be useful; and certainly did himself no discredit by that refusal; since it is difficult to conceive a state more trying to the constancy of anyone, than that in which his life would be passed during every moment of his continuance in that country.

"He has since, perforce, been obliged to quit it, the plots for his destruction having become too numerous and various to leave him either any chance of escape or hope of being useful.

"The King and Monsieur have both been fain to render the fullest testimony to his merits and services. Such is also the opinion of some whose judgment cannot fail to have great weight, and whose real sentiments in this respect I have reason to think myself acquainted with; I mean particularly M. de Cazalès. His conduct in his transactions with us you think of, I presume, as I do, and will be ready to declare to have been open, honourable, and upright; never misleading us on any point of information, nor seeking to obtain the assistance of this country on terms inconsistent either with our interests or his own duty.

"It must never be forgotten that his confidence in us, and his secrecy with respect to everything that we entrusted to him, was one of the first sources of the hostility conceived against him, and the chief instrument used by his enemies for his destruction. All that we see and know of him is that his conduct has been highly meritorious; and that he is traduced and calumniated on charges of which we know him to be innocent, and which result from causes that cannot but give him an additional merit in our eyes. The great foundation of the suspicions and clamours raised against him, and on which his enemies have never failed to work, from the publication by Louvet down to the present day, has been that he is a man sold to England, and who is betraying to us the interests of his own country. We know whether that is so or not; and whether the causes that have led to the suspicion are not such as should give him a claim to our support.

"On this statement, of the correctness of which you can perfectly judge, I leave him to your discretion. I know not that his wishes are at all exorbitant, or that he looks for more than to be enabled for the present, and till things shall have taken their final turn, to subsist in decent comfort, suitably to the condition of a man who has acted so considerable a part, and been employed so confidentially, and in service so important as it might have proved, by the British Government.

"Though the objects mentioned in this letter are all of a sort to make an early decision desirable, yet the most pressing seem to be an advance for the discharge of the 3,737*l.* unpaid bons, and something for claims of a similar nature that remain unsatisfied in the interior."

PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797], September 2, Hollwood.—"I have seen Melvill, and obtained from him (on conditions) the paper which I enclose. It seems, I think, a sufficient proof that he communicates with those who know what has passed at Lisle. His conversation however was not very distinct or satisfactory, but he said precisely that it would not be difficult, if we insisted on it, to have the Cape ceded to ourselves, instead of its being neutral.

"I was afraid of entering on the question of Portugal, but he said enough on it to show me that he had some suspicion of our disliking the terms, and that the French set a high value on them. I have promised to let him know after I have sufficiently considered the paper, whether I think the thing worth pursuing. I should wish much to see you first, and will be in readiness either to come to you at Dropmore, or meet you in town, or anywhere else (unless it suits you to come over here) any time to-morrow, or next day."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 4 [Stowe].—"I feel very strongly your kindness to my poor protégé Mr. Fisher, who had flattered himself with hopes that his claim might have been considered as very distinct from those whom you so properly put aside; but it is so much more gratifying to me to owe to your kindness the protection which you are so good to hold out to him, that I with pleasure drop any idea of urging further his Dutch claims; and will thank you for your offer of endeavouring to settle his allowance for the employment which you gave him last winter. I am going by the 14th to Bristol; meaning that the signature of the two returns of the 14th September and the 1st of October shall satisfy my military duties for this year. After that day I return home, and wish I could tempt Lady Grenville and you to Wotton for a week, or here, whichever you like best. I am mortified with your Teneriffe disappointment, for I fear that it will give the Spaniards confidence. As to peace, facile credimus quod volumus; et volo that you shall have no peace till you sign it with Louis XVIII., which will be in six months. You see that I am very communicative of my politics; and if you are not as good a believer as I am, the fault is evidently in your want of understanding. In the meantime do not let the Comte D'Artois starve, which is pretty near his actual situation; and the Treasury having referred Monsieur Duteil to Canning, who has again sent him back to the Treasury on this subject. The only sure and clear result of all these references is, that Monsieur has not one farthing; and having received only 1,000*l.* for the last three months, is not very likely to get fat."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 4, Weymouth.—"I entirely approve of Lord Grenville's proposal that Admiral Duncan should accept the Order of St. Alexander which Count Woronzow has received from Petersburg ; and that, in return, the Russian Admiral should be created a Knight of the Bath ; but do not see any reason of conveying any mark of favour to the other officers of the Russian navy who served in this country."

W. PITT to GEORGE III.

1797, September 6, Hollwood.—"Mr. Pitt humbly begs leave to acquaint your Majesty that a Mr. Melville, the person named in one of Lord Malmesbury's separate letters, has come over here to repeat a proposal similar to that which he had made at Lisle, of engaging for the conclusion of peace on terms satisfactory and advantageous to this country, in return for the private payment of a sum of money to be distributed among the different members of the French Government. The sum he names is a very large one, amounting to four hundred and fifty thousand pounds ; but it seems not to be more than would be wisely employed if he can make good what he proposes as the condition previous to its being paid, namely, that the treaty shall be signed and ratified without delay, leaving this country in possession of the Cape, Ceylon, Cochin, and Trinidad, and exacting nothing in return. On consulting with such of your Majesty's servants as were within reach, Mr. Pitt finds them all of opinion that the knowledge which Mr. Melville appears to have of the most secret particulars of what has passed at Lisle are a sufficient proof that he is really trusted by those in the confidence of the French Government, and that it would be wise to encourage the proposal. The safest mode of doing it seems to be to refer Mr. Melville to Lisle, and state the particulars to Lord Malmesbury, authorising him to engage for the payment on the condition of the treaty being concluded within a limited time on terms consistent with his instructions. The sum might without material difficulty, it is conceived, be supplied in part from the territorial revenues of India, and the remainder from secret service, without the necessity of ever disclosing the transaction. Mr. Pitt has thought it his duty to submit this to your Majesty's consideration, and wait your Majesty's commands before he takes any further step in the business."

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR MORTON EDEN.

Private.

1797, September 8, Dropmore.—"I have to acknowledge your private letter by Mr. Sevrigh, and I am concerned to be obliged to say that, under the present circumstances, it does not appear to me that the request which it contains could with propriety be recommended to His Majesty.

"I hope at the same time that you are persuaded of the pleasure I should feel in forwarding your wishes, and of the justice which I do to your exertions, however ineffectual they have been rendered by the untoward course of events, which produced the negotiations of Austria for a separate peace.

"In the present moment, I see very little prospect of any cordiality on the part of the Austrian Government. It will be very interesting to us to know whether M. Thugut still entertains any idea of quitting his situation, and what are (in that case) the dispositions of his probable successor. I conclude that you understood, from the tenor of my despatch on the subject, that the business of the Austrian loan was not to be lost sight of ; but that we thought it more advantageous to speak of it as a point that could admit of no doubt, than to urge it as a matter which could require to be pressed. I shall probably have occasion shortly to instruct you to make a formal demand on this subject; and it will, therefore, be necessary that you should prepare the way for a discussion, the result of which, if unfavourable, must lead to a public communication to Parliament of the whole transaction, and to discussions the most injurious to the honour of His Imperial Majesty's Government, and the most destructive of all future connection or harmony between the two countries."

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, September 9, Lille.—"I fear the four days which have passed since the arrival of Brooks will have appeared very long ones, and I most sincerely regret that I have been forced, from want of intelligence, to keep you so long in a state of uncertainty. But, till this morning when the post brought the rédacteurs and some few letters, the accounts that came here were so vague and so unsatisfactory, that the transmitting them would only have added to your doubts. The French legation got none but through the telegraph, and these were so imperfect and evidently so partial that they could not be depended on. William and Gregory,* as you will readily believe, feel very differently on this occasion. William is dejected and uneasy. "Gregory," though sorry for Carnot, approves all that has passed. The first has spoken to me with great freedom and apparent sincerity, and declared that, if he should remain charged with the negotiation (which, however, he does not expect) and that his instructions should be altered, he certainly will resign and not become the instrument of the prolongation of war between the two countries. It is principally from his conversation, and from what I have collected from Henry that my separate dispatch is formed; their opinions may be biassed, but they are unquestionably both sensible men.

"Gregory walked with me last night during a part of the play; his manners were the same as they have been since we have begun to associate, easy and civil, and he expressed his wishes and hopes for the success of our negotiation as strong as ever. On speaking of the declaration of Duverne (who, by the way, I think deserves most richly to be hanged) he said he recollected full well, and that whatever impression that part which related to Wickham might have made at the time, he was persuaded it would make no difference as to our negotiation, since the two countries then stood in a very different situation with respect to each other from that in which they were placed by the opening of a pacific treaty. He spoke with great acrimony of Pichégu and affected to give entire credit to the conspiracy of which he and the other members stood accused. Gregory's wife, who is with him here, is a most red-hot Jacobin, and his language when he comes from her or after a conversation with William is very different.

2 o'clock.—"I this moment hear of the appointment of M. de la Croix, and I am quite at a loss how to take it. I however can have little doubt of its being a bad omen, but as I shall speak my sentiments fully on it in a separate despatch it is unnecessary to repeat them here.

8 o'clock.—"I was much surprised about half an hour ago by a visit from M. le Tourneur; he has for some time past been very civil, but I think really more so than usual since the late event at Paris. The nature of his visit was to apologise for not having it in his power to give me, as he promised this morning, a copy of the whole declaration of Duverne, which he said he had lent to an acquaintance who had left Lille and carried it with him. He also acquainted me with the election of Francois Neufchateau, but was quite silent as to appointment of M. de la Croix which I learnt from Henry.

"It sometimes occurs to me that Melvil may have been really employed, and that the arrival of M. de la Croix and the civilities of Gregory may have some connection with his commission.

Postscript.—"M. le Tourneur, on speaking of that part of Duverne's declaration which relates to Wickham, said that he was sure it was quite forgotten by the Directory; that at the time they considered it as the natural conduct of a country at war with them; that, at present, no recrimination should be heard of, no reference to past animosity. Passons l'éponge sur tout cela, et occupons nous seulement de finir notre besogne de la bonne manière; these were his words, and they were almost as extraordinary in his mouth as when he called a few moments afterwards the General Vandamme, parfois trop républicain, une tête trop exaltée; expressions at which Colchen who was with him stared as much as I was disposed to do."

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, September 9, Lille, 11.0 p.m.—"I forgot to mention in my private letter that I believe 'Robert' is arrested, but he is not in possession of a single paper or proof of any kind. I fortunately stopped fifty Louis I was going to remit him on Tuesday evening, just in time."

THE EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, September 9, Berlin.—"There are particularities attending the communication which Count Panin has made me that merit your Lordship's notice. It is impossible to shew more manliness in his private sentiments, or more candour in his confidence than was evident in his conversations with me. But independent of a degree of awkwardness, which is to be attributed to his having never before been in a foreign mission, he labours under much uneasiness from an apprehension that he differs in opinion with some of the Emperor's principal advisers, and may, in the present instance, ultimately find his impressions not supported at Petersburg. Your Lordship is doubtless no stranger to the intrigue which occasioned Count Panin's coming here; namely, the recall of M. Kotchubey from Constantinople, for whom he was to make place in the college of foreign affairs. Besides, he is equally dissatisfied with the conduct of the Prussian Ministers, and with the system of Prussia in regard to France, and these circumstances cannot fail to give him a great degree of diffidence, especially as he has no instructions from Russia applicable, in his judgment, to the present situation of France and of the negotiations. I am therefore suspicious that Count Panin has, more from embarrassment than from any wish on his part, withheld part of what has passed with M. Caillard and M. Haugwitz; not, probably, in regard to the issue, but to the motives which have hurried him so much in this transaction. They are, indeed, less material in themselves, but they are connected with the plan which M. Haugwitz appears to have formed (on a knowledge of Count Panin's character and situation) for counteracting his extreme horror and aversion to France. Count Haugwitz not only shews him a very studied attention, but I am assured M. Alopcœus comes to pass the winter at Berlin, which can be in no view but that of checking Count Panin's natural impressions.

"It were presumption in me to touch upon the internal affairs of Russia were I not in the persuasion that your Lordship may wish to know the opinions of one who, like Count Panin, has been a member of administration since the commencement of this reign. It has accidentally come to [my] knowledge that he is sincerely grieved with what is going on there, and dreads the consequences which the whims and inconsiderate changes, so unfortunately persevered in, appear likely to produce on all descriptions of people in Russia.

"I beg further to recommend to your Lordship's consideration whether you have any mode of encouraging the disposition which Count Panin has now shewn of being on a footing of intimate confidence with me."

LORD GRENVILLE to the EARL OF ELGIN.

Private.

1797, September 9, Cleveland Row.—In cipher.—"It is on every account very fortunate that Count Panin has begun his mission with such favourable dispositions for concert and confidence with you, and with so just impressions of the present system of the Court of Berlin. You certainly cannot do better than to cultivate these sentiments by every attention in your power, and by a return of openness and confidence on your part. In the present moment I am not aware of any particular means of shewing attention to Count Panin, but, if any should occur to you, I should be glad to be informed of it."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MALMESBURY.

Private.

1797, September 11, Cleveland Row.—"You may easily imagine the anxiety in which your dispatches have left us respecting the final result of this new revolution in France. I fear that it would be reasoning in a very sanguine manner indeed to expect that it can be favourable to the interests of humanity either there or elsewhere, but one is lost in speculations on the course of such events. The imbecility of the Councils, and particularly of those who conducted what was called the moderating system in the Conseil des Anciens, is that which strikes one most on first view of this extraordinary transaction; but it is not the first time that a minority, composed of desperate men acting in concert, have, during the course of the French Revolution, overpowered a much larger number of individuals disunited and distracted in all their views and counsels. The only thing which seems certain as to the future is that there is more to come, but what that is to be, I take it, is far beyond the reach of human prescience.

"As to our part in this transaction, it is most likely that a few days will now assign it to us clearly and unequivocally. I have but little hope of good; but I would not on any account suffer that opinion to influence our measures, or to induce us to omit any rational means of obtaining the end of peace which I had begun to think much nearer in prospect than I can now flatter myself it is.

"As soon as your dispatches arrive, I will send Lord G. Leveson back to you."

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 11, Lille.—“You will forgive me if I make my private letter of to-day very short. I really am very sorry to lose my French colleagues, though in fact the mischief was irreparably done from the moment the last great event took place at Paris.

“It is quite unaccountable what is become of M. de la Croix. Letters came here directed to him, and both MM. le Tournour and Maret were in hourly expectation of him Saturday evening and yesterday; and it was the certainty of his arrival which made them assert so positively that the business would begin in earnest to-day. Le Tournour, who is certainly very ill-used on this occasion, bears his recall with less temper than the others, and his wife is outrageous. The others are deeply affected since it is a complete overthrow of their fortunes, but they carry it off better.

“William, who expects to keep up his intimacy with Edward,* has promised to keep me confidentially informed of all that passes through Henry; and, if our business last long, which I much doubt, this will be of very great service.”

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797.—September 11, Downing Street.—“In transmitting to your Majesty the despatches received this morning from Lisbon, Lord Grenville thinks it his duty to add to what Mr. Walpole states, that he has this day seen M. d’Almeida, who read to him a dispatch from M. de Pinto, in which the latter expressly says that, as the article respecting the reception of no more than six British ships in the ports of Portugal was contrary to the treaties existing between Great Britain and Portugal, it had been determined not to ratify that engagement, but to refer it to subsequent negotiation with France.

“Your Majesty will see by Lord Malmesbury’s dispatches the details of what has passed at Paris, and the appointment of M. de la Croix, which seem very unfavourable to the success of the negotiation.

“Lord Grenville has made enquiry respecting the secret box which was brought to your Majesty in so torn a state, and the messenger declares in the most particular manner that it was done by an accident in the coach seat on his journey to Weymouth. He has been ordered to be more careful of the boxes in future.”

Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, September 12, Cleveland Row.—“Lord Grenville has the honour to inform your Majesty that he has this day seen M. Balan, who communicated to him the wish of the King of Prussia that the Prince of Orange might receive at the general peace, not only a full indemnity for his private property, but also, if the principle of secularization in Germany is admitted, some territorial acquisition, with which view the King of Prussia had entered into the eventual engagement with France contained in the convention of the 5th of August 1796; and that His Prussian Majesty, in directing these particulars to be communicated to your Majesty’s servants, wished to know how far these ideas were conformable to those entertained by your Majesty.

“Lord Grenville answered that the claim of pecuniary compensation for the loss of property belonging to the House of Orange was founded on the most evident principles of justice, and had, as such, been included in the proposals directed to be made by your Majesty's Minister, and that the representations of His Prussian Majesty, if he should judge proper to direct them to be made at Paris, in support of that demand, could not but be advantageous to the interests of the Prince of Orange.

"That with respect to the second point, your Majesty did not think proper to authorise any particular assurances to be given, because it did not yet appear that there would be any question of secularizations in settling the peace of the Empire, and because your Majesty's wishes must be that the constitutional integrity of the Empire should be maintained. But that if the contrary should happen, your Majesty would certainly see with pleasure any favourable effects which might arise for the advantage of the House of Orange from the adoption of that mode of settling the peace of the Empire."

Copy.

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 12, [Hill Street].—"I don't trouble you with any reflexions upon the late events in France, of which in our present position we must be content, I fear, to remain idle though not unconcerned spectators. It is the effect of bad play to forfeit the benefit of those occasions which chance from time to time may cause to arise. But there is one attempt that may be made at so little expense that it may be worth the trial, however doubtful or inconsiderable the advantage may be resulting from it. The merits and value of Pichégu appear to be such, as well as of some of his companions, as may make it desirable that he should be saved from exile in Guiana; and I should think that, with good management, we might obtain sufficient information of the time of their sailing, to have a chance of rendering to them the same service that the French attempted for their friends Muir and Gerald and the rest of them. Should Pichégu's intentions be as good as they have sometimes appeared, it is to be wished that he should owe such an obligation to this country. But, at all events, the capture of a French vessel will do us no harm, nor the turning loose into Europe such an enemy of the present French Government.

"A mail, I understand, is arrived from Lisbon. I hope, if they take the course that is to be wished, we shall exert better means than have hitherto been employed, for recruiting our foreign force in that quarter, or rather shall remove those obstructions which Stuart had raised, and which prevented its being recruited, at least to its present establishment, long ago. I cannot help again repeating my wishes that, if we are to have an officer in that country, Mulgrave may be the person, who I am persuaded is, in every view, the man most proper for that situation. A man so improper as the present (or late) one is hardly to be found, I conceive, in the whole army list."

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 12, Althorp.—"It has been suggested to me that it would be right that, when the compliment of the Order of the Bath is paid to Admiral Harnikoff, a sword or something of that kind should be given to Rear-Admiral Mackaroff, who was his second in command and who remained Commander in-Chief for a little while, and I think another of less value to Rear-Admiral Taitt, who was third in command of the auxiliary squadron. If you approve of this, it might be as well to enable Woronzow to notify the whole together, which I understand he might do, if he were apprized of it before Friday's mail. Should this strike you in the same light, will you be so good as to direct either Hammond or Canning to communicate with Nepean on the subject; the exact value or pattern of the swords need not perhaps be fixed immediately. I am the rather inclined to propose this, as I understand that Mackaroff is rather more popular, both in Russia and with Woronzow, than the Vice-Admiral was.

"Being on the subject of compliments, I really think that some notice should be taken (but I don't exactly know the proper mode) of the Spanish Governor of Santa Cruz who behaved so well to our people after the treaty they made for retreating to their ships.

"I suppose you will soon be calling me up to town again. I cannot help feeling very reluctant at leaving this place, but, at all events, even if I have not a summons from you before, I shall be in town on Monday next."

Endorsed by Lord Grenville.—"This is conformable to the ideas I entertain on the subject and I wish therefore that it should be settled with Mr. Nepean.

"The time of sending over the Bath insignia to the admiral seems the proper moment for also sending the swords.

"I think it will at all events be necessary to send a star or badge for the admiral of about 400*l.* or 500*l.* value; and if the swords are 300*l.* and 200*l.* value, it would be quite enough. But the whole of this ought, I think, to be done by the Admiralty rather than out of the civil list, which can but ill bear extra charge of this nature."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1797, September 12, Cleveland Row.—"J'ai reçu votre billet au moment de partir. Si je pourrais voir quelque utilité aux discussions dont vous me parlez, je me serais néanmoins arrangé pour avoir le plaisir de vous recevoir ce matin comme vous me le proposez. Malheureusement après le résultat de nos dernières ouvertures à Vienne, tout ce que je pourrais vous dire serait évidemment des paroles jettées en l'air. Je serais de retour d'ici en deux ou trois jours au plus tard, et si, en attendant, vous avez quelque communication à me faire d'une nature différente de ce qui a été dit au Chevalier Eden, je serais toujours à vos ordres; si non, ce sera alors sat cito si sat bene.

"Croyez toujours, je vous supplie, au très sincère et invariable attachement personnel que je vous ai voué."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 13, Weymouth.—"Lord Grenville has acted very properly in assuring M. Balan of the good inclination here to having the Prince of Orange and his family fully indemnified in money for the loss of their patrimony and situation in the Dutch Republic; but the not having encouraged any idea of support in obtaining the secularization of some bishopricks in Germany in lieu of his losses. I certainly, as Elector, shall do my utmost to prevent any unjust arrangements of that kind. Holland, not Germany, ought to provide for the House of Orange, and, in failure of the latter, England, out of the acquisitions to be obtained in the East Indies from the Dutch."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797, September 15, York Farm.]—"J'ai reçu le billet amical que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'écrire. Mes sentimens, ma manière de voir et de juger les choses, et mon attachement personnel à ce pays-ci et à vous m'en ont rendu la lecture bien cruelle. Je ne me permets aucune réflexion. Vous devez être trop prévenu vous-même pour les écouter. Je me borne à vous prier (d'ainsi que votre amitié s'y est engagé) de me prévenir de la mesure queiconque que vous prendrez, et au moment où vous vous déciderez. Permettez-moi cependant de vous observer que tout parti violent serait dangereux en ce que, I, il ne vous fera pas obtenir ce que vous désirez; et II, qu'en le prenant vous nous liez avec la France et, encore une fois, bien malgré nous. Je pourrais en dire davantage sur ce point si je connaissais plus à fond nos projets du moment, dont je n'ai qu'un léger hint, et dont, par conséquent, je ne puis pas parler avec certitude, mais qui pourraient encore être de nature à étonner le monde, et à arracher l'admiration de ceux qui sont le plus prévenus contre nous. Vous allez bouleverser tout cela si ce grand objet existe. Il ne m'appartient pas de décider de ce que vous avez à dire au Parlement, mais ne pourriez-vous pas y dire les faits sans y annoncer déjà l'exécution d'une sorte de vengeance en vérité peu digne de vous, et, selon moi, bien déplacée dans la circonstance."

French.

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 19, Dover.—"I am this moment landed, but shall not be able to reach London till to-morrow about the middle of the day. I have barely time to write these very few words as the post is waiting. The dispatch which accompanies this I wrote on the passage. It is not a very material one, but it appeared to me that something of the sort was wanting to complete the history of this last mission."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, September 21, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville begs leave humbly to submit to your Majesty the draft of a note from Lord Malmesbury to the French plenipotentiaries at Lisle, which was this day settled at the meeting of your Majesty's servants, and which Lord Grenville trusts is calculated to place the business in its true light in the public opinion here."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 22, Windsor.—"The draft of a note from Lord Malmesbury to the French plenipotentiaries at Lisle seems to me so perfectly drawn to place the transaction in its true light, that it certainly meets with my fullest approbation."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 25, York Farm.—"J'ai écrit à ma Cour précisément dans le sens dont nous sommes convenus. C'est la septième fois que je parle le même langage, puisse-t-il faire plus d'effet aujourd'hui. Je me rendrai à vos ordres mardi prochain, et je vous apporterai ma dépêche pour vous en faire la lecture. Je désirerais s'il était possible que vous me vissiez avant midi, pour que j'ai le temps d'ajouter, rétrancher, ou changer ce que vous jugerez à propos."

French.

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 29 [London].—"I send you a corrected copy of my last dispatch, No. 37, from Lisle, in which I have inserted a fuller account of what passed in my second interview with MM. Treilhard and Bonnier.

"On reading over what I wrote to you from Calais it strikes me as being much fitter for a private than for an official letter, and I wish you would be so good as to withdraw it from my public correspondence.

"If you do want me, I propose going to Park Place to-morrow at eleven, but I shall return to London for the levée on Wednesday."

LORD MALMESBURY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, September 30, Spring Garden.—"I am happy to find that you think the dispatch in its present state will convey a more satisfactory account to the public of what passed during the last period of my stay at Lisle, than if it had been printed from the copy which I first sent, and which I had drawn up in great haste.

"Your remark on the passage which you doubled down is most perfectly just. I think the words, in their note, should be omitted entirely, and that the sentence should run thus; I replied that, having now no doubt left on my mind as to their exact meaning, and being quite sure, notwithstanding the observation they made, que j'avais saisi la véritable intention de leur note, — and so on.

"I put these words in French because they are precisely the same as are used by them in their second note, E, of the 30th Fructidor, and evidently with a view to shift from themselves, and fix on me, the refusal to continue the negotiation.

"In regard to the extent of the intended publication, I am well aware that my private feelings may bias my judgment, and I had much rather trust entirely to yours than argue from my own. The only suggestion I will allow myself to make is whether, in some passages at least, the names of Le Tourneur, Maret, and Colchen could not be omitted, and the words French plenipotentiaries inserted in their stead; the sense would remain the same, and, I should conceive, none of its force be lost by such an alteration. I am the more anxious for it on account of Maret and Colchen. They have enemies in the Directory who may avail themselves of this circumstance in a way which may be fatal to them."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, October 4, Windsor.—"Lord Grenville will, I imagine, think it right that Lord Malmesbury should write a few lines, in answer to the strange paper received yesterday, to close the negotiation by stating that it is the unheard pretension of the plenipotentiaries, as authorized by the Directory, that had ended his mission, not any irregularity from his Court."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

Secret.

1797, October 7, Sittingbourne.—"I enclose to you four papers which Dundas brought to me at Hollwood this morning. They contain an answer to the secret overture such as (if it could be depended upon) amounts to yielding all we wish on the great points of Ceylon and the Cape.

"The first letter, however, of the 30th September (written not by the person who was here, but by his friend before he had reached Paris) is the only thing like a fresh voucher of the authenticity of the communication. It is, however, a strong one, as it contains an accurate statement written on last Saturday, of the note which we received from Lisle on the Tuesday following, by a very expeditious conveyance, and after a very short stop at Lisle. I do not, however, consider this proof as conclusive. But the offer (if it is real) seemed both to Dundas and me so tempting, and the time pressed so much to an hour (lest an answer should be given in the interval to our last note which would preclude all chance) that we did not hesitate to desire Boyd to write to his correspondent immediately to the purport of the enclosed memorandum. If there had been time, I should certainly not have taken the step without first communicating with you, and if there were anything left for consultation after having taken it, till the result appears, I should not have adhered to my plan of going to Walmer, to which I am now in my road. I must trouble you to return the papers as I have no copies of them."

"I think the answer will come by the end of next week. If it amounts to anything we shall, of course, immediately come to town."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1797, October 8, Dropmore.—"I have just received your letter with its enclosures which I return you as you desire. I cannot deny to you that the whole of that transaction is so disagreeable to my mind that I am very glad to have been saved the necessity of deciding upon it; though I do not know that I could ultimately have brought myself to say that, under all the circumstances, we should have been justified towards the country in rejecting such an offer, and running all the chances of what is to come, however favourable, in many respects, I think them. Still, when I think of Europe abandoned without defence of any kind to these monsters, of the Netherlands, Holland, and Italy left in their hands, of Germany revolutionized, and of the little hope we can have of any permanent tranquility in the midst of all this wreck and convulsion of everything around us, I shudder at what we are doing, and believe in my conscience that, if this country could but be brought to think so, it would be ten thousand times safer (and cheaper too, which they seem to consider above all other things) to face the storm, than to shrink from it. And above all I dread the loss of consideration which must, I fear, infallibly result from any mode of purchasing our safety, and such this is, and will be felt to be, let us say or do what we will.

"With all this, I repeat that, upon the balance of a most doubtful scale, I believe the state of this country as to its interior to be so bad that we cannot, in strict duty, venture to reject this offer, which may, at least, give us some interval of rest for doing what we have to do at home; an interval longer or shorter as events may happen, but very long it cannot be. But, if we are forced to take this humiliating step at the very moment when the enemy seems least able to resist us, I think we are doubly bound to look closely to the conditions we are to obtain. On that head there are three points which have, I am afraid, been a little overlooked in the memorandum. The first is that a sort of promise is held out that Lord M[almesbury] shall be sent back to Lisle with no other security for his future treatment than results from the private understanding established, and from a general statement to be made by the D[irectory] that they are satisfied with our explanations about his powers, and consent to renew the negotiation without any preliminary condition. How can you fulfil this assurance after what is said in the conclusion of our last note? Will it not be absolutely necessary that there should be some ostensible assurance on this part of the subject? Otherwise in what situation do we stand, suppose the whole thing to fail at last by the caprice, or timidity, or want of power of those with whom we have to deal?

"The next point relates to the terms, in which all mention of Trinidad, or other compensation from Spain, is omitted, though our first memorandum was drawn with the express object of including all the demands of Lord M[almesbury's] projet. It is, I think, by no means an indifferent matter, on many accounts, that Spain should be forced to this or some other equivalent sacrifice, and we are sure that it is much easier for the Directory to do this, than to make good the other part of their offer.

"The third point relates to what I conceive to be a quite new demand on their part, that of stipulating for the manner in which other nations, not parties to the treaty, nor invited to accede to it, shall be treated at the Cape and Ceylon; a very inconvenient stipulation in point of effect, if France is to be the guaranty to all the world of our conduct to them in our own territories; but perhaps still worse in point of appearance, because it admits and recognizes that very principle of stipulating for neutral nations which we thought ourselves bound so peremptorily to resist in the very outset. And it has the further inconvenience of taking from our scale and throwing into that of France the greatest favour which we have to give to America in return for commercial advantages.

"The expression of grand canal, I should fear, is not rightly decyphered. If it applies to Newfoundland, which is possible, the demand to the extent then made would be wholly inadmissible; nor, when we are treating upon the footing now in question, can there be any pretence for any concession at all on that subject, which, if it was ever so harmless, would not fail to be misrepresented by a very discontented body of men, as we have always found the Newfoundland merchants. But if this article really does relate to India, I fear the effect would be worse, because it would exactly overthrow the whole result of our convention in 1787, which, you will remember, we very studiously covered by the general terms of our projet.

"I conclude that it is upon reflection that you have omitted all mention of the Continent and even of Portugal. The latter certainly cannot be ultimately passed over, because of the many assurances we have given to the Court of Lisbon that we will, at least, bear them harmless against any consequences of their late conduct. Upon the former I have hardly a hope of your thinking as I do, and therefore I do not dwell upon it.

"On the whole I cannot consistently with truth say that I wish this thing to succeed; but, if it is to be thrown in our way, I incline to think that we shall not be quite justified in refusing it; though, certainly for one, I shall take my part in it very reluctantly; multo gemens ignominiam, plagasque superbi victoris, tum quos amisit inultus honores.

"I heartily hope Walmer will be of essential benefit to you, and that you will be able to make up your mind to all these gloomy reflections and dismal prospects with more cheerfulness than I do. But above all that, if this thing is to be done, it will only be as the means of taking that tone and establishing that system at home which can alone save us from what I think will then be a very near danger of running the same course as the French Government did. We shall have many opportunities to discuss this matter in detail, but if you reflect upon it in all its parts, and with the attention which its importance deserves, I think our conclusions can hardly be different."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, October 9, Dropmore.—"Je n'ai reçu qu'hier-au-soir votre billet par lequel vous me demandiez une conférence pour la matinée d'hier. J'avais quitté la ville avant-hier, ayant laissé avec M. Canning des ordres pour vous communiquer les notes qui terminent, à ce que je suppose, notre besogne en fait de négociation pacifique.

"Je conclus d'après ce que j'apprens de Vienne, quoique je ne le sais pas positivement, qu'à Udine les choses se sont passées à peu près comme à Lille. Ainsi, voilà l'Europe replongée dans une nouvelle lutte contre le Jacobinisme ressuscité. Au commencement de cette année-ci, on pouvait encore espérer que votre Cour nous aiderait à opposer une digue à ce torrent dévastateur. Cet espoir s'est évanoui comme bien d'autres, et il ne nous reste que notre fermeté qui, j'ose vous assurer, ne nous manquera pas, et la chance, plus ou moins éloignée, de rétablir un concert avec la Cour de Vienne, si cette dernière peut enfin se convaincre que ce n'est pas en trompant et soi-même et ses amis, qu'on parvient à se sauver dans des moments de crise.

"Je ne sais pas si vous aviez peut-être quelque autre objet sur lequel vous auriez voulu me parler; si cela est, vous n'avez qu'à me le mander, et je serai toujours à vos ordres."

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, October 12, Admiralty.—"I should not have troubled you with a letter on the subject of this if you had been in town yesterday, but I now enclose it, because an early determination is pressed for. The enclosed is an extract of a chapter in the proposed work of Captain Vancouver relative to his survey on the north-west coast of America, and he is anxious to know whether there will be any objection on the part of Government to his publishing that part of it which relates to the taking possession of the country (the part is marked with a pencil). As I am entirely unacquainted with the subject to which the answer to this question relates, I know of no better way than to submit it to you for your sentiments upon it, and shall be glad to know them as soon as is convenient, as he is anxious to proceed with the printing of his book.

"We have heard nothing further to-day of any consequence from Duncan; he was close off the Texel on Tuesday night, and of course between the Dutch fleet and that port, but I suppose if they hear of his being at sea, they will get into some of the other Dutch ports.

"Is Tom Grenville with you? I have no idea what can be become of him."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797], October 13, Walmer Castle.—"We have received a communication from our private channel which (if authentic) contains a contre-projet which will enable us to bring the business shortly to a decisive issue. But it requires much explanation and discussion, especially after the new arguments Duncan has put into our hands. We mean therefore to be in town on Sunday before dinner, and I trust you will be able to meet us on that day. You will find dinner in Downing Street. We may have a Cabinet, if necessary, on Monday morning, and I hope to be able to get part of the way here again in the course of that day. The Dutch pretensions must, I think, be a little lowered. Minuet furorem vix una sospes navis."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, October 13, Richmond.—"Je me réjouis bien sincèrement avec vous, avec tous les bons Anglais, et avec tous les honnêtes gens de l'univers, de la belle et si importante victoire que le digne amiral Duncan vient de remporter.

"Rien n'est plus heureux que cette affaire, si glorieuse pour la bonne cause. Cela mettra de l'eau dans le vin de la vanité Française et fera comparaitre très glorieusement l'administration à la prochaine ouverture du Parlement.

"Je vous en fais mes compliments du fond de mon ame."

French.

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, October 16, Cleveland Row.—"Je vous suis infiniment obligé pour vos félicitations sur la victoire de l'Admiral Duncan, qui n'a pas tardé à se montrer digne de la marque de distinction que l'Empereur lui a accordé. J'aurais voulu de toute mon ame que les vaisseaux Russes eussent été là pour partager son triomphe, après avoir partagé si longtemps ses fatigues.

"Voilà l'aile droite de l'invasion assez complètement battue. Dieu veuille que les deux autres alliés fussent le même essai."

French. Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1797, October 16, Cleveland Row.—"Mille graces pour vos félicitations sur la brillante victoire de Duncan. Son capitaine est arrivé aujourd'hui avec les détails qui sont réellement superbes. Il m'est aussi arrivé une dépêche de Vienne par laquelle je vois que l'on était encore dans l'incertitude sur le résultat de la négociation à Udine, où le Marquis de Gallo restait toujours. Peut-être que nos marins du North Sea y contribueront sans le savoir."

French. Copy.

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, October 18, Walmer Castle.—"We received yesterday fresh communications from the same secret channel, with another copy of the contre-projet you saw, and an assurance that the negotiation may still be renewed if, any time within twelve days from last Friday, we announce that Lord M[almesbury] will return with the full powers required either to Lisle or Bruxelles, and if he sets out as immediately afterwards as possible, without waiting for an answer. It seems implied, but is not quite expressly said, that the French Plenipotentiaries would remain during the interval; and a disposition is held out to facilities on the subject of the Toulon ships, and assurances of all sorts of égards to Lord M[almesbury]. But details seem of little consequence, as the communication neither is accompanied, nor promises to be followed by any fresh mark of authenticity (previous to his setting out, such as we had required) nor by any ostensible act on the part of the French Government to justify Lord M[almesbury's] return, and it pointedly insists on his being announced to have the unlimited power to treat on the basis proposed by France, though it states that he may, in his first conference, say peremptorily that he is bound to insist on compensations, and that this will be admitted. It is of course impossible to entertain an idea of stirring a step on such grounds. Our present idea is to send a memorandum to that effect, recapitulating what we have throughout required as an inducement to entertain the proposal: namely, clear proof of its authenticity; some conciliatory step on the part of France sufficient to account for Lord M[almesbury's] return; and a certainly that any further question about powers would be waived, that they would treat on the ground of compensations, and be ready to conclude immediately (if Lord M[almesbury] returned) on terms previously agreed upon. If they are at all in earnest, their plenipotentiaries will probably have staid beyond to-morrow, and we may still hear from them again; but I own I have no faith left in the transaction. At all events, I think it seems necessary to publish the manifesto as speedily as possible, adding a paragraph respecting the official notes exchanged since Lord M[almesbury's] return, and declaring our readiness, even now (since our victory), to adhere to the terms of our projet. And this, I should think, cannot be too soon followed by a separate proposal (on the same principle both to Holland and to Spain, particularly the former). I shall be very glad if you can send the manifesto as soon as you have completed it, which I think will not take you long."

FINANCIAL MINUTE by W. PITT.

1797, October 25 [Downing Street].—"Supposing the war to be protracted for another campaign beyond 1798, the amount of the supply for 1799, beyond the ordinary peace expenditure, may be estimated at 19,000,000*l*.*

"This sum may be provided thus:—

"To be furnished by the bank (besides postponing the payment of any part of the 4,000,000 l . advanced in 1798)	-	-	-	-	-	1,000,000 l .
"The amount of the treble assessed taxes, and the others imposed in 1798 (after defraying the interest of the loan of that year) to be subscribed by the Commissioners of the National Debt towards the loan of 1799	-	-	-	-	-	8,000,000 l .
"To be borrowed by loan	-	-	-	-	-	10,000,000 l .
Total	-	-	-	-	-	19,000,000 l .

"The sum of 8,000,000*l*. arising from the taxes of 1798, is here proposed to be subscribed by the Commissioners for the National Debt towards the loan of 1799, as a simpler mode than applying it to the redemption of an equal quantity of the 3 per cents., and increasing the loan of 1799 by that amount. The effect as to the whole quantity of stock in the market must be the same.

* This is 2,000,000*l*. less than for 1798, because it is presumed there will be little or no excess of navy debt or of army extraordinaries 1798 (beyond the sum allowed for), to be provided for in 1799.—W.P.

"According to this plan, at the end of 1799 the whole quantity of stock (supposing the loans raised at the price of 50) occasioned by two years of war, which will have been created subsequent to the last loan for 1797 (which came into the market in March or April 1797), will have been—making together 36,000,000*l*. capital.

"For 1798 - - - - - 16,000,000*l*.

"But by the operation of the present sinking fund (at the same price of 50) in the same period, a quantity of 3 per cent. stock [will be cancelled ?] as follows :—

"In the 3 quarters of 1797 - - - - - 6,000,000*l*.

"In 1798 - - - - - about 8,000,000*l*.

"In 1799 - - - - - near 9,000,000*l*.

Making together - - - - - 23,000,000*l*.

"The difference between this sum and 36,000,000*l*. amounting to 13,000,000*l*. will form the whole excess of capital debt existing at the end of 1799, beyond that existing in April 1797.

"Supposing the war to terminate at the end of 1799, the capital of twenty millions (supposed to be created for the loan of that year) will be extinguished by prolonging the taxes of 9,000,000*l*. (subject to the payment of interest in the interval) for a period of from one year and a quarter to one and three-quarters (according as the 3 per cents. are supposed to be redeemed at 50 or at 75) after the extinction of the 16,000,000*l*. created by the loan of 1797. And the whole capital of debt will then be as much reduced below its amount in April 1797, as it would have been if no loans had taken place in 1798 or 1799. In like manner, if the war is continued at the same rate of expense for the year 1800, if the taxes are continued and applied in the same manner, and the repayment to the Bank postponed till the peace, the additional sum to be raised by loan will be 11,000,000*l*., creating a capital of 22,000,000*l*. There will have been paid off in the course of 1800, a capital of about 9,000,000*l*. by the former sinking fund. Consequently the increase of funded debt at the end of 1800, beyond that in April 1797, will be 26,000,000*l*. The additional capital of 22,000,000*l*. for the loan of this year will require (on the same suppositions as stated for 1799) the prolongation of the taxes for a further period of from one year and four months to near two years.

"On a similar supposition for 1801, there will be a further additional capital of 22,000,000*l*., while rather more than 9,000,000*l*. will have been paid off, making the excess in the whole about 45,000,000*l*., and the taxes to extinguish the additional capital must be again prolonged for a further period of from one year and four months to nearly two years.

"Thus the continuance of the war for 1798 only, creates an additional capital which would not otherwise have existed of 16,000,000*l*., but an excess beyond that in April 1797 only of about 2,000,000*l*. And it requires the continuing the taxes proposed for about two years and an half (or somewhat more according as the stocks rise on the peace) to repay the 4,000,000*l*. to the bank, and redeem a capital equal to that created by the loan. At the end of this period the taxes may cease, and the whole capital debt (from the operation of the former sinking fund) will be near 14,000,000*l*. less than in April in 1797.

"For 1799 the capital created will be 20,000,000*l.*; the whole excess at the end of 1799 beyond 1797, 13,000,000*l.*; the prolongation of the taxes for two years and a quarter, or two years and three-quarters further, making in the whole from 4½ years to 5½ years (dated from January 1798). After which period, the whole capital will be less than in 1797 by 23,000,000*l.*

"In 1800 and 1801, respectively, the new capital created will be 22,000,000*l.* The excess at the end of 1800 will be 26,000,000*l.*; of 1801, it will be 39,000,000*l.* Each year will require the prolongation of the taxes for near two years and a half or 3 years more; making a prolongation (for 1800) in the whole, of from 7 years to 8½ years; and for 1801, from 9½ years to 11½ years, from January 1798. At the end of the first period the whole capital will be less than in 1797 by near 32,000,000*l.*, and of the second, by near 41,000,000*l.*"

SIR MORTON EDEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, November 1, Vienna.—"I was so much pressed for time on the day that I sent the messenger Wiffin back to England, that I had it not in my power to thank your Lordship for your two private letters by Mr. Sevrigh; and more particularly for the very obliging manner in which your Lordship was pleased to express yourself relative to my application for the Irish peerage. On this subject I will not at present trouble your Lordship further than to express my hopes that, though your Lordship does not think proper at this moment to lay at His Majesty's feet my most humble request, yet that your Lordship will be so good as to do it at a convenient time, and to support it with your powerful protection.

"I have little to add to what I have said in my public despatches of this day. M. de Thugut talked again on Monday of his disgust with his situation, and of his determination to retire from it immediately; but, as the accomplishment of the treaty of Udine depends on the conclusion of the peace of the Empire, and cannot consequently be looked upon as definitive, I presume that he will, conformably to a promise which I have reason to believe that he has given to the Emperor, retain his place till after the congress of Rastadt. He has to different persons, with whom he does not even live in habits of intimacy, expressed his disapprobation of the treaty of Udine, and his apprehensions of its consequences; and, though the news arrived here early on the morning of the 22nd past, he did not see the Emperor, who was only at Lachen, till the evening of the 24th. Count Cobenzl will, I believe, be his successor. If it be fair to judge from M. de Thugut's language relative to the treaty of Udine, it may be doubted whether M. de Cobenzl possesses those talents and energy of character necessary for the situation in which he will be placed, more particularly in the arduous circumstances in which this country must still remain. I shall fear that that influence which brought about the signature of the preliminary articles, and the subsequent measures, will, on M. de Thugut's retiring from office, meet with no opposition.

"M. de Gallo is returned hither. He also censures the treaty of Udine, and M. de Thugut; and says that, if that Minister had not thwarted him, he would, at Montebello, have concluded a treaty on more honourable and permanent conditions."

T. PELHAM to ———.

Private.

1797, November 2, Phoenix Park.—“I have received a letter from Elliot informing me that you apprehend an attack from the Opposition in England upon the conduct of the army in this country, and that you wished to be acquainted with any particular instances of misconduct which might be noticed.

“It cannot be denied that some things have been done which are to be regretted. At the same time, I believe that no army ever behaved better under similar circumstances, and I will venture to say that no army was ever placed in exactly the same situation; and, with regard to the British troops, I can assure you that they are not only sought for by those who want protection, but even those who by their conduct expose themselves to any military vigour, acknowledge the humanity of the British soldiers.

“The destruction of the Northern Star at Belfast, and the attack upon Mr. Gregg’s house at the same town by the soldiers of the Monaghan militia, are outrages not to be justified, and were punished. At the same time, when it is recollected that the Monaghan was reckoned the most loyal regiment in Ireland before it went to Belfast; that owing to the spirit of the Colonel, Colonel Leslie, the conspiracy was discovered, and that two men of that regiment were the first victims, it is not to be wondered at that the regiment should feel indignation at the printers of that paper which had been industriously circulated amongst them, and had corrupted so many of their comrades as well as the whole province of Ulster. Mr. Gregg is, in himself perhaps, a harmless man; but his sisters were notorious encouragers of the United Irishmen, and had sent liquor and money to the Monaghan militia men who were confined.

“The Ancient Britons, from their activity and loyalty, and particularly from the success of one dragoon who, being attacked by two men with pikes, was enabled by his dexterity in the sword exercise to parry both and kill one, soon became the terror of the disaffected, and might, in some instances, have proceeded too far; but I have written to General Lake to make particular inquiries.

“An affray in Cookstown, in which the Kerry militia were the aggressors by attacking the yeomen who wore orange ribbons in honour of the battle of the Boyne, produced very serious consequences, which became the subject of a court of inquiry. The result was that Lord Blayney, who had been entrusted with a special command, was no longer employed; and it would be difficult to say much upon that subject, for the death of two men would, according to one statement, amount to murder. But I must also confess that, in my opinion, even in the most favourable point of view towards Lord Blayney, the soldiers were suffered to act too much from resentment and feeling.

“Mr. Carter wrote to me about an article in the English papers respecting an officer of the Dumbarton Fencibles, which I answered yesterday; and the trial of Captain Frazier will justify the conduct of that officer whom the English papers have so wantonly represented as a murderer.

“It is not a thing which can be openly declared, but the fact is that, without British troops and British officers, the murders and outrages would be unrestrained. The proneness to murder is sufficiently proved in the trial of the conspirators against Lord Carhampton; the assassination of all informers is part of the system of the United Irishmen, and too many have fallen victims to it. Dunn, who was convicted of having intended to murder Lord Carhampton, acknowledged that he planned, to use his own expression, the murder of a father and son in one of Lord Carhampton's lodges; and that he actually murdered two other men who were also at Lord Carhampton's for protection.

"Since the outrages have begun in the south, one magistrate has been killed, another wounded, a constable murdered, and his limbs cut to pieces, and afterwards placed on a hill with a label in his hand threatening the same treatment to any one who should bury him. At another house, a farmer, his wife, his maid servant, and all his pigs and dogs and his poultry killed, the bowels of the farmer torn out, and a label on his belly threatening all informers.

"It is shocking either to relate or to think upon these things, nor is the barbarity of the country any justification of the soldier, and still less of the Government, if they tolerated retaliation; but it will sometimes prevail.

"Several houses have certainly been burnt in many parts of the country; but in no instance, I believe, excepting where arms and pikes have been concealed, or where the troops have been attacked.

"If I thought that any serious attack was intended upon the Irish Government, I should be very glad to come over and defend myself in my place, at least; and if I were not afraid of increasing the jealousies of the two countries, I should have no objection to carry the war into the enemies' quarters.

"I will write again when I have received General Lake's report."

EARL CAMDEN TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, November 3, Dublin Castle.—"I am told it is intended to bring before the English Parliament the state of Ireland, and the supposed atrocities which have been practised by the military, and countenanced by Government.

"So much delicacy exists in treating of Irish affairs in the British Parliament, that I have frequently taken notice that Ministers have answered the observations upon the state of this kingdom with the remark, that those considerations are out of the province of the English Parliament. As long as these observations assume a general form, and no specific charges are made, such perhaps is the wisest mode of meeting them. But if, in support of such assertions, facts are attempted to be brought, those facts, if not contradicted, will be generally believed.

"I have, therefore, thought it necessary to furnish you with such facts and remarks as occur to me on the sudden, apprizing you that I will furnish you with more satisfactory information if you are called upon to enter into this subject. I only wish to premise that the dreadful state of this country, from the intimidation practised by the United Irishmen, made it indispensable to take strong measures, and to employ the military without waiting for the forms attendant on their acting in quiet times. I will, therefore, proceed to mention those circumstances which have come to my knowledge, and which, I suppose, can be the object of animadversion; for the policy of the measures themselves can be defended here and in England upon general grounds.

"The destruction of the printing press and other materials for the publication of the Northern Star is one of those outrages which will be most dwelt upon. The following is the account of that transaction.

The Monaghan militia was avowedly the most loyal and the best regiment of militia in Ireland. By the machinations of the United Irishmen at Belfast, many of this regiment were corrupted, in so much that it was thought necessary to execute four men who had been found guilty, by a court martial, the proceedings of which I enclose to you. By the exertions of the Colonel (Leslie) the regiment was restored to its loyalty, and, from strongly feeling the imputation that had been justly thrown upon the regiment, from a sense of the mischiefs originating from the publication of the Northern Star, and, more particularly, from the editor's refusing to publish a loyal address they had drawn up upon the occasion, a party of that regiment certainly destroyed all the writing utensils, and part of the house of the person who printed the paper; and they also destroyed the furniture of the house of a Mr. Gregg, who had been found, as well as his sister, supplying the condemned men of the Monaghan militia with food. Colonel Leslie offered to punish those who could be ascertained, but, either from confusion or from the intimidation which the adverse party at Belfast now felt, no individuals were selected. And I will fairly own to you that I was not willing to pursue with too much rigour this outrage. It did much good at the time; and to have severely punished the soldiers, when they were required to act with spirit, would have been very dangerous. There was no military punishment, but the proprietors brought an action for damages at the last assizes for Antrim. They failed however in their action.

"Information having been given to General Lake that several persons were appointed colonels of certain regiments to be raised in the counties of Down and Antrim, he ordered such colonels to be seized. One of them was described to be in the house of his brother at Ballinahinch, Lord Moira's town, and upon the brother's denying that he was there, the officer is said to have ordered the men to fire into the house, and much damage was done, and a woman, though not hurt, very much frightened. No report was made to Government upon it. But upon Lord Moira's coming to Ireland, he represented to me this outrage, and said that he would not enquire into it, if it could be construed into a peevish opposition on his part to measures which he disapproved of, but which, if adopted, were liable to such outrages being committed as he described. I requested him to have no delicacy, and to represent to me the circumstances, that they might be enquired into. I transmitted his representation to General Nugent, who reported at first that the affidavits enclosed by Lord Moira were not true; but, upon further enquiry, it was discovered the officer had probably not conducted himself properly, though it was not proved; and as Lord Moira informed me that he would be proceeded against by law, I communicated that intelligence to General Nugent, who, thereupon, made no further enquiry. No proceeding has been had against him.

"Informations had been frequently given of concealed arms, and, in many instances, those informations had not appeared to have been truly given. The continued assertions of those who gave the information, induced the commanding officers of detachments to threaten to destroy the houses of those who should be discovered to have arms concealed within them. This threat produced the arms; and the execution of it was found to produce so good an effect that, certainly, many houses have been consumed by fire; but scarcely any in which arms have not been found, and some, perhaps, where acknowledged and discovered meetings of rebels have been held. These facts happened soon after the publication of the Proclamation, and, since that time, scarcely any outrage of a nature worth detailing has been committed. It is to be observed that a remedy was in the power of the person whose property was destroyed. Actions have been brought in some cases and allowed.

"The conduct of Lord Blayney has been much the subject of conversation here. The county of Monaghan was disturbed in the most dreadful manner. Lord Blayney, who is of an old family and great property in that county, had taken a very decided line of opposition to Government, and encouraged all the ideas of reform which are made the ground of the disaffected. He was, however, convinced by the report of the Secret Committee that it was absolutely necessary to take strong measures to quell this rebellion, and offered his services as a military man. It was thought expedient to employ him. Much advantage arose from it. His neighbourhood, from his exertions, became tranquil. Many persons were taken up, and have since been punished. And although he might, perhaps, conduct himself at first with some warmth, it was thought that it would be detrimental to remove from him the command. On the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, a detachment of the Kerry militia marched through Stewart's Town in the County of Tyrone, and, as some disputes had arisen between this, which is a Catholic regiment, and the Orange men, the detachment vented their rage against the inhabitants of Stewart's Town, who were on that day ornamented with orange ribands. Several were killed on both sides, and it was not without much bloodshed the disturbance was appeased. On the next day Lord Blayney, having been informed of the disturbance, marched at the head of some dragoons to protect that part of the country through which the Kerry militia were to march, and, upon seeing one sergeant and three men of the Kerry militia drawn up, ordered, as it appears without previous enquiry as to their destination, his dragoons to attack them. The men were frightened, and ran into a barn and a house, and attempted to defend themselves; and, in the scuffle, these three men were killed. A court of enquiry was immediately held, consisting of Major-General Loftus, Lord Glandore Colonel of the Kerry militia, Lord Portarlington, Lord William Bentinck, and another officer. The result of that enquiry was a report that the Kerry militia had been the aggressors on the 12th of July, and that the misfortune which happened on the 13th, in which Lord Blayney was concerned, arose from the alarm which the men of the Kerry militia had conceived, and the subsequent confusion upon it. I desired, however, that the command should be immediately taken from so intemperate a man, which was accordingly done.

"Captain Fraser, of the Fraser Fencibles, had a verdict of murder found against him in the county of Kildare by the coroner's inquest, but this gentleman has been honourably acquitted at the assizes.

"The Duke of Leinster informed me of other atrocities committed in that county, but I enquired and found his information not supported.

"The publication of a Declaration from Lord Ancram's regiment of Light Dragoons was very absurd, but it was impossible to prevent or to punish it. A disapprobation of it has been strongly expressed to the commanding officer.

"The Ancient Britons, commanded by Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, did, on their first landing, act perhaps with too much attachment to the sword exercise which they had recently learnt; but their protection is now anxiously sought by all the gentlemen, and by the various towns and villages in the neighbourhood.

"The case of Colonel Sparrow has also been the subject of conversation. He is High Sheriff of Armagh, and was stated to have been patrolling with dragoons, and stopped Captain Lucas of the Monaghan militia, and, upon his refusing to say where he was going, ordered the dragoons to fire, who refusing, he killed him with his own hand. I heard this account, and was so shocked with it, that I wrote to General Lake to enquire into the fact. He enquired of Colonel Leslie of the Monaghan militia. From neither of them could I, at that time, obtain any accurate information upon the subject; but I since learn that Captain Lucas lived some weeks, that a meeting took place between him and Colonel Sparrow, on which the former released the latter from any suspicion of his towards him, and that no prosecution by the family has taken place.

"I think it proper to mention the case of the Dumbarton officer mentioned in the English papers, for which I beg to refer your lordship to the letter written by Mr. Pelham to Mr. Carter, a copy of which I enclose.

"I think it right also to add the case of Captain Rays of the Armagh militia, to prove that, even where an officer met with and suffered the rigour of the law, Government did not interfere. Captain Rays was by Lord Yelverton condemned to three months' imprisonment, for suffering his soldiers to shave a man supposed to have attempted to corrupt them, and to beat the 'rogues march' when he was conveyed out of camp.

"I have furnished you with these facts, if the subject is introduced, and you can make use of them if you think proper. I rely on your not suffering an imputation of cruelty and want of attention to the rights of the subject to be fastened upon my government, and I have directed more particular enquiry to be made of the generals and magistrates, in case more stress is laid on this subject than I expect.

"It is not to be denied that Government meant to strike terror. That had been the policy of the rebellious, and they had reduced many parts of the north of Ireland to such a state, that a tenant did not dare to speak to or even acknowledge his landlord. The assassination of informers and evidences have been without number; the threats the most extensive and the most dreadful. I enclose you the account of the trial of the persons convicted of the conspiracy to murder Lord Carhampton. I enclose you, also, one of the papers called the Union Star.

"An information was yesterday sent to me, an extract of which I also enclose, to show you the system endeavoured to be introduced; and I anxiously hope, if the subject is to be entertained, the state of this country may be explained; and I will venture to say that, in a kingdom like this, and in the sort of warfare we have carried on, it is wonderful that so few real grievances are to be complained of.

"I have also enclosed you the report of the Secret Committee, and the proclamation which was issued in consequence. I have confined myself merely to the supposed military grievances. Those practised by magistrates are liable to prosecution in the courts of law, and do not so loudly call for the interference of Government.

"I have sent a copy of this letter to Mr. Pitt and to the Duke of Portland.

"For the proceedings on the court martial on the Monaghan Militia men, and for the Union Star, I must refer you to the Duke of Portland."

Enclosure.

T. PELHAM to THOMAS CARTER.

1797, October 30, Dublin Castle.—“I have received your letter of the 23rd, enclosing two newspapers containing an account of a most shocking outrage committed by an officer at Kilcock. The fact I understand to be this. A lieutenant of the Dumbarton Fencibles had dined at Naas, where he made himself intoxicated. On his return to Kilcock, he set off with some of his men and apprehended with violence a person of suspicious character in the neighbourhood, and at the same time dragged away his daughter, and brought her to the guard-house. He there wanted to lie with her, which the girl refusing, he beat her violently, and called in soldiers to hold her while he attempted to ravish her. The next morning the girl came before a magistrate, and swore examinations against the officer, who was immediately apprehended, and lodged in Naas Gaol. The girl being asked whether she had been ravished, denied it to the magistrate; but, the next day on going to Dublin, an attorney drew for her another examination in which a rape was alleged. The girl went back to the magistrate to swear it, but, having taken her first examination wherein she refused to swear a rape, though particularly interrogated on that point, the magistrate declined from a sense of duty to take it.

“The business, in its best form, is very shocking, and you may be assured that proper measures will be taken to bring the officer to punishment.”

The MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 5 [Stowe].—“Ten ewes of my best breed to whom a very fine ram has been very properly attentive, together with ten more of this year's breed, and a young gentleman, who will all be forward for next year's marriage, are ready for you; and will set out as soon as you please. They will be three days on the road, and will be overtaken on the third day by my cart with 7,000 three-year-old beech, and a number of odds and ends of other plants including 1,500 two-year-old oaks, together with some pigeons and poultry for Madam. Now I wish that this cargo should arrive when you are ready to receive it; and as that may depend upon accident, I write to know whether you will be at Dropmore on Friday, Saturday, or Sunday next, that I may arrange so that they shall all assemble by the earliest moment of your arrival. But, at all events, as this is much more important than anything that can be discussed in your Cabinet, I will beg a line by return of post, that no time may be lost in arranging the march of the sheep; who at least have this advantage over anything that has marched by order of your Cabinet for the last five years, namely, that they march without a subsidy to put them in motion. I hope that your great jack arrived without accident; and, as I am very much inclined to count my chickens of this description before they are hatched, I think it not impossible that I may find for you another of the same sort (if you will let me know in time) for your dinner on the Thanksgiving Day, which I suppose is fixed for Friday next.”

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, November 8, Wimbledon.—“The subject of St. Domingo is a very difficult one; it clearly exceeds all the bounds of expense we had resolved upon, and what the country either can or will bear. I had much conversation with Mr. Pitt on the subject when we were together at Walmer. I have put the whole into the shape of despatches which, from the connexion between the different parts of the subject, should with most propriety go in joint despatches from the Duke of Portland and me. That however can be easily arranged, when the whole is agreed upon. The subject does not admit of delay. I have sent copies to the Duke of Portland, the same as those now conveyed to you. If the proposed communication is to go to France, it must go through you; but, without regard to my ideas, I wish you to look at the whole subject without bias, but there must be no delay, for every hour of delay is a source of uncalculable expense; and, after what was stated last year to the House of Commons, nothing but the depending negotiation can afford any apology for the expense which has been going forward for more than twelve months past."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 10, Queen's House.—"M. de Luc is very anxious to quit London this day as early as shall suit the convenience of Lord Grenville, thinking himself too infirm to travel all night. I have therefore undertaken to hint to Lord Grenville that he may if possible appoint M. de Luc by noon; another matter that requires some explanation is that Lord Grenville should direct him in what manner he is to address his letters to him. M. de Luc thought of enclosing them to Mr. Hammond, but I have told him that he will be acquainted of the proper channel by Lord Grenville; he is also desirous of knowing how he is to draw for his expenses. Lord Grenville will find him perfectly moderate, but he certainly is not in a situation to travel without assistance."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, November 10, Cleveland Row.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Majesty's commands. He had before appointed M. de Luc at twelve o'clock, and he has since seen him and settled everything with him for his departure. Lord Grenville has the honour to transmit to your Majesty in this box the memorandum for the Duke of Brunswick which M. de Luc takes with him."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 10, Richmond.—"Je ne puis croire que mon souverain soit aussi peu fidèle à ses engagements, et soit si impolitique que de refuser les secours qu'il est obligé de fournir à ce pays. Je suis donc persuadé qu'il fera ce qu'il doit faire, mais ne manquez pas de votre côté à certains arrangements pour hâter l'arrivée de ce secours.

"Il faut ordonner au Chevalier Whitworth qu'aussitôt que le secours sera promis, qu'il insiste qu'il soit rassemblé en Courland, et embarqué à Libau, car la mer est ouverte là au commencement de Mars, tandis qu'à Cronstat elle ne l'est qu'au mois de Mai, à Revel à la fin d'Avril, et à Riga au commencement du même mois.

"Il faut se presser d'obtenir ce point pour que les troupes aient le tems de s'assembler dans le voisinage de Libau, et que vous ayez le tems d'envoyer vos vaisseaux de transport qui doivent partir d'ici pour la côte de Courland vers la fin de Février.

"Excusez la liberté que je prends; c'est mon attachement pour ce pays qui me la fait prendre."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 11, Windsor.—"I am much pleased with the paper of instructions Lord Grenville has entrusted M. de Luc, which seems most fully to answer the purpose intended, and of the success of which I have the most sanguine hopes. I have not less commendation to express on the despatches to Russia."

W. WINDHAM to W. PITT.

1797, November 15.—"You can forgive me, I dare say, the delay of an account of which the object is to ask money. I should not, however, have delayed it so long but for the difficulty of collecting again my materials, so as to give you both the summary you wished, and to correct a mistake which I suspect to have found its way into the former account. With a view to that I will beg you, if you can readily lay your hand upon the paper, to let me have it again.

"In the meanwhile I will give you such a statement as, I conceive, will best conduce to the purpose you have in view.

"The sums required had better be distinguished into those that are due as absolute debt and on which there can be no question, and those of which part at least is matter of discretion and part even subject to future contingencies. Of the former sort the list is—

	£
"1st. Balance of an account delivered in, ending 31st December 1796 - - - - -	1,593
"2nd. Balance of an account continued to the present time - - - - -	2,127
"3rd. Arrear to persons, to whom subsistence has been granted during their occasional residence in this country - - - - -	350
"4th. Bons , being money actually paid by our authority in the interior, and due on bills accepted here -	4,124
"5th. Due for arms, which it was expected the ordnance would have paid for - - - - -	888
	<hr/> 9,082

"The accounts on which the balances Nos. 1 and 2 are due are both before you. They contain, as you will perceive, several articles of a temporary nature, and others not properly belonging to this head of service.

"The sums of the second description are first, 17,099*l.*, being the difference between the money formerly promised to the army of Brittany and the money remitted in consequence, of which, though part only may be due of strict right, I have given my reasons in the other paper why it appears to me that the whole should be ultimately paid, supposing always that the means exist of applying it fairly according to the true intent and purpose on which it was originally promised. In this view I consider whatever shall be granted in future to this part of the Royalists as going in discharge of that promise; and, accordingly, shall so set down, as soon as they are paid, the 2,000*l.* of bons which you have lately consented that Puisaye should draw from the interior.

"There are, then, a number of small objects continually occurring, too minute and anomalous to find a place or obtain attention in any other Department, yet too important to the credit, justice, and interests of the country to be left unprovided for.

"Of this sort are expenses of persons going backwards and forwards; allowance to the same during their occasional residence here; allowance to so very few, whose names were formerly given to you, and who having been long confidentially employed by us, are now wholly excluded from France, and have no means of subsistence but what this allowance affords.

"The whole of these objects, including even the expenses of Puisaye, I shall consider as very sufficiently provided for by 400*l.* a month, with a prospect even of some saving; which, if it should take place, I will apply fairly, according to the strict and rigid economy which I have always observed in this service, towards the discharge of any bons of an old date which may still come in, though certainly not to any amount, in addition to those above mentioned.

"These two sums, namely, the 17,099*l.* and the 400*l.* per month (or 4,800*l.* per year) joined to the 9,082*l.* under the first head, will make, within the course of the year commencing from this time, the sum of 30,981*l.* on which if you will give me a tolerable advance so as to enable me to pay off a good portion of the old debts, some of which, as you will observe, have been three years in contracting, I shall hope not to be obliged to trouble you for a good while.

"Whatever sums you advance shall be regularly set off against the debt as it now stands, specifying the article to which it is applied, agreeably to the form exhibited in the paper No. 1.

"I shall wish to observe this form in order to avoid confusion in the accounts, and because I am far from meaning to state it as my opinion that no succours should be given to the royalists beyond the amount of the 17,099*l.* which I have named as the limit that we ought not to stop short of, supposing the circumstances to admit and require the transmission of a sum to that amount in favour of the royalists in Brittany.

"There are at this moment applications (some of them upon the ground of the specific promise which need not be admitted, and others upon the ground of the general assurances given to the royalists, which I certainly think not undeserving of attention) from the royalists of the Vendée, requesting some continuation of pecuniary assistance from this country.

"There is likewise a most impudent demand from Frotté, made in opposition to the most notorious fact, and in contradiction to a most distinct acknowledgment which I have under his hand; a demand so impudent and so ungrateful that, if he alone were concerned, I should think it a reason for having nothing further to do with him. But the royalists of his division, though far from being of the amount and consequence that he would now give out, may well be deserving of a share of consideration; of so much as may prevent this party from falling into utter despair, and being left with no resource but that of flying the country, or submitting upon whatever terms they can make to the Republic, perfectly contrary to what is their present wishes.

"Whatever is done, however, in that way must be matter of separate consideration. Something, I clearly think, ought to be done, I mean for the other descriptions of royalists besides those of Brittany; and the amount need not be considerable. But unless I receive special directions upon that head, I shall feel myself bound to apply whatever sums you may advance me to the discharge of the account as I have at present stated it, that is, to a mixed discharge of the old debts and the supply of the pressing demands from the interior of Brittany, within the limits assigned, keeping in hand always enough for the current service, so as not to exceed the rate of 400*l.* per month."

MEMORANDUM of MR. WINDHAM on the same subject.—"The claims of M. de Suzanet are for 8,500*l.* for the army of Charette, and the same sum for that of Stofflet, being the difference between the sums promised respectively, and those received or remitted.

"If this claim be admitted it will not be possible to refuse a similar claim and to the same amount, though not hitherto made, to the army of Scepeaux; making altogether the sum of 25,000*l.*, independent of the 17,099*l.* which, I think, ought to be paid to Brittany.

"Though these claims on the part of the armies of Charette and Stofflet, and in like manner that which, in the case of their admission, would be set up upon the part of the army of Scepeaux, need not be admitted to their full extent, yet it cannot be denied that something is due to them, either as matter of strict right and in discharge of an actual promise, or in pursuance of the principle on which that promise was made.

"It cannot well be supposed that, with the expectation which they had long been authorised to entertain of assistance from this country, and the knowledge which they had that such assistance was actually on the road, they may not have incurred debts and contracted engagements beyond what the assistance that actually reached them would be able to discharge.

"Whatever stands upon that footing, though its amount cannot be accurately ascertained, seems to stand upon the footing of strict right. A certain degree of assistance is due to them for the support of those who were either not included in, or cannot trust to the terms of the pacification; and also for the prosecution of the further hopes of the party.

"One difficulty, besides that of ascertaining the amount of what ought to be given to them, is the ensuring a right application of it.

"What I should propose is that MM. de Chatillon and Suzanet should be sent with a sum of ——— to be applied under the joint authority of them and the abbé Bernier, and that, under the same authority, a right should be given of drawing for ——— more; a statement being sent over at the same time, upon honour, of any debts of the party incurred since the period of our first offer of pecuniary assistance, which could not have been earlier than the middle of 95; and of the objects for which future assistance would be wanted; reserving to ourselves the right of deciding the extent to which the demands for either of those purposes could be complied with."

LORD GRENVILLE to EARL CAMDEN.

1797, November 17, Cleveland Row.—"I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3rd instant containing some particulars respecting the conduct of the military in Ireland, and the points on which it is probable that the intended attack to be made on the conduct of the King's Government there is to be grounded. I am persuaded it is unnecessary for me to say that no exertion of mine shall be wanting in support of your Government personally, or in the defence of those principles and that line of conduct which I so thoroughly approve; and that, as far as can depend on me, no imputation shall be fixed on those who seem to me so little to deserve censure, but on the contrary to be entitled to high praise. It would, however, be much more satisfactory to me if the task could fall to the lot of persons more acquainted with the particulars and details which will probably compose the principal part of the attack.

"It has always been a difficulty with me in what manner to manage these debates without giving up the strong advantage ground of refusing to admit of the agitation of questions in the English Parliament, destructive of the independence of Ireland; and without, on the other hand, appearing to admit the imputations which, for the reason just stated, one declined to discuss. I have generally done this by very strong general assertions of the merit of the conduct of the Government in Ireland, and of the rectitude of the system pursued there, as the only one that could keep Ireland from being made a Jacobin appendage to the French Republic. Perhaps this might be done upon the present occasion with a little more detail (if I was sufficiently master of the subject), but it would be productive of great future inconvenience and mischief if, from an over anxiety to justify ourselves, we were induced to abandon a line which everybody here understands and approves, and to enter into debate on questions which cannot be made intelligible without much more knowledge upon them than is commonly possessed here."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 17, Richmond.—"Je vous envoie en toute confiance une lettre que j'ai reçu de notre Ambassadeur à Vienne, que les couriers arrivés à notre désolé ami Comte Starhemberg m'ont apporté. Ce dernier n'a pas reçu le traité de cette maudite paix qu'il déteste, et dont il est tout honteux pour sa Cour.

"Vous verrez dans cette lettre beaucoup de verbiage, mais il y a des choses remarquables à observer. Vous y verrez que cette paix n'est envisagée que comme une trêve que le besoin vrai ou cru du moment a fait conclure; qu'on s'attend à une rupture; qu'on désire de se lier de nouveau avec ses anciens alliés, et qu'on croit que si la Triple Alliance se réunissait de nouveau, et agissait avec unanimité et vigueur, l'Europe pourrait encore sauvée. Je laisse à votre sagesse à peser tous ces aperçus, et à considérer l'importance de profiter des ouvertures qui peuvent remédier à l'état critique où se trouve l'Europe.

Je vous supplie de me renvoyer l'inclose, et de croire à mon attachement sincère pour vous et pour ce pays."

COUNT RAZOUMOUSKOI to COUNT WORONZOW.

1797, November 1, Vienna.—"J'aurais profité avec empressement du courier qu'a expédié le Chevalier Eden le 22 de ce mois, jour où nous avons reçu la nouvelle de la paix, pour vous annoncer ce grand événement, si ce Ministre avait eu l'attention de m'en prévenir. Le Baron de Thugut me prévint le même jour, qu'immédiatement après l'arrivée du Comte de Cobenzl qu'on attendait le sur-lendemain, une double expédition aurait lieu pour Petersbourg et pour Londres; elle a tardé jusqu'à ce jour, et j'en saisis l'occasion avec la satisfaction que je prouve toujours en me livrant à notre correspondance.

"Depuis l'envoi de Cobenzl à Udine les altercations y ont été extrêmement vives ; plus d'une fois la négociation semblait être rompue et les hostilités prêtes à recommencer.

"Ce jeu a été parfaitement joué de part et d'autre. De celle-ci on était déterminée à conclure, non de gré assurément, mais de nécessité.

"Finances épuisées, armée découragée, lassitude générale en imposaient la loi ; il n'était question que d'épier le meilleur moment. Le dernier triomphe du Directoire en a fait manquer un bien avantageux, et l'Italie alors livrée plus que jamais aux conceptions audacieuses du brigand qui la domine, allait être achevée de révolutionner, et la maison d'Autriche menacée de se voir frustrée de ses dédommagemens. Le négociation de Lille rompue a accéléré l'issue de celle d'Udine. Il n'était plus question d'insister sur les bases des préliminaires ; on a conclu aux termes les moins mauvais qu'on a pu obtenir. Les premiers limites sont resserrées ; elles suivent à peu près le cours de l'Adige. Mantoue reste au Français, de même que les isles Vénitiennes. L'Empereur acquiert en dédommagement la ville de Venise. Tel est en gros la stipulation pour l'Italie ; je n'ai point encore vu le traité, et ce n'est que verbalement que le Baron de Thugut m'en a fait part. On n'a plus soutenu l'intégrité de l'Empire. Cet objet indécis est renvoyé au congrès qui se tiendra à Rastadt ; il y a apparence qu'on y traitera de l'établissement de la maison d'Orange, de celle de Modène, et des intérêts des possesseurs considérables sur la rive gauche du Rhin. Il est essentiel pour la Cour de Vienne d'atteindre au plutôt l'exécution de son traité en Italie ; elle sent combien il souffrira de difficultés sous tous ses autres rapports ; elle en apprécie par conséquent le peu de solidité ; elle ne le considère avec raison que comme une trêve qu'une foule de motifs plausibles concourront à faire rompre avant de restituer en Europe la stabilité qu'on ne peut espérer que par une réunion des Puissances qui en impose à celle des Français.

"Voilà l'objet de ses méditations actuelles, et de ses communications à ses alliés. Nous venons d'apprendre que notre Cour a fait tout récemment une Déclaration très énergique à Berlin qui constate l'intérêt que nous voulons prendre au maintien de l'Empire Germanique, en retenant le Cabinet Prussien dans les bornes qu'il était disposé à franchir, moyennant ses liaisons secrètes avec la France. Cet office ne m'est point encore parvenu de chez nous ; ce que j'en sais m'a été dit ici d'après les relations par courrier de Ditsichstein. Le point important pour bien lier la partie, et se mettre en garde contre les événemens à venir, c'est le rapprochement avec l'Angleterre ; et malheureusement, d'après les termes où je vois le Chevalier Eden et le Baron de Thugut, je ne présage point un succès satisfaisant. On insiste toujours sur la ratification au sujet des avances ; on a eu tort assurément de la différer jusqu'ici ; mais le moment actuel présente bien des inconvéniens à y satisfaire. C'est ce qu'on allégué dans la note en réponse à celle qu'a présenté Eden. L'Empereur promet la ratification, mais il désire un sursis, et qu'il ne soit point question au Parlement d'un nouvel emprunt pour liquider cette somme jusqu'à une époque plus reculée. Le Comte de Starhemberg est chargé d'entrer en explication sur les motifs de cette demande. Elle se fonde sur deux considérations principales ; la crainte de donner aux Français un prétexte d'entraver l'exécution du traité en prenant ombrage de nouveaux engagements avec l'Angleterre ; et de nuire au crédit de cette Cour-ci, occupée à faire des emprunts en Allemagne à 5 et 6 per cent, tandis que ceux d'Angleterre, dont il serait question en Parlement, ne se feraient qu'à un intérêt infiniment plus onéreux. La question se réduit à ceci, veut-on ou ne veut-on pas de bonne foi renouveler l'union, l'intimité, et les efforts propres à triompher de la France? Dans ce cas il faut mettre de côté toute considération accessoire, surtout les récriminations dans le passé. On a eu des torts réciproquement; il faut les oublier, et renouer avec franchise et énergie, et, ce qui est essentiel, dérober à l'ennemi commun le concert qu'on établira dans les premiers momens. On objectera à Londres la marche du Gouvernement, la difficulté de répondre à l'Opposition. Il me semble qu'ici c'est à l'habileté, à la fermeté de ministres à obvier aux inconvéniens de la constitution. S'ils en manquent, c'en est fait; l'alternative est effrayante; mais eux les premiers et toute l'Europe ensuite subira le joug et la loi de la part des Français. Croyez-moi (vous?) M. le Comte qu'on puisse l'éviter? Voilà l'époque, ou du moins encore une époque où la Triple Alliance devrait peser de tout son poids sur l'équilibre générale, et très certainement ce nœud formidable rendrait à l'Europe sa tranquillité, et à tous les Gouvernemens la sécurité qu'ils sont menacés de perdre si le triomphe de la France se consolide par l'humiliation de tous les Cabinets et de tous les trônes. Jamais une opération plus noble, plus utile, plus digne de la véritable gloire des souverains ne s'est présentée à leur médiation. Je n'ai pas besoin de la présenter ici sous toutes ses considérations; le tableau dépasserait trop les bornes d'une lettre, et vos lumières supérieures m'interdisent de l'entreprendre. Je joins mes vœux aux vôtres pour que nous ayons la douce et consolante satisfaction de voir un heureux dénouement à la situation si compliquée des affaires générales."

JAMES TALBOT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 18, Berne.—In cipher.—"This mode of correspondence, which prudence absolutely demands upon such occasions, would prevent me from expressing my ideas in detail (if I might presume so far to trouble your Lordship) upon the present internal state of France.

"The moment in which I write, it will not be necessary to prove that the question of changing the existing form of Government and putting the nation at large, who (blank) of all terror and restraint would decide (not deciphered) might, without much impropriety be called the unanimity of this majority, I conceive that the number that would under such circumstances refuse their consent to the restoration of monarchy, or the legitimate heir to the Crown, would be comparatively speaking very inconsiderable. This statement granted, it may be presumed (not deciphered) subject to their present rulers by their remarks of the effects of the system of terror, and their actual dread of the soldiery, accede, if once the legislative body were, in order to finish the embarrassment, to depose the Executive power, the odiousness of which is so full, as almost to make the other causes of oppression forgot, it would meet the joyful support of the mass of the people. This ground for my argument is daily gaining strength, and every convulsion in the Government serves to extend its base, impressing on the mind the little prospect of enjoying in the present order of things what has long been the ultimate object of the general wishes and repose.

"The same thing, I think, would happen with regard to the Legislature in the first place, supposing them to be composed so well or nearly as well as they were before the explosion of the fourth of September last, that is to say, that upon the contingency of the Directory being deposed or put to death, the majority of those bodies would decrease, there was no hesitation to an essential change in the form, which if it were not judged an advisable plan in the first instance, the King upon the throne would adopt measures that would lead to that desirable event.

"From the best information I have been able to procure, I have reason to believe that the majority of the members in the two Councils attached to the existing Government, including the Jacobins, is very small. I have indeed heard it positively asserted by persons well-informed, that it does not exceed four or five. Should this be correct, we may not despair of having a decided majority after the approaching elections in the month of May.

"Now from what we have seen of the capacity, unanimity, and resolution of the well-disposed party in the Assemblies when it amounted to a majority very strongly pronounced, we may conceive that very little hopes are to be entertained of success in future in our object, under their joint direction. In this I am corroborated by what I have seen and heard of the deputy who has taken refuge in this country; and it is painful to reflect that those of the highest repute, groan in German colleges. Their most distinguishing features are vanity and indiscretion, and we may often add, indifference.

"As we have not the choice of materials, I shall take the liberty of proposing to your Lordship Count Reventlau's plan, which recommended itself to me upon considering the causes of the failure of all those which have hitherto been attempted; and which appears to me to obviate many difficulties which present themselves from the improbability of making faithful conspirators of so great a number of people as will constitute a majority of the two councils; even supposing them better composed than we have any reason to expect.

"If the elections be suffered (which is certainly matter of much doubt) we may indulge ourselves in the hope, judging from the temper of their constituents, that the deputies will force the greater part to be chosen from amongst the well-intentioned inhabitants; and if means can be found to encourage the natural leaning of the electors, the foundation of my project will be laid, by giving us a decided majority in the Legislative body.

"I beg your Lordship to admit this hypothesis, at least for the sake of argument. What steps are this majority to take? Certainly not those of their predecessors. I should require nothing from them further than to avoid provoking an attack from the Directory, and in order to throw this latter body totally off their guard, I should recommend them to act in concert in other respects according to their fancy, and should by no means be surprised to see them from time to time vote and speak contrary to their real sentiments.

"My next care should be to provide a sufficient number of resolute men, who, upon signal given, would make themselves masters of the Directory and perhaps some of the Ministers, particularly the Minister of Police. This should be done without previous (blank) on our part in their councils. Upon its execution the Government would naturally devolve upon the Councils, that is upon the majority. They would then be able without dread to take such steps as most to conduce to the objects in view; and I think we might rely with some degree of confidence on their firmness—nay, I believe that they would make a great display of their intrepidity and vigour, every cause for personal apprehension being by this means removed, and being persuaded that they would be supported in their measures by the almost unanimous voice of the nation.

"This plan has to recommend it at least simplicity; it would be attended with no very heavy expense. It might be contrived so as the secret should be imparted to none but those who are to strike the blow, and that, the moment before the execution of it. This might be effectuated like a stroke of lightning, by a small number of people well chosen, as they would be employed in a moment of supposed security; and should it fail in the execution, none would be involved but those who were taken with arms in their hands.

"The effect would be the same whether the violent part of this plan were accomplished by the Jacobins or the Compagnie de Jesus, either of which description of persons might possibly be interested to undertake it from motives decidedly opposite.

"What would be the most to be dreaded at the crisis would be the troops; but, perhaps, they would consider themselves bound to obey the majority of the councils, particularly as they would be supported by the bulk of their fellow citizens. At all events the struggle would eventually produce more good than evil.

"I communicate these ideas to your Lordship in the form of a private letter, trusting to your Lordship's indulgence. If what I here propose should be thought chimerical, at least, I should not appear by making it the subject of a dispatch, to take too much upon me, which I shall on every occasion avoid; but if your Lordship should be of opinion that what I take the liberty to suggest merits any further consideration, and that it is the intention of Government to act upon the prospect which the present order of things in the interior of France presents, I will endeavour to prepare for entering more fully upon the subject.

"I have communicated the idea to Monsieur Bentinek, who seemed to approve of it, and he has promised to furnish me with a mémoire upon the subject."

EARL CAMDEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 21, Dublin Castle.—"It certainly would be more agreeable to my own individual feelings that the state of Ireland could be canvassed in the British Parliament, and that the grounds for a severity of conduct could be stated as well as the conduct itself detailed; but I am aware it is liable to the observation you so justly make, and that to avoid an imputation upon your friends in one instance, you expose yourself to much difficulty upon the general mode of treating subjects which appertain to this kingdom. But I think Lord Moira might be advised to bring his charges into the Irish House of Lords where they could be met, and canvassed. I cannot, however, leave my character and government in better hands than yours, and I only sent the few particulars I could collect immediately that you might refer to them, if it should be necessary. The cruelties which are exercised are dreadful, and the familiarity with which assassination is treated in the conversations and meetings of the United Irishmen proves the determination with which they are inclined to pursue their system. I wish I saw any probability that a different line of conduct could ensure quiet and give satisfaction; but I am at present clear it cannot advantageously be adopted."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 26, Wimbledon.—"You wished in a recent conversation to know what I had collected respecting the means of offensive operations on the coast of France. I expect some more from another quarter, but the enclosed is very accurate and very minute, and I believe he is the best authority on the subject. Return them to me with your first convenience, and be particularly cautious, for reasons I shall explain to you, to avoid taking any notice of your having seen them, and, above all, be cautious not to mention from whom I have received them.

"I know not whether I shall succeed, as there are strong military prejudices and objections stated against the plan; but I am excessively anxious to induce the supplemental militia to fill up the skeletons of regular regiments, with the condition of serving not only in Great Britain, but in Ireland and the islands of Jersey and Guernsey. If I can accomplish this plan I am from that moment on velvet with regard to every service this country can require."

THE EARL OF MORNINGTON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, November 28, Funchal, Island of Madeira.—"I arrived here on the 21st instant, and am at present in perfectly good health. The voyage fatigued me a good deal, but the weather was such as I have no reason to expect as we advance to the southward. This is a delightful climate, and the country is beautiful; it has all the advantages of the southern countries of Europe and of the tropical climates, without the inconveniences of either.

"An unfavourable wind has compelled all the ships to quit the anchorage in Funchal Road, and until they return we cannot proceed on our voyage; from all appearances we are likely to be detained for some days longer.

"I have been most hospitably received by all the English on this island, and most respectfully by His Excellency Don Dioso Perreira Forjaes da Continho, Governor General of the Madeiras. Pray see Lady Mornington and my children sometimes, and write to me, that I may not repeat Alexander Selkirk's ode too often,

I am monarch of all I survey . . . .

"If you want excellent Madeira, send your orders to Mr. Masterton, at Messrs. Kingston, Crump, and Company, New Broad Street, London, and direct the wine to be forwarded to me in India on your account. I will keep it until the Asiatic sun has ripened it, and then I will send it to you by a safe hand.

"I sincerely wish that you and Bathurst would renew our ancient application to Camden in favour of poor William Bisset. I mean to write upon the subject; my conscience reproaches me for not having been more active in his interest."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 1, Windsor.—"Lord Grenville's attention in sending this evening the dispatches brought by Lord Elgin's servant from Berlin is very agreeably felt by me; they incline me to hope the best from the new king, though it is certainly too early to form any solid conclusion. The Court of Russia, if really inclined to stop the mischief which will rapidly advance to the walls of Petersburg if not prevented by joining in active measures, has now a certain means of coming forward, an alliance for that purpose consisting of England, Russia, and Prussia, to which every other regular government may be invited to accede. This, founded on the defence of religion, of society, and of the rights of every independent state, and to prevent the destruction of the smaller ones, may still save Europe."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 2, Richmond.—“ Outre la lettre et le postscriptum du Comte Panin que j’ai prié M. Hammond de vous remettre, et que vous venez de me renvoyer, j’ai reçu aussi une lettre chiffrée que je n’hésiterai pas de vous communiquer dans la confiance que j’ai en vous; et si vous êtes lundi en ville, je viendrai exprès pour vous la lire. Si non, je vous la communiquerai jeudi à la conférence.

“ Quant à M. Taunzin, je sais que c’est un fourbe, un intrigant indigne, qu’il a beaucoup intrigué dans le Brabant; qu’ami il protège par Hankowitz, celui à lui procura la mission de Russie; qu’à Petersbourg, il n’a cessé d’intriguer, et que, quand le Cour de Berlin chercha chez nous à faire rapeller Kalitchef parcequ’il était trop honnête, l’Empereur désira d’être débarassé de ce Taunzin parcequ’il était trop coquin; ainsi on sacrifia chez nous un honnête homme pour se défaire d’un gueux. Au reste ce gueux est, dit-on, fort mielleux, affecte la douceur de caractère qu’il n’a pas, et ne manque pas d’aimabilité!

“ Je suis bien aise de voir que la Cour de Berlin, qui espérait d’avoir Allopeus pour successeur de Kalitchef, s’est trompée. Car le Comte Panin est dans les mêmes excellents principes que son prédcesseur, avec plus de lumière, et infiniment plus de fermeté.”

The MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 8 [Stowe].—“ I was in hopes that nothing was likely to have disturbed the trifling loan of 1,500*l.* which I lent you last Christmas, and which, in the usual course of things, might have lain in your hands for ever. But six days ago I received a letter from Mr. C. Long, with an order from the Treasury to pay before December 29th 3,900*l.*, which they state to be my father’s final balance, being the sum declared. In the year 1792 when Lord Barrington’s, Lord Howe’s, and my father’s accounts were closed, the usual cravings were made for monies surcharged in consequence of forgeries of seamen’s wills, double payments, as well as for the expence of passing the accounts; and Mr. Pitt (though my account was for ten times the amount of the others) agreed to give me the same sum as the others, namely, 7,000*l.*, which would of course pay 3,900*l.* to Government, and leave the residue to the Navy Pay Office clerks, and to the other Offices who claim fees. Of this sum not one shilling has been paid, and I have been held out in the Report of the Finance Committee as a defaulter. I have writ to Mr. Pitt a private letter, before I write a public letter to the Board in answer to Mr. Long; and I have recalled these facts to his recollection, and requested to hear from him before I write to the Treasury; as I take it for granted that he had forgot that communication, and that Mr. Long’s letter was writ in consequence of general orders. In all events however I must be prepared, for I feel it most essential and necessary to my credit that on the 29th December my balance must be paid; and I protest that I do not know how I can safely depend upon Mr. Pitt’s payment of the sum promised to me, and which I understand has actually been paid to Lord Howe and to Lord Barrington. And if this should be the case, I must request your immediate answer upon the subject of the 1,500*l.*, without which I fear that I am aground. I have earnestly begged Mr. Pitt to let me have some answer from him, announcing to me his intentions on this subject, that I may be prepared; and you can serve me most essentially in urging him not to leave me uninformed of them. He will of course clearly understand that I cannot for a moment propose to him to do in this matter what should be deemed a private favour, or to depart from the usual and accustomed practice of his Office.

"I have likewise information this morning that Mr. Tiernay has moved an attack on my office in the Exchequer. I have written to Lord Temple and to Sir William Young to insist that my friends shall not be provoked to say one single word on the subject of me or of my office, as it will be time enough for me to decide upon my line (if any) as soon as I know what the attack is. But as I do not consider this entirely as a naked and abstract question unconnected with others, I wish to know your ideas upon it."

The EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, December 10, Berlin.—"I must have recourse to this mode of communication in informing your Lordship of some circumstances relative to the conduct of business at this Court.

"The King has hitherto shewn so much reserve to those who fill the several departments of State, that it is impossible to foresee where his confidence may ultimately be placed. He, no doubt, chiefly employs Count Haugwitz in foreign affairs; still, however, he converses more than his predecessor did with Count Finckenstein, and Baron Alvensleben; besides his Majesty examines himself the reports made by his Ministers in different Courts.

"But, in the midst of this uncertainty, I can take upon myself to assure your Lordship that Count Bruhl, who had been his governor, enjoys his Majesty's friendship, and the permission to converse with him at all times, and on all subjects. The communications which lately have passed between Russia and Prussia have been carried on by this gentleman. Your Lordship is already acquainted with his character, and his honourable sentiments.

"There is another source of influence which I could never mention except to your Lordship. It is the Queen of Prussia. Attached by the strongest ties of affection, and persuaded of the purity of her character, and of the sincere interest her Majesty takes in his welfare, the King encourages her candid observations, and acts towards her with unrestrained confidence. Her opinion is known to have weight, and is not withheld from the King when her Majesty feels it may [be] of use. I have every reason to believe that the Queen, as well as the King, entertain very favourable impressions towards the King and Queen of England. Among many trifling instances which I could adduce, there is one immediately before me, in the case of Lord Folkestone, who brought a letter of recommendation from the Queen to the then Princess Royal, and the attentions which have, on that account, been shewn him are beyond example.

"In submitting these matters to your Lordship's consideration, I trust that their possible utility may be an apology for my touching on such very delicate topics."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 10, Windsor.—"I enclose to Lord Grenville, and desire he will communicate to Mr. Pitt, the copies of the letters I wrote to the King of Prussia through Baron Steinberg, and to the Duke of Brunswick by M. de Luc, as they will shew I have taken every prudential means to get the Duke of Brunswick to stand forth, and to prepare the King of Prussia to expect friendship from this Court. Lord Grenville will find by the two letters I have received through the channel of Field Marshal Freytag from M. de Luc, that it is very difficult to move the Duke of Brunswick, and that a timidity of political character strongly pervades his composition. No plan is yet sent; there is a letter from the Princess of Orange to the Duke of Brunswick which shews she is much fitter than him for the days we live in. I suppose de Luc's reason for writing to me instead of to Lord Grenville is that, as yet, he truly has nothing to say, but to prove that he is pushing for decision, and that General Stamford sees the business in a just manner."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797] December 12, [Stowe].—"I hasten to relieve you from the uneasiness of any difficulty respecting the 1,500*l.*, which I would not on any consideration suffer you to raise with a loss; preferring infinitely any sacrifice on my part to the slightest on yours. But by a line which I have received from Bernard, who has seen Long, the warrant for my money will be paid (I trust) before the 29th; and, at all events, I shall know decidedly to-morrow; because Mr. Pitt, to whom I wrote again respecting it and my proposed return to Mr. Tiernay's motion, had appointed Bernard to see him this morning; but I fancy that the payment is so far settled that I determined to prevent, as soon as possible, any money negotiation on your part.

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 12, Richmond.—"Je vous envoie la traduction de l'ordre que je viens de recevoir de l'Empereur, ainsi que la copie de l'instruction que la Régence d'Hanovre a donnée à son plénipotentier à Ratisbone, laquelle m'ayant été envoyée en Almand; je l'ai fait traduire, et je joins aussi cette traduction.

"Je sais que le Ministère Britannique ne se melle jamais des affaires de l'Electorat, et que vous avez toujours décliné de recevoir de moi la moindre communication sur ces affaires; aussi je puis vous assurer que, si j'avais eu l'ordre de m'adresser à Monsieur le Baron de Leuthe, je l'aurais fait avec plaisir, sans vous incomoder par la lecture de ces pièces. Mais vous verrez par la lettre de l'Empereur que je dois seulement faire quelques observations amicales au Ministère Britannique sur le contraste de la politique de la Régence d'Hanovre d'avec celle de la Cour de Londres dans une affaire où l'intérêt est absolument le même entre elles; car s'il ne convient pas à la Grande Bretagne que la France augmente encore son territoire, trop étendue déjà, au dépense de l'Empire Germanique, le renversement de l'intégrité de l'Empire convient encore moins aux intérêts de l'Electorat d'Hanovre.

"Ce vif intérêt que prend l'Empereur à la conservation de l'intégrité de l'Allemagne est connue de toute l'Europe. Il s'est si fortement prononcé sur ce sujet que cela devrait, sans doute, engager la France et les amis de cette République, si ambitieuse d'acroître sa puissance et son influence, à décliner, autant qu'ils peuvent, cette médiation et garantie d'un Prince si puissant, et qui veut empêcher l'effet de leurs projets sinistres; mais ce n'est pas certainement à la Régence d'Hanovre à suivre la marche des ennemis de l'Empire Germanique, et de la sûreté de l'Europe en général.

“Ce n'est pas officiellement que je vous écris, c'est un billet d'ami à ami pour vous informer de l'affaire, pour vous demander si vous pouvez metre sous les yeux du Roi les pièces ci-incluses. Et, si vous ne le pouvez pas, je vous prie de me conseiller vous-même ce que j'ai à faire, et si je dois, quoique je n'en ai pas l'ordre, m'adresser à Monsieur le Baron de Leuthe.”

French.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1797] December 13 [Stowe].—“I know that it will give you pleasure to hear that I have received from Mr. Pitt the most marked attentions in the immediate expedition of my warrant for 7,000*l.*, and in the discussions with Bernard upon the subject of my office. He perfectly approves the return, varying it in some slight degree but not in the essentials. But I have likewise infinite satisfaction in receiving from him a letter to which I am very sensible, in answer to the thanks I thought myself bound to give him for the justice he did to the memory and services of my father. Though I have nothing to add, I write you these few lines because I know they will gratify you.”

GEORGE III. TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 15, Windsor.—“I have received this morning Lord Grenville's box; I highly approve of his letter to Mr. de Luc, which I shall enclose under cover to Field Marshal Freytag. I trust Lord Grenville will urge Mr. Pitt to stand firm on the proposed assessed taxes. I have wrote this morning to the same effect, as I see by the return of Mr. Fox to the House of Commons, Opposition mean to give as much trouble as they can on this subject.”

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1797, December 16, Cleveland Row.—“Je vous restitue, selon la promesse que je vous en ai fait, vos deux lettres du 16 et 19 Novembre, que j'avais mis à part pour vous les remettre la dernière fois que j'eus le plaisir de vous recevoir ici, mais que j'ai alors oublié de vous donner. La conduite de votre Cour en annonçant à l'Empire l'intégrité pour base des négociations de Rastadt, est bien faite pour étonner ceux qui sont obligés d'admirer dans l'éloignement et l'ignorance, le developpement du nouveau code diplomatique.

“Je sais que vous êtes, comme nous, un peu attaché aux vielleries de la bonne foi, et de la vérité.”

French. Copy.

THE EARL OF ELGIN TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, December 17, Berlin.—“I avail myself of Mr. Lloyd's passage through Berlin to acquaint your Lordship that Prince Kourakin, being much attached to Count Panin, and considering him as an efficient member of the department of foreign affairs at Petersburg, frequently communicates to him intelligence of a secret nature, that would not necessarily be conveyed to the Minister resident at this Court. Count Panin's habits of intimacy and confidence with me induce him occasionally to permit me to derive some benefit from these communications, always however under the engagement in no ways to commit him. If, therefore, I have at times to send to your Lordship notions or information which I draw from such private but authentic sources, I trust to your thinking it sufficient if on such occasions I avoid citing names, and content myself with saying that I speak from authority, or with certainty, or some such marked expression."

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 23, Windsor.—"As the letters arrived from the Earl of Elgin at Berlin give but little insight as to the state of politics there, I think it must be agreeable to Lord Grenville to hear what Monsieur d'Ompteda, a young gentleman of much observation and employed by me at that Court, has stated on the 5th of this month. That, on the 3rd, he waited on the Duke of Brunswick, in whose anti-chamber he found several military persons; the most distinguished had separate audiences of the Duke, the rest he came and received in that room, where he cautiously avoided taking any notice of Monsieur d'Ompteda; but, on retiring from this levée, addressed himself with a loud voice, that all might hear him, to Monsieur d'Ompteda; 'Sir, I have one word to say to you, pray follow me.' This gentleman immediately communicated the arrival of Baron de Steinberg who thought it proper to have his audience of the King of Prussia previous to waiting on the Duke, who, with some hesitation, expressed a wish that the Baron would not come to him, as his own situation was so very critical; but d'Ompteda said that the Baron neglecting that attention, which would be known by all, would be more liable to comments, that consequently the Baron would not desist from what every degree of decorum required, and which mark of respect he would equally show to every reigning Prince then at Berlin. The Duke then opened himself by saying that, on his first interview with Prince Henry of Prussia, that Prince had with much eagerness desired to know why the Baron had been sent to Berlin, and what was his personal character. The Duke had replied that he was totally ignorant of the Baron's commission, that he supposed it was similar to that on the death of Frederick the Second, that perhaps he might also have instructions to mention the neutrality of the North of Germany. The Duke then added he had reason to believe that Count Haugwitz was not inclined to any strong objections against the detaching the left of the Rhine from the German empire; indeed that he would rather encourage it as an excuse for aggrandizing Prussia in other parts of Germany; that the Duke feared he could be of little utility in preventing this, for that, though the King of Prussia had received him in the most friendly manner, and perhaps might permit him now and then in conversation to prevent some bad maxims, yet he did not think his weight would be great; that, therefore, he owed it to his own reputation to state that people had more opinion of the good he could do than there was any ground for; that the people at Berlin were bad, and indeed even worse than he had supposed; that his delicate situation did not permit [him] to act with the warmth of his own feelings in favour of England; that Count Haugwitz was his personal enemy, and one whom no honest man could trust; that he respect[ed] the talents of the Count, but knew that he was bound by no ties but those of his own personal interest; that if this had been doubted, his conduct towards Madame de Lichtenau, whom he had pretended to concur with to get possession of her secrets, and had since betrayed to the young monarch, must shock every man of common honesty. He also maintains that no treaty between Courts is binding longer than mutual interest requires; and ended with saying he had been just assured by Prince Reuss, the Austrian Minister, that he had been directed by Baron Thugut to assure the Prussian Cabinet that no stipulations had been settled between the Emperor and the French at Udino concerning the German Empire; that therefore he hoped Prussia would support Austria in the maintenance at Radstadt of the integrity of the German Empire. Lord Grenville has my permission to communicate this to Mr. Pitt, who, I am certain, will agree with me in lamenting that a Prince with talents to be of real use at this critical moment is so over-cautious, I fear, to render them perfectly null; and I fear we cannot push on Russia to take an hearty part which I am confident would secure the young king; but if that is not effected, I fear we shall get fair words from Berlin, but no one step of vigour."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, December 23, Dropmore.—"Lord Grenville has availed himself of your Majesty's permission to communicate to Mr. Pitt the information which your Majesty has received from Berlin, and which seems to preclude all hope of any effective assistance from the Duke of Brunswick's exertions or influence there. Nothing can be more striking than the comparison between the active and daring measures adopted by the enemy for the purposes of subversion, and the timid, languid, and indecisive conduct of those who have the strongest interest in opposing a system of unexampled danger and mischief to civil society.

"Lord Grenville will not fail to write again to your Majesty's Minister at Petersburg to instruct him to use every means to stimulate that Court, but he is very fearful that the same observation which he has ventured to make respecting the Duke of Brunswick's conduct applies with full as much force to that of the Emperor of Russia."

Copy.

GEORGE III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 24, Windsor.—"Lord Grenville seems so fully to view the conduct of the Duke of Brunswick in the same manner as it strikes me, that it is unnecessary to dwell on it, but [we] ought still to redouble every means left of bringing the young King of Prussia to take a part suitable to the supposed worth of his private character; as such, I highly approve of the intention of further urging the Russian Emperor to step forward. I shall add the further intelligence I have received by this post from Berlin. While Baron de Steinberg was waiting in the Queen's antichamber for his audience, the King of Prussia came there, and immediately addressed him with expressions of sorrow at thinking the left side of the Rhine would be taken from the German Empire; the Baron expressed that though there might be some risk of such a fatal measure, that, if the king would stand forth, he had the means of preventing it. The king [said] he was certainly most desirous of preventing this evil, but that it seemed to him that it was almost too late to make any effectual resistance. Other persons came into the room, which stopped the conversation. Count Haugwitz avoids having any conversation with the Baron but in mixed company, though an interview has been desired by Steinberg, who has had a very full conversation with Duke of Brunswick, who has held similar language to that with Monsieur de Luc at Brunswick on a triple alliance to which Austria should be invited to accede; that there is no fear for the present of the king's having any close connection with France, and that he will scrupulously [scrupulously] avoid any concert with that horrid nation; that his last words to Jacobi on his setting off for Radstadt were, preserve the integrity of the German Empire, and you may expect from me the greatest reward. That the Duke has reason to believe, at the same time, there is but little hopes of regaining the left bank of the Rhine; that if Prussia cannot recover the Duchy of Cleves, he will be repaid by some secularization; that France will not allow any change of Principalities, but that the clergy must make good all these losses to Princes, from a view of preventing Austria from obtaining Bavaria. It is not yet known what secret agreements Austria has made with France. The Baron is persuaded the Duke of Brunswick might be of great use if he would step forward, and that the king's confidence in him certainly renders him of some use, but that he meant to return to Brunswick the day after the public interment.

"Rough as this account is drawn up by me, I desire it may be communicated to Mr. Pitt."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 24, Downing Street.—"I return you the King's letter, which indeed gives a deplorable picture of the person from whom we expected the safety of Europe. I hope we shall now have an interval to look into arrangements at home, which certainly, during the last fortnight, as far as I am concerned, have had very little attention. I shall endeavour now to bring up my arrears.

"I should wish to know how particular the intelligence is you mention in the secret letters from Paris, whether enough so to ground ostensible measures upon them here. It will be as well if you can send them to Hammond or Canning, to be shown to me and Dundas."

The EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1797, December 27, Berlin.—"I cannot withhold from your Lordship that it was the Duke of Brunswick who, amidst his timid counsels, recommended to the King of Prussia the taking in sequestration the Electorate of Hanover during the war."

LORD GRENVILLE to GEORGE III.

1797, December 29, Dropmore.—"Lord Grenville has the honour to transmit to your Majesty a letter from M. de Luc, with its inclosure, which seem to prove but too clearly that nothing is to be expected in the present moment from the Court of Berlin, except a resistance which might possibly be made to any hostile measures of the French against the north of Germany; and the humiliating step taken respecting the French king presents but a bad presage of vigour or spirit in that quarter.

"Lord Grenville humbly submits to your Majesty that till some information is received of the effect of the insinuations made in your Majesty's name at the Courts of Petersburg and Vienna, any further representations at those Courts, on the ideas stated in the Duke of Brunswick's paper, would be premature and useless.

"Lord Grenville has received a note from Mr. Balan announcing Count Tauenzein's arrival, and he will, with your Majesty's permission, appoint him to deliver his letter to your Majesty on Wednesday next."

GEORGE. III. to LORD GRENVILLE.

1797, December 30, Windsor.—“The letter Lord Grenville has received from Monsieur de Luc, and the flimsy enclosure, shew no hopes are to be formed of any active assistance from the Court of Berlin in the present arduous moment. I perfectly agree with Lord Grenville that, till an answer arrives from Petersburg to the proposals that have been made, no step can be further taken from hence to Berlin. I highly approve of the draft I have read this morning to Sir Charles Whitworth, which ought to have much effect. I approve of receiving Count Tauenzien on Wednesday.”

ADDENDA.

The MARQUIS OF CARMARTHEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, July 27, Whitehall.—“Inclosed I transmit to you the principal points on which his Majesty’s confidential servants wish to obtain the earliest as well as most accurate information. It gave me great pleasure to learn that you were willing to go to Holland at this very interesting period.

“I have taken the liberty of troubling you with a letter to the worthy Greffier, who, I am sure, will be glad to show you every attention in his power.”

W. W. GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1787, July 31, The Hague.—“I arrived here yesterday evening, and have had a great deal of very instructive communication from Sir James Harris on the different points on which the King’s servants appeared to wish that I should inform myself. The intelligence which you will receive from him by this post respecting the proposition made by the King of Prussia for a joint mediation with France to the exclusion of Great Britain, certainly conveys a very unfavourable impression of his disposition on this subject; especially as there is no room to doubt that M. de Thuleymeer has acted in this particular in exact conformity to the orders which he received from his Court. At the same time the terms which the King of Prussia has stated to France as the grounds of a mediation are so conformable to what he must feel to be the wishes of His Majesty on this subject, that I should hope there may still be a possibility that he may close with the offer now made to him, of acting in concert for the attainment of those objects, on which the two Courts are so much agreed. No account has yet been received by Sir James Harris of the effect produced by Lord Carmarthen’s dispatch to Mr. Ewart of the 17th instant, authorising him to make to the King of Prussia an offer of communication on the present state of the Republic. But as we shall probably know here by Friday what answer has been given to this proposal, it appears clearly proper that no steps shall be taken for going to Nimeguen till after that day, as the language to be held there may depend so much on this point.

“I am indeed very apprehensive that the interval will be far from sufficient to enable me to inform myself as amply as I should wish on many material points of enquiry with respect to the detail of the disputes existing between the different Provinces, and those relating to the Stadtholder. Sir James Harris has promised to procure for me the commissions of Stadtholder and Captain General granted in 1747, and in 1766; but I understand that these are different in the several Provinces, and that there is no commission given to the Prince as Stadtholder and Captain-General of the Union. Besides this, the commissions themselves are far from being precise or definite as to the extent of the power which they convey. The right of appointing magistrates in the different towns of Holland was one of the points in which it was proposed to concede when a union was projected of the aristocracy and the Prince's friends at Amsterdam, and defeated by the obstinacy of the latter. It appears that it will, in any case, be difficult to maintain the right of absolute appointment, as no more is given by the constitution than the right of choosing one person out of three named by the councils of the towns. The règlemens were made in the time of King William, for the express purpose of counterbalancing the power of Holland, by giving influence and authority to the Stadtholder. They convey to him in the three provinces of Guelderland, Utrecht, and Overijssel large powers, both in the appointment of magistrates, and in the choice of deputies to the Provincial States. M. de Montmorin, in his letter to M. Barthélemy, speaks of four provinces to which the règlemens apply. This is done with a view to include Frizeland, in which there is a règlement, but of a different nature from those of the other three provinces. There has never been in Frizeland any dispute on the subject of their règlement; whereas, in Overijssel, the règlement has actually been overthrown; in Utrecht, it is the point on which the province is now in arms; and in Guelderland it is the opinion, even of those who support the Prince, that some concession ought to be made by him on this head.

"From the very statement of the original view with which these règlemens were made, and from their general nature and tendency, it seems apparent that the Prince has a strong interest in maintaining them as much as possible in their present form. But if this is inconsistent with the ideas of his own supporters, I apprehend that it would, in the next place, be important that, in any arrangement of the affairs of the Republic, this point should be left to be settled by the Prince with the States of the several Provinces to which the règlemens apply, and not with the States of Holland, who have clearly no right to interfere in a matter entirely relating to the interior government of the other provinces. This was the answer made by the Prince and Princess of Orange to M. De Rayneval's proposition on this head. The same object is now made one of the terms contained in the King of Prussia's proposal to France, and it appears entirely consistent with the language held in the last dispatch to the Duke of Dorset, which states the constitution of 1747 and 1766 as the basis of negotiation, and mentions the other points as proper matters for discussion in the Republic, with or without the mediation of the Powers.

"I have thought it right to advert in the above general manner to the chief points in dispute, and I shall endeavour as far as possible to procure such particulars relating to them as may enable me to return to England with that sort of detailed information which it was wished I should acquire. I am apprehensive that the greatest difficulty will arise in endeavouring to ascertain the extent to which concessions may be made on those heads on which some concession appears reasonable, as Sir James Harris is of opinion that there are no persons here of sufficient weight to undertake to answer for the rest. Perhaps the more immediate purpose with which I understood this information to be desired, will, in some degree, be answered by the circumstance of the King of Prussia having come forward with propositions so consonant to the wishes of the Stadtholder and his friends. I shall, however, not fail to endeavour to acquire as much information on the subject as the circumstances in which we are placed will admit."

"Postscript.—I find that there is also a règlement in Groningen, by which considerable powers are given to the Stadtholder. Sir James Harris is, however, clearly of opinion that the expression of France was used with a view to Frizeland. The general term of provinces à règlement is understood here to apply only to the three provinces of Guelderland, Utrecht, and Overijssel. The claim stated in M. de Montmorin's letter of the bourgeoisies to interfere in the election of the Regents, is one which has not been brought forward for more than a century, and is in direct contradiction to what is understood to be the constitution of Holland, and of its different towns. It goes, in effect, to change the form of government from an aristocracy to one purely democratical; as is evident by the manner in which this principle has been applied at Amsterdam and Rotterdam, where the magistrates elected in the old form have been dismissed, and others substituted in their room by an armed mob."

W. W. GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1787, July 31, The Hague.—"I have nothing to add to my other letter, little as I am afraid you will find there, except that I much fear I shall have more difficulty than I had foreseen in bringing to distinct points the questions with which I am furnished, on account of the strange unsettled state in which the constitution of this country has always been, and the imperfect manner in which it is understood by the people here. I think, however, that the King of Prussia's paper affords good ground for us to proceed upon, even if he should reject our offers of communication and concert, which can hardly be supposed; although, in that case, I see little for us to do but to withdraw ourselves as handsomely as we can.

"I have been received with great civility by Sir James Harris. I propose certainly staying here till Friday. It is not yet settled whether he goes to Nimeguen, but it seems impossible for me to avoid it on account of the letters to be delivered; although, if the King of Prussia rejects our first offer, it will be to very little purpose. If when I get there the Duke of Brunswick is arrived at Wesel, I think I shall proceed there. Though I have nothing to say to him, he might be flattered by it as an attention; and the report received to-day of the unlimited powers given to him by the King of Prussia (if it is anything like the truth) makes him a card of some consequence. As it is not quite impossible that I may remain here two or three days longer than I proposed, and may by that means be able to have an answer to this letter, I wish you would let me know what you think of this idea; and particularly whether it would probably be agreeable or not to His Majesty. I cannot help thinking that it would be right that some officer of rank should be sent expressly for the purpose of flattering him, and perhaps holding out to him the idea of command; and this would make my journey useless, to my great satisfaction."

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, August 1, Downing Street.—"You will have learnt from Sir James Harris the contents of the last letters from Berlin, which came here on Sunday night, and the circumstance of the Emperor's letter to the Prince of Orange. We have sent further instructions in consequence both to Vienna and Berlin, the copies of which Sir James Harris will of course show you. The question respecting the deputies from Utrecht seems left in an awkward posture, though I observe Sir James Harris doubts whether it can be prudently be pushed to a decision at present. The account he gives of levies in Liege, to replace the defection of the corps in the service of Holland, seems also to require attention. It is very material that our friends should not lose the superiority of force within the Republic, while we are labouring to protect it from interference from without. There is no news from France or elsewhere but what I have already alluded to. I forgot, in speaking to you about the Greflier, to mention that the King particularly wished you to say civilities to him from His Majesty, and to express his reliance upon his good dispositions.

"I hope the remainder of your journey will have been prosperous, and with less delays than you had to encounter in the beginning."

W. W. GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1787, August 3, The Hague.—"Sir James Harris writes to-day by an extra packet in order to lose no time in sending over the resolution of the States of Zeland on the subject of the proposed mediation, and in stating the strong wish of our friends here that some memorial should be delivered to the States General on our part, of a nature similar to that of France, in consequence of the resolution of Holland. In conversing with Sir James Harris on this subject it did not occur to me that any considerable objection was felt in England to this step when it was first proposed. I imagine, therefore, that the desire of our friends here will be thought a sufficient reason for adopting a measure in itself so indifferent, and which can probably have no other effect than that of showing that Great Britain interests herself in the present situation of the Republic; a truth which, however evident from a variety of circumstances, is nevertheless contradicted here with great pains, and some success. The resolution of Zeland is, I think, drawn up with force and judgment. It seems right that similar resolutions should now be brought forward in Guelderland and at Amersfort, in order to anticipate any effect which the approach of the King of Prussia's army might produce on the deliberations of those provinces, if he should be still desirous of excluding Great Britain from the mediation, as appears to be the case by the note received from the Princess of Orange.

"I shall certainly remain here till the King of Prussia's answer to the first proposal of communication with Great Britain is known, which will probably be in a day or two. It appears to me at present that my going to Nimeguen or not should depend on the nature of that answer, unless I should previously receive any intimation of your wishes on the subject. The instruction given to the Flemish deputies seems likely to encourage the King of Prussia to proceed, as it proves that, without the greatest concessions on the part of the Emperor, his principal attention must still be directed to that object. If I do not go to Nimeguen I propose returning from hence to England in the beginning of next week; although I fear that I shall not have been able to acquire, by that time, much of the information which was desired when I left England.

"On the important subject, however, of the terms on which a mediation might proceed, Sir James Harris and myself had yesterday a conversation of some length with two of our most intelligent friends here, the result of which will, I trust, be thought in great measure satisfactory, and will be fully stated to you to-morrow in a dispatch from Sir James Harris."

1787, August 3, The Hague.—"Sir James Harris writes by an extraordinary packet, as it seems to be a point which our friends here have extremely at heart that a memorial should be immediately presented by us, to do away the impressions of our indifference. I feel every moment that I remain here how much I have undertaken a task beyond my abilities (or even those of much abler men) when I formed the expectation of being able to bring to anything like distinct points questions upon which the people of this country are themselves so uninformed. I must trust, therefore, to your friendship to prepare the minds of our investigators for a considerable disappointment, in order that my character may not suffer essentially from it. At the same time I really think that what will be stated to you to-morrow, although it will contain little new, and will be very short of an answer to all our enquiries, will nevertheless, by bringing together a number of scattered objects, afford no unsatisfactory basis for us to proceed upon, till the business is brought to that sort of point when it will be impossible to advance a step without consulting upon the spot with the few persons here who, having made these questions the study of their lives, are masters of them. I have great reason to be satisfied with Sir James Harris's openness and attentions. I am extremely unwilling to go to Nimeguen, unless there is ground to expect co-operation with Prussia. Without that, great expectations would be formed by the Princess from my coming; and I should not have one word to say beyond empty compliments and general assurances, which might be conveyed without a special commission for that purpose."

Postscript.—"I have made a great blunder in the paper which I sent on Tuesday, in saying that there is no commission as Captain-General of the union. There is one, and it is printed in Janison. Pray, if you have an opportunity, scratch out those words. I was led into the mistake by the information which I received here. This will give you an idea how little the subject is understood."

1787, August 3, The Hague.—"I trust you will be satisfied with the dispatch which goes to-day on the different points in discussion. More precise information can, I fear, not be acquired without a long and particular application to the study of the constitution of this country, which is that of all others whose constitution is least fixed. But, if a negotiation can be commenced on these principles, whoever carries it on here (where I take it for granted on every account you mean it should be carried on) will have the assistance, as the different points come under a detailed discussion, of those persons who have made this the study of their lives. A more particular account could not have been given in a dispatch, without writing a book like Blackstone's Commentaries. Some, however, of the persons to whom I allude could not leave the Hague, which circumstance makes it absolutely necessary to negotiate here, rather than at Nimeguen, Aix la Chapelle, or any other town.

“Although the King of Prussia’s answer is not quite what it might be, yet, I think, it makes it proper for me to go to Nimeguen. I cannot well go till after Monday or Tuesday, on account of engagements here which I thought it important not to refuse. The delay will be amply compensated by the advantage of conversing with some of the persons whom I shall see in the interim. From Nimeguen I shall, I believe, return through Flanders, and by Calais, partly from curiosity, and partly to avoid the necessity of passing at least 24 hours in the tortures of the damned. I shall hope, before I leave this place, to receive your answer about the Duke of Brunswick. It is a commission I am far from desirous of undertaking; but I am very anxious that something of the sort should be done by somebody.”

W. W. GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1787, August 4, The Hague.—“Sir James Harris writes by this post so fully on the different points to be discussed between the parties here in case of a mediation, that it is impossible to add anything on the subject. I flatter myself that if any part of his letter should be thought to require further explanation, I shall be able on my return in some degree to supply such particulars as may be necessary for that purpose. I take it for granted that in the meantime it will have been thought right to agree entirely in the propositions which were made by Prussia to the French Court, and which are now formally communicated to the king. The only point on which any difference of opinion can probably have arisen seems to be that of the suspension of hostilities, on which head the proposition of Prussia appears to concur with that of France, to which we had objected. I think that some modification may be adopted on this subject, especially as our friends here seem to wish much that the removal of the troops from Utrecht should take place. In anything, however, which is to be done on this subject it will be necessary to act with the utmost caution, particularly as the intelligence to which you allude in your letter (which I received last night) respecting the new levies, is confirmed beyond a possibility of doubt, and the object of France, evidently, is to restore to her friends in the Republic such a superiority of force as may render her open intervention unnecessary, if circumstances should arise to make her think it dangerous to herself. I cannot help suggesting whether it might not be proper, if the language now held by France and the other information from that quarter should not be satisfactory, to enable the States of Guelderland immediately to take measures to counteract this plan by a similar augmentation of their army, either in the way of new levies, or perhaps more advantageously, by the subsidy of foreign troops.

“It is particularly necessary that in any suspension of hostilities the fullest provision should be made both for the security and the support during the truce of the troops which have gone over to the Stadtholder, some of whom would, on the idea proposed by France and Prussia, be drawn back into the province of Holland. Perhaps the thing most to be wished is that France may have adopted the proposition made in the dispatch to the Duke of Dorset, but even in that case a stipulation must certainly be made to prevent new levies. Sir James Harris will write on Tuesday more fully on this whole subject, after consulting again our friends upon it.

“The point of the advantage which might be derived from attentions paid to the Duke of Brunswick is again strongly pressed by the Princess; and from a short letter from Mr. Ewart to Sir James Harris, I conclude he has also mentioned it in his dispatch, which there has not yet been time to decipher here. It certainly appears to be of the utmost importance."

Draft.

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, August 7, Hollwood.—"This messenger will reach you later than was intended; but after receiving your letter of the 4th, and the accounts from Berlin which came yesterday, I thought it necessary to write again to Windsor. The king approves entirely of your going to the Duke of Brunswick, and 'expressing in His Majesty's name that he is happy the King of Prussia has entrusted the command to him, who he knows would not have accepted it unless he knew that the King of Prussia, when once moving so far, would not only look for a proper satisfaction for the insult committed, but also see the rights of his family preserved.' I give you the words of the king's letter. I find that His Majesty has just received through the Duke of York strong expressions of thanks from the Duke of Brunswick for what he has done for one of his sons, which I understand to be taking him into his service abroad. You will, I think, be better able from this visit than anything else to learn what really in the end may be expected from Prussia. The Duke of Brunswick, I am told, is usually distant and reserved; but I trust you will be able to make him speak confidentially on this occasion.

"The prospect looks very favourable at present, as the Prussian preliminaries seem to take, in almost all respects, the right ground. We have written to Ewart to express in general our great satisfaction in seeing them; but we have thought it best not to commit ourselves on the particular points till you return. The chief difficulty at first view is that which you mention respecting the cessation of hostilities. If any modification is practicable, we shall learn it from you when you come. You will see Eden's and the Duke of Dorset's dispatches, which came Sunday, and contain all we yet know from thence, Barthélemi not having yet received the dispatch which he is to communicate. In the meantime the assurances respecting naval preparations seem clear and satisfactory. The camp at Givet is not formed, and all our intelligence goes to show that no serious steps have been yet taken for it. But they decline giving assurances not to form it, alleging the new ground that they must watch the motion of the Prussian troops. Eden says M. de Montmorin told him they had represented against the King of Prussia's marching, and that if he persisted they must immediately have a much larger force in the French Netherlands. I mention these points lest you should have left the Hague before the copies of the dispatches get there. If the Prussian troops advance, and France does assemble hers, it will be to be considered whether we must not take steps, notwithstanding the assurances respecting the stopping naval preparations. Perhaps a treaty of subsidy may be sufficient in the first instance, and no further naval armament need take place, unless in the progress of things it becomes necessary. All this must be regulated by events; as if the negotiation fails, and the King of Prussia is ready to act a decided part, we must, I think, go along with him as far as circumstances may require. If, however, there should seem a prospect of effecting a good settlement on the points explained in Sir James Harris's last dispatch, it is to be wished that anything tending to extremities may in the meantime be avoided, if it safely can. I do not know how far the King of Prussia can wait to make the reparation of the Princess matter of negotiation. But in many respects it may be as well that it should not be decided before other points are settled. And, if this is the case, perhaps it will be enough that the Prussian troops should be in such a position as may enable them clearly to move in time, if France should have recourse to force; and we need not then act till some such a step is taken. Under such circumstances any settlement in the Republic (in the manner pointed at in the resolutions of Zealand) or a mediation, would come forward with advantage, and I think must end well. It seems material, in the meantime, not to let the levies of the Province of Holland bring them back to an equality of strength with the Stadtholder; and I hope you will come prepared to state what steps are best for augmenting the troops of Guelderland and other Provinces supporting the Prince of Orange, if it should be necessary for this purpose.

"Sir James Harris is authorised to present the memorial. There was some doubt here whether we ought to take public notice of a measure taken only by separate Provinces, and not by the States General. But it seems to deserve no weight, if the memorial itself is thought likely to be useful. A change of phrase seemed necessary respecting the two Provinces mentioned, as what was said did not apply accurately to Frizeland. And the last sentence was altered to show that we had no wish to force a mediation in preference to an internal arrangement, if the latter should be practicable; and also to avoid committing us to other measures, which some of the proposed expressions seemed to do in a way not necessary at present. If you find anything objectionable as it now stands, have no scruple to get Sir James Harris to change it in any manner you think safe, preserving the two general ideas I have just mentioned. The king speaks with the warmest approbation of the effects already produced by your enquiries; and even the insatiable craving of the Chancellor is more quieted than I have ever known it."

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, August 18, Hague.—"Although on every account I should have had great pleasure in seeing you again here, yet the reasons which induced you to proceed directly to England were of a nature to diminish my regrets.

"Count Bentinck returned on Wednesday early, and Lord Torrington's messenger brought me, about an hour ago, your letters from Brussels. It is too near that when the post goes out for me to attempt to decipher them to-day. I, however, can collect enough from what I have heard from your fellow traveller to perceive that, on the whole, you are not dissatisfied with your expedition; and that you are inclined to think well of the future operations of Berlin.

"I must beg leave to refer you to what I have written to the Office since you left me for my information and ideas on that point, on which I confess freely I dare not be sanguine.

"You will see by my letters of to-day the efforts of our adversaries to increase their strength, and you saw enough during your short residence amongst us of the character of our friends not to conceive the impression of fear and alarm these exertions give them. Without being quite so easily depressed as they, I own I see great difficulties for us, and real danger for them, if the opposite party should be allowed to complete their plan without molestation. The conduct of France is so notorious on this occasion, that I do not see how we can permit it to pass unnoticed, particularly as it is in direct contradiction to every assurance she gives us.

"The two enclosed letters came at a moment when I expected you back from Nimeguen. I hope they contain nothing what ought to have been said or done here. At all events you never could have got them in time.

"I beg you would believe me perfectly sincere when I assure you I derived the greatest pleasure and satisfaction from your short visit; and that I shall be happy if it should lead to an as intimate acquaintance as that which subsisted between your very respectable father and mine."

LORD TORRINGTON to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, August 20, Brussels.—"It is with great pleasure I acquaint you my messenger returned yesterday without having met with the smallest delay or risk, owing to his own good sense, by which he avoided the two first outposts, and passed the third as a chasseur going to his master with his dog, as I had recommended, and which was credited, as he was a foreigner. He arrived at ——— on Friday at two o'clock p.m. before the English mail set out.

"Although you must already have received advice of the safe arrival of your letters, yet the fear I have been under least any unforeseen accident might have happened, my anxiety about them, and the personal satisfaction I enjoy at having so well executed your orders, have induced me to trouble you with this letter, to relieve your mind as well as my own from a very uneasy sensation."

W. W. GRENVILLE to SIR JAMES HARRIS.

1787, August 23, Whitehall.—"I am very sensibly flattered by the obliging expressions of your letter, and I can assure you with the greatest truth that I shall at all times feel a most sincere pleasure in any opportunity of cultivating and improving an acquaintance which, during the short time I have enjoyed it, I have seen so much reason to value. I had intended, and had even begun to write to you fully on all the different points on which you must be anxious to be informed, but I am prevented by the circumstances in which there is too much reason to fear from your last dispatch you may now find yourself. I will only, therefore, say that no endeavours have been wanting on my part to state to the king's servants the real situation of the Republic, and particularly of the Province of Holland, as far as I was able to collect it during my short residence there; and that I trust you will be satisfied with the measures which have been adopted.

"I shall wait with great impatience for the next accounts from the Hague. I beg to be particularly remembered to Count Charles Bentinck."

W. PITT to SIR ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL.

Private.

1787, August 28, Downing Street.—"I send by this conveyance a duplicate of a letter to Lord Cornwallis, a copy of which I enclosed to you by the Ranger packet. Since that time, no decisive turn has been given to the situation of affairs. The idea of a mediation in the United Provinces, though proposed some time ago by Holland, and approved by the four Provinces in the opposite interest, has not yet been determined upon. It is delayed in Overijssel and Groningen, and perhaps now secretly discouraged by France, who finds the present moment unfavourable to any settlement consistent with her views, and probably wishes to gain time. The most explicit assurances have been given us by France in answer to our inquiries respecting naval preparations, and we have not hitherto found it necessary to go farther than the equipment mentioned in my former letter. The camp at Givet has not yet taken place, but possibly it may in a very short time, in consequence of the assemblage of Prussian troops at Wesel, which France has in vain endeavoured to prevail upon the King of Prussia to countermand, and which will probably have taken effect by the first week in September.

"Holland still persists in not giving the King of Prussia the satisfaction which he requires, and he will most likely employ his army to enforce it. In the meantime the internal violence in the Republic increases, and makes it difficult to judge what will be the issue. Possibly till the personal reparation to the King of Prussia is adjusted, no effectual step can be taken towards the general settlement of the disputes. But as he is now fully disposed to co-operate in effecting such a settlement on principles entirely conformable to our wishes, and as the increasing embarrassments in France (from the state of her finances, and the resistance of the Parliaments to the proposed taxes) render her open interference more and more difficult, there seems reason upon the whole to expect a favourable termination of the business. Every degree of precaution on our part is, however, still necessary. The orders from the Secretary of War for sending a regiment to Bombay, which I alluded to in my former letter, are sent by this conveyance. A duplicate will be sent by the first safe opportunity, as we are extremely anxious for their speedy execution."

COUNT C. F. BENTINCK to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, August 30, Hague.—"I had the pleasure of hearing yesterday from Sir James Harris that you was arrived in London. I need not repeat that I am happy to have made your acquaintance, and hope we shall meet often even if you should not pay another visit to this country. Independent of myself, I have every reason to think the stay you made with us a fortunate circumstance for this country, particularly at that time. It has contributed to remove the ill-grounded insinuations that were so artfully circulated; it has given encouragement to the constitutional party; you are now informed on the spot, and I flatter myself we have now in England one more advocate able and willing to do justice to a good cause. I have not forgot the promise I made; and for provision I transmit to you a copy of a letter of my brother's on the preliminary articles proposed by the Court of Berlin to the Court of Versailles. The illegality and even nullity of the States of Holland is perfectly well made out, so as to warrant resistance if it could be done with success. To the towns where the Regencies have been changed and the vote thus obtained by force, you may now add Delft, where the same game has been played within these few days past, by means of 800 or 1,000 volunteers or bourgeois armés with a few pieces of cannon, calling themselves the voice of the people, in direct contradiction to the sense of the greatest part of the citizens who, at Delft, are particularly well affected to the Constitution. We knew of the march of the volunteers long before they came; 200 men of the garrison of the Hague would have parried the blow. But the scheme was concerted with the Cabal. They declared the whole to be a domestic affair that concerned Delft only, and that they had too much regard for the voice of the people to oppose it. And thus within this small distance of this place, we have again been witnesses of so open a breach of the privileges of one of the voting towns, and so violent and direct an attack on the freedom of elections. A body of these volunteers is now hovering about the country at their own will and pleasure; they are quartered on the inhabitants, they disarm all such as are averse to their plan, and nobody knows by whose orders they act. The nation bears all this with impatience, but they are not embodied and disciplined. Such as resist are only exposed to greater insults and acts of violence; or, countenanced as the volunteers are by the Cabal, should their adversaries oppose force to force, they would only run the risk of being brought to a trial before packed courts of justice, where the remedy would be worse than the disease. This is what is meant in my brother's letter by the Juges Délégués. In this country almost every town or district has its own judges and courts of justice, chosen annually among the citizens of that place so as to answer very nearly the institution of juries. Under the pretence of extraordinary cases, of the riotous disposition of the people, they have extended the authority of the Council Committee (Gecommitteerde Raaden) to judicial cases under the denomination of political offences. The Council Committee is an assembly chosen out of the majority of the States of Holland, which has always existed as a part of the executive government of the country, and to represent the States when not sitting; but from the very nature of it was never meant by a wise legislator to be a court of justice in any case whatever. The Cabal, however, have extended the authority of this assembly, where they have a packed majority, to criminal cases under the denomination above mentioned, and have named an Attorney General to carry on prosecutions in the name of this new unparalleled tribunal; and as the definition of political offences is a wide one, there are few cases but what they thus bring before them. This is the tribunal against which the legal courts of justice have made the most vigorous representations to no purpose, and which the nation does and must hold in utter execration, as well as the authors of it, if they had no other reasons. By these and by similar means the majority of Holland have made themselves masters of our lives and property; by suspending the Prince as Captain General they are masters of the army; they are masters of the purse and of the sword and of the courts of justice. Is there anywhere a power more arbitrary and more despotic? Yet all this they have done under the pretence of checking the rapid strides of the Prince towards despotism, and of giving more liberty to a nation that never asked them for it. Ask them if they can charge the Prince with a maladministration of the finances, with encouraging corrupt practices in the courts of justice to serve his own purposes, or with making use of his power and influence in an unjust or an oppressive manner? They are forced to own they cannot.

“But to return to the volunteers. They mean at present to take a tour through the different towns of the Province to disarm their adversaries where they are superior in numbers, and to change the Regencies by force, and thus obtain the votes farther to strengthen their majority. They are carrying on all their military preparations with the greatest rapidity; whilst France, who still assists them and sends them soldiers sans faire semblant de rien, is holding out conciliatory language; and they themselves talk of giving the satisfaction whilst, as a proof of their sincerity, all the steps they take make it more difficult for the Prince and Princess to accept of the satisfaction they mean to offer; and all this in hopes of gaining time. They still are in hopes that the powers interested in the event will not act so as to oblige them to give up the point, but I flatter myself they will be disappointed. If we give them the winter to strengthen themselves, it will be more difficult to make them give up the point than we think, though I am convinced, on the long run, they must lose the game. I hope to hear soon of an English fleet on the coast. Remember 1688; there is a sea-port town ready to receive you. This country must not fall into the hands of France to the detriment of old England. I enclose a defence of the good cause which, if it is not yet translated, deserves being inserted in some of the papers. My mother and sisters are gone to Guelderland; my brother and Hoogendorf desire to be remembered. You seemed to take our cause so much at heart that I make no apology for the length of my letter."

Enclosure.

Copy of a letter, in French, from Count Rhoon to Sir James Harris.

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1787, September 2, Athole House.—"Your messenger found me here yesterday morning, and I shall, after answering a letter from Mr. Pitt, dispatch him to-morrow. I have given a serious consideration to the contents of your letter and the paper which accompanies it. I am extremely happy in the opportunity you have had in collecting information from Mr. Boer, and, confiding most implicitly in the accuracy with which you will do it, I feel no regret that I am only to receive it at second hand. With regard to the general object of Mr. Boer's visit to England, I fairly confess to you that I see at present no daylight in it. I do not think our interest can in any such degree be affected by the fate of the Dutch East India Company as to dispose us to embark at all in any measures for its extrication; and I say this as well with regard to the Chamber of Zeland as with regard to the others, unless there are grounds of policy for aiding that particular chamber on account of its attachment to the interests of this country in Holland. Any consideration of that kind I lay out of my view, both because I am not competent to judge of it, and because I understand your wish is to know my sentiments on this subject as an Indian question. In that point of view I confess I feel pretty decisively that, if we attend to our own commercial interests in India, the advantages we possess are of so predominant a nature as to render us independent of the situation of the state of the East India Companies of the other European nations. If the territorial revenues of India were in the hands of the public, and the trade of the British subjects from India (whether individually or in companies) not adequate to the purposes of bringing home those revenues in trade, which is the only means [by which] they can with propriety be brought home, I can well conceive that the interest of Britain would be promoted by the subsistence and stability of the East India Companies of other States, in so far as those companies could be made the channels of remittances to this country, by paying to the Treasury here what they received from the Treasury in India. I am aware I may be told that if other European nations could bring them home advantageously in the shape of commerce, we may do the same ourselves. I readily admit the force of this reasoning to its full extent, but I believe it to be a mistake to suppose that the trade of any country, be it as prosperous as it may, can so effectually ensure to itself a monopoly as to exclude a considerable share to each country, to the extent at least of its own consumption. What I mean is that, although the great share of the trade of both India and China ought and probably will be in the hands of Great Britain, still France, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and other countries will certainly have a share, and to the extent that goes, may be used as useful channels of remittance of our revenues. In this view the existence of East India Companies in other nations may be beneficial for us, because we could not be trusting the individuals of those nations with loans in India, however safely or wisely we might be induced to give credit to established companies. In what I have said I have stated the whole interest I feel we have in the existence or fate of the East India Companies of other European nations. But such an interest is surely not sufficient to induce us to take upon ourselves any load to save the credit of the East India Company of any other nation, and least of all of Holland in its present distracted state. I omit to dwell on the almost impossibility of doing it with any effect on account of the charter of your own East India Company, but I need not in writing to you enlarge on the ignorance and narrow-mindedness of that society. It would be in vain to state to them the happy effects to both nations from a liberal exercise of the trade and industry of both. They would feel every bale of goods that went to Holland, although bought from their own provinces in India, as so many pounds taken out of their pockets, and would of course execrate any idea of interposing, or of the public interposing, to save the India Company of Holland. And it will not escape your observation that if, in such an arrangement, any idea should be adopted of not taking the benefit of the article of the treaty of peace relative to the navigation of the Eastern seas, the East India Company, while their charter subsists, have an absolute negative upon such an idea; for they have by their charter and public treaty a right to that navigation exclusive of other British subjects. And I leave you to judge how far it would be practicable to bring their minds to any concessions which could enable you in the present moment to make any permanent arrangement with the Dutch East India Company. You will, therefore, perceive that the result of what I have wrote is, that, although it may be highly beneficial to derive every information from Mr. Boer, I see no opening upon which you can act to promote the object he has immediately in view, namely, the relief of the Dutch East India Company. But after saying this, I have no hesitation in stating it decisively as my opinion that if, either as a means of settling the disturbances of Holland advantageously for us, or of negotiating with the ruling power of the States after they are settled, a strict union between Great Britain and Holland can be restored in India, it is an object of the first magnitude; nor does it occur to me that there can be any difficulty in effectuating it, if the ruling powers of the two countries are so circumstanced in point of disposition to each other as to bring the subject fairly into discussion. I know it is usual to say that the Dutch have no pretension to the almost exclusive possession of the spice trade, and that it is in our power to obtain it to ourselves if we will use the proper means. I may be wrong, but I have always felt differently from others upon that subject, in so much as ought to make me diffident of my own opinion. I cannot feel the importance of the spice trade, nor have I the least disposition to disturb the Dutch in the possession of it. No doubt if Holland and Great Britain are to be on the footing of enemies, or even hostile rivals, in trade to each other, we must aim at the spice trade as a means of annoying them; but laying that idea out of the question, I have no hesitation in thinking that an amicable footing with Holland in India would be cheaply purchased by a total surrender to them of the spice trade, which is the great object of their jealousy. What I mean by an amicable footing is a complete enjoyment of the advantages of the Cape and Trincomalé and the arsenals of Batavia in time of war. The cession of Trincomalé to us in return for Negapatan would undoubtedly be a most advantageous transaction. In short, any transaction which makes the Dutch and us friends in place of enemies in India is a good one for us; and in saying this, I desire to be understood as meaning to leave them the exclusive possession of the spice trade, which, according to the ideas which they entertain of that trade is all they can possibly desire. As to a mutual guarantee of Indian possessions nothing certainly can be safer for us or wiser for them. There can be no difficulty in accommodating them as to opium and saltpetre, but we cannot with any propriety give any further communication of the right of exporting salt without imposing a material revenue. In every other respect there can be no difficulty in placing them on the same footing as the French. When talking of Trincomalé and the navigation of the Eastern seas you write as if the possession of these was incompatible with the interest of the Dutch on account of the spice trade, but I do not exactly follow what you mean in that observation. I do not see how there is any inconsistency between their having the exclusive spice trade, and yet our having Trincomalé as a safe asylum for our fleets, and our having a free navigation in the Eastern seas for the purposes of our China trade, and likewise for the purpose of opening new markets both for our Indian and European manufactures.

"I trust what I have said may be sufficient to put you in possession of all my ideas on the subject of your letter. I would certainly have come to Loudon in place of writing, but I am sure my doing so can be of no importance. If any of the ideas I have thrown out, or which may occur to yourself or Mr. Pitt, can be acted upon at this moment, it can only be in your negotiations for settling the disturbances; but in the present state of Holland there can be no room for concluding a national treaty, which is the only one I can see wisdom in negotiating between Holland and us relative to our Indian interests. I have already stated that if the particular Chamber of Zealand, as essentially connected with the prosperity of that province, is to be furnished with any relief, it may be expedient to do it; but that can only be on the ground of European policy, independent of the national interest in India, to which view of the subject I have confined what I have troubled you with.

"I am this far on my way to the north of Scotland on a visit to Sir James Grant, General Grant, Duke of Gordon, Lord Findlater, and Lord Fife. They are all very hostile to each other; and yet I am told that a visit from me may probably have the effect of uniting their political interests in such a manner as to co-operate for securing five seats in Parliament at the general election in the interest of Government; whereas, if I do not interpose, there is a danger of their getting into immediate warfare among themselves, and, if that happens, it is a throw of the dice how their competitions may ultimately end. When I tell you that I was living idly and pleasantly with a few chosen friends in my Highland retreat you will not suppose that this is a jaunt of pleasure, but I must undertake it; and I am sorry to perceive that our opponents are beginning even already to take their measures in this part of the world with a view to a general election. So that between this and Christmas I am afraid I must pay more attention to that business in general than is compatible with the ease and comfort I had proposed to myself during my residence in Scotland. Unless something unforeseen occurred to call me to London, I have no thoughts of it till after Christmas. My idea of returning in October is only in the event of my getting down at the beginning of summer, before the arrival of the summer ships from India; but, as we answered them this year by the Ranger, I have no business to carry me to London. Mr. Pitt will have informed you how everything was arranged relative to Meadows, and I trust you would approve of everything. I have thought over everything again since I came down, and I cannot recollect anything that is omitted.

"I am exceedingly comforted by Mr. Pitt's letters relative to Holland. It will be truly splendid if we can be piloted through these rough waters without a war, and at the same time creditably and with permanent utility to this country."

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 4, Hague.—"I am greatly obliged to you for your kind letter of the 23rd August, and can only repeat what I have already said, that it will give me the greatest pleasure if the few days we passed together here should lay the foundation of an intimate and lasting acquaintance.

"I have a point or two on which I stand in need of your assistance. I have mentioned in several of my late letters that my fund is exhausted. Our friends are distressed for money; one hundred and forty thousand florins are due on the Gelderland subsidy, and the troops expect to be paid on the 10th, which without a certainty of this sum being forthcoming, it will [be] impossible to effect. Thirty thousand are to [be] expended at the Brielle, and as many will be wanted in Friesland. Allow me, therefore, to entreat you to press Mr. Pitt for the immediate payment of 20,000*l.* into my banker's hands, who has directions how to dispose of it; otherwise our friends will be in the greatest perplexity, and I shall not have kept my word with them. This is really a matter of the last consequence.

"You will see from my despatches an indirect proposal for a plan of active co-operations. I have repeated it just as it came to me. As matters now stand there is no pretext for our committing an act which would be one of aggression, and the very demonstration desired would in my mind be too much on the slight grounds it is proposed. I have written to the Princess of Orange that it is a matter of too much consequence to be undertaken without a previous arrangement, and that I conceive neither the Duke or myself are invested with full powers to treat to the extent of this proposition. I have at the same time reason to believe the Duke of Brunswick has asked for these full powers; and I submit it to you whether, to avoid loss of time, it would not be expedient to prepare such instructions for me as may enable me to treat with him on this point if I should be call[ed] upon by him, and if it should be thought advisable.

"Notwithstanding the strong assurances and positive assertions in the Princess's letter to me, I am still in doubt as to what will be the final conduct of His Prussian Majesty; and till we see the effect of our last messenger (the 24th August) to Berlin, I would not willingly venture to engage ourselves too far with him.

"I am satisfied France means either to evade a mediation entirely, or, by introducing a new constitution and an army in that Province to render its effect fruitless. Our firmness and the not allowing France to procrastinate or prevaricate, can alone defeat her designs. We stand so high at this moment in the esteem of Europe, and France so low, that I think we may venture the experiment without a risk. You may be assured if we are moderate France will be violent, and that it will be very difficult to effect a half cure. If any one is sent to England I will take care it shall be Nagel.

"We are surrounded by free corps, who are hovering round the skirts of the Hague and keep the inhabitants in a constant alarm. This morning they were at the gates of the town, and I expect every day they will commit some outrages on the dwellings of the well-disposed inhabitants, which, if attempted, may lead to scenes of destruction without end."

W. W. GRENVILLE to SIR JAMES HARRIS.

1787, September 7, Whitehall.—"The uncertainty of the hands into which any letters addressed to you may fall while the Hague is circumstanced as it now is, prevents my troubling you with such reflections as occur to me on the present state of affairs, which I should otherwise be desirous of doing from an anxiety to avail myself of the wish which you are so good as to express on the subject, rather than for the sake of any information or amusement which I can flatter myself you would derive from my correspondence. Lord Carmarthen's dispatches to yourself and to Mr. Ewart will state to you more fully, and much more securely than I could, what is felt here with regard to every part of the present crisis, which I take to be one of the most important that this country has ever seen. A few weeks must now probably decide on points the most interesting to us. In the interval it is impossible not to feel a very strong and painful anxiety for the result.

"I mentioned to you in my last letter that the business of the Africa was in a perfectly good train. Immediately after I came over here I had an opportunity of conversing on the subject with Mr. Beresford, the First Commissioner of the Revenue in Ireland. I learnt from him that it was never in the idea of the Revenue Board to seize the property belonging to the company, although legally it might have been done. They are now perfectly ready to restore the ship, exactly on the same terms on which they released a ship belonging to our own East India Company which had been detained under similar circumstances in 1785. The whole business might, as he told me, have been settled long ago if there had not been persons here who advised the people not to make the necessary submission, in order to drive matters to extremities, with what view you will not be at a loss to guess. Mr. Beresford is since returned to Ireland, and I have written to him to beg that he will state to me the present situation of this business and the nature of the conditions required, with more exactness than he could do in conversation here.

"I have also made enquiries with respect to the business which you mentioned to me on the subject of Lord Aghrim. I find that the opinions of all persons here who are conversant with the subject agree that he could not, consistently with the Act of Settlement, be appointed to a commission in the army at large, and that even a bill of naturalization would not make it more possible. But there is one regiment in our service (the 62nd, I think) into which foreigners are permitted to be introduced, by virtue of an express Act of Parliament which was made for that purpose. And when they thus become a part of our army, there is no law which prevents them from being employed in our service out of England. It was in this manner that Prevoot and Haldimand came into the army, the former of whom commanded the expedition against Savannah in the last war, and the latter was for several years Governor of Quebec. It would not be difficult by the means of removing to make a vacancy in this regiment for the purpose of introducing Lord Aghrim. In case of service he would find opportunities enough of being employed abroad; in time of peace his promotion would, I should think, from his rank and situation not be less rapid in that regiment than in the army at large, especially as a large proportion of the officers in it are now English and might consequently move into other corps; and ultimately his rank of a peer of Ireland (whensoever that takes place) would, I conceive, remove all difficulties. If this idea should be thought satisfactory I have reason to be persuaded that there would be every disposition here to facilitate it; and, if it should be wished, I would undertake that it should be properly mentioned to the king.

"You will have heard that the Archbishop of Toulouse is declared First Minister, and that there is a new Controller General, making the fourth since the month of May. I understand that the opinion which is formed in the public of M. de Brienne's abilities by no means keeps pace with the increase of his honours. It is said that they will be obliged to modify the stamp duties."

Postscript.—"I have this day received yours of the 4th. I have particularly pressed the first point which you mention, and you will see by Lord Carmarthen's dispatch that it is done, notwithstanding some difficulty that occurred from the dispersion of the Lords of the Treasury at this season of the year. Pray have the goodness to let me know in your next letter whether you have destroyed the cipher which I left with you, and, if not, whether you was able to make out the few lines I sent you from Brussels."

Holograph Copy.

W. W. GRENVILLE to COUNT C. F. BENTINCK.

1787, September 7, Whitehall.—"It will always afford me the greatest pleasure to have an opportunity of expressing to you in person, either here or at the Hague, how happy I am in the circumstances which began our acquaintance; but I should certainly derive much additional satisfaction from them if I could ever flatter myself that they had been in any degree serviceable to a cause in which I saw so much reason to interest myself, independently even of the concern which every Englishman has in it.

"I was much obliged to you for the papers which you was so good as to enclose. The remarks on the Prussian preliminaries had been received here before. They arrived at a moment when such a communication was particularly useful, and they were considered here with all the attention to which they were so justly entitled. If it does not trespass too much on your time I should be particularly glad to receive from you, from time to time, such other papers as you may think interesting. When I was at the Hague Mr. Vancitters gave me the printed account of the detention of the Princess, but by some accident I have mislaid it, and it is not to be had here. If you would allow me I would beg you to send it me."

Drift.

W. W. GRENVILLE to SIR JAMES HARRIS.

Private.

1787, September 21, Whitehall.—"You will learn from the public despatches the nature of the commission which I have undertaken. It is thought here that the language of Monsieur de Montmorin still holds out a desire on the part of France not to come to extremities; and that if a person was sent with power to agree immediately on all the material points in discussion, they might be inclined to conclude such an agreement on terms favourable to our interests. But in order to afford any hope of doing this it is clearly felt that our preparations must be vigorous and rapid, and our language firm.

"The general idea which has been pointed out to me of such an agreement is this; that instead of an armistice for the purpose of negotiation, with all the difficulties to which it is liable, the three Courts should immediately agree on all the leading points, and declare their opinion upon them, pledging themselves at the same time to each other not to support in any case any persons who should act in opposition to those principles. Such an agreement should contain an article for enforcing the laws (which I understand from Boers are actually existing) against all military arrays without the authority of the magistrate. Another for restoring to the Regencies and Councils the persons who have been dismissed by force or threats in any of the Provinces since the beginning of the troubles. A third for restoring the Prince to his dignities as confirmed to him in 1766. And in order to secure the essential points of the règlements, and at the same time to give some appearance to France of not being entirely driven from all her ground, there might be a fourth article in which it should be said that the Stadtholder and the Provincial States should deliberate freely on the subjects of the règlements, and of any alterations to be made with respect to the functions of the Captain General. Perhaps it might be proper to go so far in this as to say that the Powers should expressly recommend to the Stadtholder and the States to adopt such alterations in the règlements, and such an arrangement on the points of the jurisdiction militaire, and of the patentes, as shall be found expedient on full consideration.

"You will immediately perceive that, as the above idea includes the three essential points of restoring the Stadtholder, and the Regents, and disbanding the free corps previous to the deliberation, it can never be acceded to by France unless she has determined fairly to renounce her objects; and, on the other hand, that if these points are carried, we can run no danger by stipulating the sort of recommendation which I have stated. I think even that, if it could be done, it might be advisable to make this recommendation still more particular by pointing it to the specific mode of alteration as well as to the objects to be altered. I am by no means sufficiently informed to do this, and I know your difficulties on the subject; but the importance of smoothing the ground for France, if she is desirous of retreating, will, I am sure, induce you to do all you can, and to communicate the result to me at Paris as soon as possible.

"The whole is only an experiment, and one which is most likely not to succeed, but it is surely worth trying; and at the same time it is of the utmost importance that it should not affect either our armaments or the Duke of Brunswick's operations. You will see in the despatches the sort of modification which we think may take place on the satisfaction; but this only in the case that France should acquiesce in our terms of accommodation, and that the King of Prussia should be satisfied both with the one and the other. I hope the Duke of Brunswick will proceed with activity, and I can give you the fullest assurances that there is a determination here to go to all extremities, if it is necessary."

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 21, Downing Street.—“Sir James Harris’s despatch is arrived, confirming and adding to the good news. His account of the towns which had surrendered is nearly the same, with the exception of Rotterdam, which his letter (finished on Wednesday morning) mentions only as likely to surrender immediately, but not as having actually done so. But what is more than all the rest, most of the Patriots and some of the Deputies of that side had abandoned the Hague, the free corps there were in a great measure disarmed, the populace tumultuous in their joy, and an extraordinary assembly of the States of Holland on Tuesday night, composed of the Equestrian Order, and the town of Delft, Haarlem, Leyden, Amsterdam, Gouda, Brill, Enkhuyzen, Edam, and Medemblick, voted the restoration of the Stadtholder to all his dignities on the footing of the year 1766, and to the command of the Hague. Amsterdam did not vote. The rest were unanimous. It seems, however, that the Deputies who have withdrawn will, if they keep possession of the town of Amsterdam, set out an assembly of the States there. But by Sir James Harris’s intelligence, Naarden and Muiden were supposed to be already taken by another of the Prussian columns, in which case Amsterdam itself would, I imagine; be less likely to hold out. Of these last facts, however, he was not absolutely certain. He speaks of the whole transaction as being as complete a revolution as that of the year 1747, and only wishes it may be as lasting. It seems on the first view that the chief points we have to state to France are in fact gained already. The Stadtholder restored, and invited back to the Hague; the free corps in a great measure disarmed, or at least dispersed; the Regencies in many of the towns probably re-established; and the Province of Holland in such a state as to be more likely to join the other Provinces against France than to interfere in altering their respective governments. One might almost be tempted to tell Monsieur de Montmorin in his own language que c’est une affaire terminée. On the whole, however, it is best still to be moderate, and I do not see why you should not take the credit of having instructions which were prepared before the news of this event, and are not altered in consequence of it. Only it seems probable that the satisfaction may be now put out of the question, as it will have been completely accomplished. I have added a second postscript to Ewart to tell him that we suppose this to be the case; and that, if it proves so, it remains only to procure the assent of Prussia to our terms of negotiation on the other points. What can I say more?”

Postscript.—“There is a despatch from Berlin, dated the 11th, which looks as if the King of Prussia would be disposed to insist on the other points being settled as well as the satisfaction.”

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 22, 9 p.m., Downing Street.—“Another account arrived from Sir James Harris this evening, which left the Hague only at three yesterday morning. I send you an abstract of the contents. The satisfaction to the King of Prussia seems likely to have been completely settled by this time. The restoration of the Stadtholder to all his rights, without any modification, may perhaps make it impossible for us now to stipulate a recommendation, even respecting the patents and the military jurisdiction. I am not clear from Sir James Harris’s dispatches and the former accounts, whether the Deputies who have now voted by so large a majority of the States the Prince’s restoration, are the legal Deputies, or have been sent in consequence of the recent change of the Regencies. This may make it advisable to be cautious in the manner of speaking of restoring the lawful Regencies in Holland till we hear more distinctly how the matter now stands. The proposal for disarming the free corps, and for leaving the several Provincial States to deliberate on the règlements, are still clearly right in their principle, though, in fact, they may be nearly superfluous as the end is probably obtained. The best line that occurs to me at present is that your language should be on every point (except that of the satisfaction which should be treated as a point now probably decided) the same as it would have been according to your instructions, and by no means less conciliatory; but accompanied at the same time with a doubt as from yourself how far the events which have since happened may vary the application of the principles laid down. It is clearly advisable that our terms should not appear to rise from this appearance of success, but it seems really true that some of the points are no longer matter for negotiation. All these, however, are only first thoughts; and what I have most to desire is perhaps somewhat unseasonable, that you will use your own discretion on the spot. I send you this letter, such as it is, in great haste, because it is above all material that you should know the facts as soon as possible. You shall hear again very soon. Whether it ends in peace or war, things now cannot go ill."

Private.

The MARQUIS OF CARMARTHEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 22, Whitehall.—"The very important accounts from the Hague, received last night and this evening, have, as you may easily conceive, given the utmost satisfaction. I enclose you a précis of their contents, as several points which were before considered as matters of negotiation seem already to have been amply provided for in a more expeditious manner; and some others require reconsideration from the nature of the great revolution which has taken place.

"The conversion of several of the towns (composing the States of Holland) to the true faith, will make it rather unpleasant to suppose their Deputies have been illegally or even irregularly chosen; and yet it will be very difficult to pass over our former complaints upon their forcible intrusion if any part of that subject has been already touched upon by Mr. Eden, and that M. de Montmorin should again choose to make it matter of discussion.

"This part of the subject is, however, as well as the rest, in such good hands at present, that though I scarce know how to quiet my apprehensions on its entangling us a little with France, by any resource of my own imagination, I have the fullest confidence in your ability to extricate us from it should the case arise.

"The menace from Amsterdam does not occasion much apprehension at the Hague, and none at all on this side the water.

"Bourgoin and Caillard are perfectly silent. They could not indeed have received any fresh instructions since the news of the Prussian troops having entered the Province of Holland could have reached Versailles; but it seems strange they were not furnished with that most common of French commodities, good words and promises of assistance in case of need."

1787, September 21, Hague.—"The Prince of Orange arrived at the Hague on Thursday at 2 p.m., was met by a deputation from the States General, another from the States of Holland, the Council of State, the Equestrian Order, the Committee Rada, the Courts of Justice, and all the different colleges; all the foreign ministers except the French, Spanish, and American, went to compliment him. It is impossible to describe the universal joy at the Hague. There is still an appearance of resistance at Amsterdam, and they talk of breaking down the sea dikes rather than submit. (This was not at all believed.) Fifteen towns were present in the States of Holland, who were unceasing in voting addresses to the Stadtholder. No account has been received of the preparations on the side of France, but it was in contemplation for the States of Holland to come to a resolution declaring that the Prince of Orange was reinstated in all his rights; that it was determined to give the King of Prussia the satisfaction required; and therefore the resolution of the 9th instant, applying for assistance to the Court of France, was rescinded."

Abstract.

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 23, Downing Street.—"I do not like sending you a dispatch which contains so little ground to act upon as that you will now receive; but I do not know how we could say anything more precise at present; and it seemed right to take some notice immediately of the language last held by Monsieur de Montmorin, which is referred to in the beginning of the dispatch. From that language I think at present it will be peace. But it looks more like withdrawing altogether from the affairs of Holland than entering heartily into a mediation. Much, however, will depend upon the news of what passes at Amsterdam. If France can be made a party to the settlement on our terms (even though with some slight concessions so as in some degree to save appearances) it will be somewhat more difficult for her to take an opportunity of disturbing a settlement so made hereafter. If she withdraws altogether perhaps the present triumph in Holland will be more complete, and the immediate effects of the revolution more decisive. I am not quite clear which of these two circumstances we ought most to wish; though the prevailing opinion here, particularly of the Chancellor and the Duke of Richmond, is much in favour of the former. At all events, if France shows a readiness to negotiate, and events in Holland admit of it, we must certainly meet them readily on the principles we have professed, as far as they are really applicable to the circumstances. The additional circumstance of personal security for their friends may, in the present moment, be a great object with them, and I trust our friends in the Provinces may be reconciled to it. I do not make out from our accounts from the Hague whether any formal step had been taken for giving completely the satisfaction asked by the King of Prussia, but that point will no doubt have been settled before this time, and you will be freed from any embarrassment on that part of the business. As to our other points of negotiation, if France should agree to them, the form must, I think, be varied from what it would have been. Most of them are carried into effect, and they may now be rather to be recognised than stipulated for. Perhaps guarantying or in some mode acknowledging the restoration of the Stadtholder according to the settlement of 1766, accompanied by the indemnity (if agreed to) and any other modifications, would answer every purpose. I am not sure whether it includes the security we should wish respecting the règlements; perhaps the substance of what we proposed is enough gained, if the States of Holland, as will now be case, desist from the attempt to enforce alterations. As to disbanding the free corps, it will be to a great degree have taken place in the present moment; and you seemed to think the laws already subsisting on this point as strong as they could be made. The point of restoring everywhere the lawful magistrates seems to be capable of producing some embarrassment, as I cannot find whether the Deputies, whose votes restored the Prince of Orange, were appointed under the old Constitution, or in consequence of the late innovations. I have endeavoured, as you will see, to state this question to Harris, and you will know from him the state of it. Let me know what you think of all this. Even in these two days I feel no small difference in not being able to have your opinion on things as they arise. I think, however, all is going well, and our preparations will not be slow. The necessity of waiting to hear from Prussia, and still more the possible effect of events which may happen every hour in Holland, will, I hope, make it less uncomfortable to you than it would otherwise be, not to be able to come more precisely to a point."

WILLIAM EDEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 23, Seve [Sevrès].—"I shall be impatient to see you here. I have a tolerably good apartment for you; you will lose much time by coming through Paris. The road is from St. Denys to Seve. My hotel is presque en face du pont."

WILLIAM EDEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 25, Seve [Sevrès].—"I am this moment arrived from the quarter in which your note is dated. I have waylaid you upon the Calais road in vain to entreat you to come directly here, where I can give you an apartment as comfortable as what you have at Paris at least, and I have sent a note to the same effect to-day to Paris.

"It is material to me, if possible, to have a conversation with you even to-night, and yet I fear that you will feel too much fatigued to come. I send my valet de chambre to town with this; if you will come here and sleep here he will get you post horses instantly, and you will be here at half-past eight. I have detained all this day a messenger whom it is material to dispatch to England to-night that he may arrive early on Friday morning. He carries the answers to your communications, and very important accounts of the change of affairs, to a degree in favour of our friends in Holland, which seems to have settled the business in the opinions not only there but here.

"If you cannot come, I shall be tempted either to go to you as soon as I receive a word of answer and have finished my dispatch, or to wait on you in the morning at 11; but you will be better here if you will accept moderate good quarters."

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 25, 2 p.m., Downing Street.—"I wait with much impatience for the account of your first interview. By Eden's dispatch, received to-day, it seems still uncertain whether France wishes to negotiate at all; and by what we heard from Harris to-day (dated Friday evening) it is at least equally doubtful whether our friends in Holland will now admit them to the mediation.

"The chief object of sending this messenger is that you may be certain to receive the Resolution of the States of Holland, which furnishes excellent ground to reason upon with the French Ministers. Some other observations are added, not perhaps of much importance; but they were thought necessary, and can at least do no harm."

W. W. GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1787, September 25, Seve.—"I came here this evening from Paris and have received much satisfaction from the account of the state of things here. Monsieur de Montmorin's answer seems to preclude all idea of a negotiation with France in the present moment on the Dutch business; but that affair appears to be in a train to execute itself more satisfactorily than could be done by any agreement here. I shall, however, think it right when I see him to-morrow to state the king's readiness to enter into the discussion; but if he declines it there can be no reason for my pressing it, as this would be useless if they are determined to go on, and still more so if they mean to withdraw themselves. The very circumstance of their not making military preparations is a strong argument for the latter supposition, as the delay will enable the Duke of Brunswick and the Stadtholder's friends to do whatever shall remain undone; though by the accounts here I doubt whether there is anything falling under that description.

"Our objects would, I imagine, be unquestionably much better answered by an agreement which should oblige France to renounce her preparations, after the demonstration she has made, than by any stipulations on particular points of arrangement; especially as such an agreement, if made under the present circumstances, would necessarily imply a free liberty to the King of Prussia to continue his operations till his objects are completely attained. It is impossible for me to pretend to say how far such an agreement could be carried here, but it seems so advantageous a way of our settling the business, that I almost doubt whether we ought not to risk it here if circumstances should be favourable; but I am perfectly clear that you should give us instructions for that purpose, and explain to Prussia that the proposed article applied to existing circumstances, and that we had always told her we engaged for nothing more than to keep France from obstructing the operations of the Duke of Brunswick.

"If you concur in this opinion, and such an agreement could be concluded, the whole of my mission may be over in six or seven days. Even in the contrary case I see no advantage from my remaining here any longer than that time, nor if France is disposed to admit it as an affaire décidée even without expressly saying so. We can desire no more."

Holograph Copy.

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 25, 4 p.m., Downing Street.—"Since writing my other note, a point occurs to me on which I wish for your opinion. The moment seems come to think of renewing in some shape or other our alliance with Holland, and we write to Sir James Harris to-day to sound in general the disposition of our friends concerning it. If it is to be attempted, should it include the former stipulation of free ships, free goods, or not? If it does not, there may be more difficulty in carrying it, and it may furnish ground to France for urging that our connection, besides the risk of leading them into a war, would, even where the casus fœderis might not apply, deprive them of the chief benefit of neutrality. If it is included, it may furnish new ground to Russia, whom circumstances might perhaps otherwise bring to some practicable expedient. As to any real effect, I doubt whether the thing itself signifies much. We can hardly be engaged in any but a defensive war, and if they should not choose in that event to admit the casus fœderis, we may, if we are strong enough, consider this stipulation as no longer binding. On the other hand, if we should be weak, they may always insist on the principle as part of the law of nations, even though it is not recognised by treaty."

Postscript.—"The intended communications are sent to Spain, Russia, and Denmark."

W. W. GRENVILLE to SIR JAMES HARRIS.

1787, September 26, Seve.—"I arrived at Paris on Monday evening, and received this morning from Lord Carmarthen an abstract of your dispatch to him containing the very satisfactory account of what has passed at the Hague. I know the pleasure which you will have felt on this occasion, and congratulate you most sincerely upon it.

"As there is another messenger here I thought it would be useful to you to send Needham to the Hague, in order that you might know the state of things here. It appears in the present moment highly probable that the Government of this country will consider the Dutch business as an affair already decided, and no longer affording any room for the intervention of France. There is every reason to believe that they have not yet given orders for the march of any troops, and the season is advancing so fast that a delay is in point of effect the same with a determination not to act. They are taking measures for arming their fleet, but I apprehend this is rather from the necessity of keeping pace with England in this respect than from any idea of hostile operations, unless anything new should arise. I hope the resistance of Amsterdam is over, so as not to give their friends there a claim to call upon them for protection.

"I have not yet seen Monsieur de Montmorin, and the turn which things have taken will make me think it right to confine what I have to say to him to a general statement of the views of England with respect to the negotiation, supposing that circumstances had been favourable for continuing it. I understand that it is most probable that he will decline any further discussion on the subject, and I shall certainly not think it necessary to press it.

"It would, I think, be of great importance that Ewart should be informed of this, particularly as the sending any instructions to Goltze in the present moment would, I imagine, be more likely to embarrass than assist us."

Postscript.—"Pray let no time be lost in taking proper measures for putting the garrisons and forces in the East Indies into proper hands, as so much would depend on this if, after all, we should be obliged to fight for our object; which, though not probable, is still possible."

Draft.

W. W. GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1787, September 27, Paris.—"I have written to Monsieur de Montmorin and expect that he will appoint me either this evening or to-morrow morning. I do not trouble Lord Carmarthen with a letter till I am able to state the result of the conversation, but, as I may probably be a good deal hurried when I send off the messenger, I sit down in the interval to mention what occurs to me on the present situation of this Dutch business.

“Your letter of the 26th and Lord Carmarthen’s dispatch of the same date mention the two lines which are now thought the most likely for the conduct of France. The first, that of a silent acquiescence in what has been done; the other, that of her consenting to join with us in a guarantee of the constitution of 1766. You state a doubt which of these would be most desirable, but I think the reasoning of both letters seems to point the guaranty as preferable to the other. It is most probable that the option will not be with us, and that the answer which I shall receive from Monsieur de Montmorin when I see him will be conformable to that which he has already made, declining to enter into any further discussion of the business in the present situation of affairs. We may, however, I think, now look with confidence to a complete acquiescence, either implied by their taking no further steps and leaving the Duke of Brunswick to finish what he has begun, or, perhaps, even expressed by an agreement to disarm, notwithstanding that those very circumstances have happened, the fear of which was their professed reason for arming. And either of these would, I take for granted, be thought a turn of the business with which we should have no reason to be dissatisfied, whatever your wishes might be with respect to a guaranty. For my own part, speaking with that freedom with which you desired me to state my opinion on any question which might occur, I confess the acquiescence of France, if sufficiently secured, appears to me more desirable than even her concurrence in the measure of a guaranty, supposing this latter could be obtained. To make it possible for France to accede to such a measure we must hold out some concessions, and we must bind ourselves to abide by the constitution of 1766. The concession which you justly think France would be most anxious to obtain is that of an amnesty for her friends. But the Dutch Ambassador here has expressed himself to Mr. Eden in such a manner on this subject as shows that he understands this to have been already held out by the Prince of Orange. With respect to any other stipulations of this nature they must relate to the Patentes, the military jurisdiction, and the règlements. You know the difficulties which we have in stating the particulars of these, and I imagine that they will be much augmented by the turn which things have taken. There is also a consideration on the subject of 1766 which seems to me deserving of attention. No one can certainly wish that we should encourage any measures for the gratification of the Prince of Orange’s ambition, and still less of his revenge, supposing him actuated by either of those passions, which I most sincerely believe he is not. But if the acquiescence of France were secured, and men of reason and moderation in the Republic were disposed to extend the privileges of an office which is so essential to be maintained, and so little able to maintain itself, we surely are not prepared to say that we should wish to have bound ourselves to oppose every such alteration.

“With these difficulties on one hand, I own that on the other the advantage of a guaranty does not appear to me so considerable as it is felt by others much better able to judge of it. Under all the circumstances of vexation and disgust which France must feel at the event of her Dutch intrigues, may it not well be doubted whether the French Government will still continue to pursue Monsieur de Vergennes’s system in Holland, especially while foreign affairs remain under the direction of Monsieur de Montmorin who has expressed himself so decidedly averse to the whole measure. If they should, I cannot think that a guaranty would prevent them from acting by the same underhand measures as before; nor that they would have any difficulty (when things were again brought to their crisis under more favourable circumstances) in finding pretexts for doing once more exactly what they have now done. But, on the other hand, if they should be disposed in great measure to abandon the business, would not a guaranty tend very much to prevent this by entangling them in every discussion, and making them a party in every quarrel that may arise. I do not know whether these considerations are entitled to any weight with respect to the permanent effect of the two modes of settling this business. In addition to these I have a strong impression that the whole transaction would have a much more complete and creditable appearance for us in the present moment if it was terminated not only in exact conformity to our wishes, but without even the intervention of France. I again repeat, however, that, although it may be advantageous to discuss this question thoroughly, the decision of it will in all probability not rest with us.

27th.—“Since I wrote the above I have received Monsieur de Montmorin’s answer appointing me for to-morrow. This delay is, I think, a strong additional ground to believe that he will not agree to any negotiation on these points. If this should be the case, I submit to you whether there would not be a considerable degree of impropriety in my remaining here longer than is necessary for me to receive the answer to my account of that conference. It could be productive of no good effect, and would have the appearance of courting a negotiation in a manner very inconsistent with the high situation in which we stand at present. I trust that you will do me the justice to believe that my own personal convenience is an object which I would most willingly sacrifice to any prospect of being of service at such a crisis as this; but, if there is no appearance of my being useful by remaining here, it would certainly be highly satisfactory to me to be allowed to return.”

Draft.

W. W. GRENVILLE to the MARQUIS OF CARMARTHEN.

1787, September 27, Paris.—“I am much obliged to you for your letter and for the communication of the very satisfactory news from the Hague. I envy Sir James Harris the pleasure which he must have had in communicating the overthrow of his old friends the Patriots. The intelligence has not been received here with much patience, almost everybody concurring to blame their Ministry and to sing the triumph of England. I hope to God they will not be able to rail the French Government out of their acquiescence; and, for the rest, I confess myself very indifferent about it.

“I shall be curious to hear what Montmorin says upon it, but I am given to understand that he is to say little, and to be exceedingly cold, reserved, and polite. If this is the case I see no necessity for my giving myself much trouble to put him into better humour, and I shall hope for the King’s permission to return to England immediately.”

Holograph Copy.

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, September 28, Downing Street.—“Your letter and Eden’s despatches came this morning. I think war seems out of the question, and we certainly should on every account endeavour to settle the business as soon as possible, when once our object is secure, which I really think is nearly the case at present. It seems, however, impossible to agree to disarm without previous concert with Prussia and Holland. No difficulty, I think, can arise in either quarter, as they are both as much interested as ourselves in a speedy and quiet settlement; and the acting to this extent separately from Prussia would not, in my opinion, be consistent with the engagements we have authorised Ewart to form. This objection, if well founded, is alone sufficient; but besides this, the risk of giving any jealousy at Berlin seems still a serious one. The worst part that I know of the plan we have acted upon is that it necessarily prolongs your stay for a fortnight more, instead of the six or seven days in which you seemed to think all might be ended. The mail came to-day from Holland, with nothing very particular and no decisive news yet of Amsterdam; but its surrender seems immediately expected, and everything was going on well."

Postscript.—"I should not omit that by Sir James Harris's accounts, our friends in Holland seemed bent not to admit the interference of France. Monsieur de Montmorin seems equally determined to decline it, and I am more confirmed in thinking that making them acquiesce is better than making them parties."

W. W. GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1787, October 1, Paris.—"I had written you a long letter to go by this messenger, but what I had said is in great measure superseded by the result of Eden's conference with Monsieur de Montmorin, and the rest will be better explained in person. I trust that it is impossible I can do wrong in coming over at this crisis. Nothing could be done here till Ewart's letter is received, which cannot be till the 12th at soonest; and much advantage may, I think, arise from my seeing you in the interval.

"My situation has been sufficiently uneasy especially since the language here has been so warlike. My first conference was particularly difficult, because I was obliged to determine what line to follow without any instructions from home that could at all assist me. I guess from what we have received from England to-day that I shall be thought to have leant too much to the idea of present negotiation. And this is the more unfortunate because what I said on that head was against my own judgment, but in order not to preclude that line if it had been determined in England that it ought to be pressed. At present the appearance certainly is that as soon as Ewart's letter is received we shall all disarm. It is a great question then whether to wish negotiation or not, and this must be in a great degree decided on what Harris says of the situation in which Holland will be left.

"You will, however, I am sure, feel that while the thing is so uncertain, and France expressly tells you qu'il n'est pas possible de ralentir, which were Montmorin's words to Eden, it is of the utmost importance that we should proceed with as much vigour as if war were certain.

"Pray turn in your mind the point about Russia and the Porte. It is very probable that Montmorin may say something upon it to-morrow."

Draft.

W. W. MILES to the MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM.

1787, October 1, Liege.—"From the very instant that the Prussians prepared to invade Holland, I arranged my measures so well that I should have had the earliest intelligence of the motions of the French at Givet, and would certainly have given immediate information of their marching not only to the Marquis of Carmarthen but to Sir James Harris and the Duke of Brunswick. Expresses arriving continually at the Secretary of the French Envoy, and Deputies from Holland passing daily through Liege in their way to Paris to solicit the promised succour, kept me in a perpetual alarm for several days; and especially as Lord Torrington in his different letters always insisted, in opposition to my assurances to the contrary, that there were assembled 25,000 men ready to march on the frontiers of this country, in the neighbourhood of Givet.

"In this dilemma, I prevailed upon a friend, a man of property, who had large contracts in the war before the last, and perfectly acquainted with the country, to go to the very spot, and inform himself fully of particulars. He set off the 25th, and enclosed your Lordship will receive a copy of his letter to me on his return; since which I have seen him, and he informs me that at Ciney, in his way from Givet, he passed the evening on the 28th of September with the Bourgmastres of Utrecht and Gorcum, who were on their road to Paris fully persuaded that France would never leave them in the lurch, and that her troops would certainly march to the relief of Amsterdam, resolved to defend itself to the very last notwithstanding fresh water was already sold at 30 sols the pail. The former of these boasting at Dinant the day after that it was he who stopped the Princess of Orange, a Prussian Baron, sent to watch the motions of the French, had the imprudence in his honest zeal to seize him and attempt to take him, forgetting he was not in Prussia or in Holland.

"Some Dutch recruiting parties being in town, and the populace assembling, he was obliged to decamp. Excepting 1,000 sacks of wheat from Nancy in August, and the detention of a few boats from Liege, there has been no appearance of any hostile preparations. The assurance I have this day received of everything being quiet in the environs of Givet affords me a degree of repose to which, for these last 15 days, I have been an entire stranger; as I was resolved that the King's Minister of the Hague, and the Duke of Brunswick, should have the earliest and most authentic information from me."

————— to W. W. MILES.

1787, September 29, Liège.—"Je suis de retour de Givet où mes affaires m'avaient appelé. Il n'y a aucune apparence, ni préparatifs aucuns, qui indiquent que les troupes Françaises passeront par cette ville pour aller au secours de la Hollande. Hier on a lâché les semestres, preuve certaine que le régiment de Châtre qui forme à peu près 1,000 hommes, celui de Royal Roussillon, cavalerie de deux escadrons qui font 300 hommes, et puis le bataillon de Suisse qui est à Charlemont ne seront pas de l'armée auxiliaire pour la Hollande. Voilà ce que j'en sais."

W. W. GRENVILLE to SIR JAMES HARRIS.

1787, October 2, Paris.—"There is one point to which I have not adverted in my letter, but which seems very material in the present moment. There are strong symptoms here of a communication, even under the existing circumstances, between the Court of Berlin and this Government. It is difficult to reconcile this with what has so lately passed and is still passing, if the singular system of the Prussian Government did not make such contradictions by no means impossible. I cannot help thinking that you might be able to get material information on this point. You will therefore excuse the liberty I take of suggesting it to you."

Private.

W. PITT to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 2, Downing Street.—"Your despatch came yesterday morning, and as we were obliged to be at Windsor early in the day, and the ball was not over till six this morning, there was no possibility of answering you sooner. I am clear that unless Monsieur de Montmorin changes his language, the sooner you come away the better. But I still think all their communications have an air of indecision. If they should still be inclined to revert to the idea of withdrawing from the business of Holland, or to accede to the guarantee, it will undoubtedly be of the utmost importance that you should wait till the matter is brought to an issue. We have a notion here, and I think a probable one, that if France saw its way in the business of Turkey, she would be glad to give up that of Holland. But there seems no certainty yet whether their intention is to support Turkey or to join Russia and Austria. The language recommended to you in the despatch is meant for either contingency. It is certainly the truth and can do no harm. But if you should find in conversation with Monsieur de Montmorin that they wish to support Turkey, I do not see what we can wish better than to be at peace ourselves, and see them engaged in a system which must separate them from both the Imperial Courts. In that case you might safely tell them (in addition to general profession) that you have no reason to believe the King would feel himself interested to take any measures to oppose their operations. If they should join Austria and Russia, it will open so new a scene, that we can say nothing to it immediately, and the language then should be only general. On the whole I think it full as likely that you will have no opening given to induce you to stay; and that the French Government will find itself hotted into a war. But let us continue to give the other a fair trial, though without ever abandoning our advantage ground. If you come away, leave directions for Ewart's despatches to you to be forwarded hither, unopened."

LE COMTE DE MONTMORIN to the MARQUIS OF CARMARTHEN.

1787, October 3, Versailles.—"Mr. Grenville m'a remis la lettre que votre Excellence m'a fait l'honneur de m'écrire le 21ème de ce mois. La mission dont il est chargé ayant pour l'objet d'écarter tout ce qui pourrait porter atteinte à l'intelligence et à la bonne harmonie qui régnent entre les deux Cours, elle n'a pu qu'être très agréable à sa Majesté; mais vous sentirez qu'il serait impracticable de travailler à pacifier les troubles dans les Provinces Unies tant que leur territoire sera occupé par des troupes étrangères. C'est donc à l'époque de leur retraite qu'il faut remettre à s'occuper de cet objet important. Alors le Roi, dont les vues et les démarches ont toujours été dirigées par l'amour de la paix, embrassera avec plaisir les moyens d'amener les choses à une conciliation solide et durable.

"Quant aux préparatifs dont votre Excellence me fait l'honneur de me parler, il est sans doute à craindre qu'ils ne conduisent nos Cours à un but fort éloigné de leur désir; mais celle de Londres a rendu indispensables ceux que le Roi a ordonnés à son exemple.

"Je prie votre Excellence d'être bien persuadée de tout mon désir de concourir avec elle à prévenir et écarter tout ce qui pourrait altérer ou détruire la bonne intelligence entre nos deux Cours; et que j'approuverai une véritable satisfaction de suivre en cela mes propres sentiments, en me conformant aux intentions bien connues de sa Majesté."

French. Copy.

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 5, Hague.—"Flint delivered me your letter of the 2nd of October to-day at two p.m. They find me in such a moment of business and occupation that it is not in my power to answer them otherwise than by referring you to my despatches of to-day's date, the first of which applies almost entirely to every thing which you state on the longest of your two letters.

"If such a guarantee as is there proposed could be obtained, it would be a great point carried; I feel very strongly the tone of the reasoning you bring against the probability of its succeeding, but still I think it might be tried.

"The moment when the Prussian troops withdraw will be a very important one, and I am so far from believing that we can stand alone, that I shall press as much as possible the taking German auxiliaries into the pay of the Republic, and to have them enter the towns of this province as the Prussians evacuate them.

"I am far from being at my ease about the event of the Duke of Brunswick's attack on Amsterdam. Every hour's delay brings on the wet season, and if it is attended with a high wind he will find himself in a most perilous situation.

"In regard to what you say in your separate letter on there being something still doubtful in the conduct of Prussia, I confess I have had at times the same misgivings; but I do not suppose that the King himself is playing a double part, but that he is betrayed by his uncle Henry and Count Finckenstein.

"I sent you a messenger to Paris on the 2nd, which I fear did not catch you there."

WILLIAM EDEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 6, Sèvres.—"I enclose Mr. Pitt's letter to you unopened. I took the liberty pursuant to your permission to open one from Lord Carmarthen, and retain it, because I have not time to copy it, and Mr. Fraser will give you a duplicate.

"I am in hopes of a letter from you before you leave Boulogne or Calais to tell me a little of the news from the Hague, for which Sir James Harris refers me to what he wrote to you.

"You have had abominable weather for your journey; but the wind is fair this evening.

"I have written a despatch to the Office to-night which you will find sufficiently interesting; I entreat you to see it as soon as you can, as also my letter of this date to Mr. Pitt. I never feel too confident on these great subjects which are liable to be affected by so many side winds; but if the Cabinet, after conversing with you, will only decide as to what ought to be done, and direct it to be done in as conciliating a manner as circumstances will allow, I have great hopes that the success would not be difficult."

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 7, Hague.—"I cannot but think the hearty concurrence of the Court of Berlin to everything we propose will greatly facilitate my idea of making France become a guarantee of the Stadtholderate. We must calculate the concessions she will make, not from inclination but from necessity; and the situation of superior strength in which we stand from the signature of the convention at Berlin, is such as to make us equal to anything. At least we may sound the ground, and attempt a measure which, if it should succeed, will not only put France at an immense political distance from this country, but set her more at variance with her party here than you can imagine. I am sure I need not expatiate on a subject on which I so well know your feelings, or even wish you to go back with a sentiment to Versailles, different from those I am so certain belong to you.

"The conduct of the King of Prussia will do away all our doubts as to the sincerity of her intentions. I am satisfied the symptoms which appeared both here and in France were owing to the partial behaviour of Goltz, who, as well as his colleagues here, is connected with the French emissaries at Berlin, and perhaps even with the French Ministry, by the surest of all ties. The real object is to exclude France from any share in the negotiation, and that cannot be so effectually done as by a declaration on the part of the other two co-mediating powers to say they considered the disputes on the Republic as settled; which may be followed up or perhaps preceded by a similar one on the side of the States General.

"I presume this will just catch you in England, and if I have occasion to write to you in the course of next week, I will dispatch a messenger to Paris."

WILLIAM EDEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 10, Seve.—"I will write to you to-morrow, and will return Harris's letter, which I have only this moment received from you. You will see my letters to Lord Carmarthen and Mr. Pitt. If we wish to establish a great and permanent system, it is probable that in the present moment we may do it; and in a very glorious way. Pray turn it in your mind and expedite matters as much as possible. We shall be sincerely glad if you will make us another visit here and take possession again of your department; but if not, at least do not relax in your attention in this very important moment. If I am fully instructed, and sufficiently informed, I am sure that we may do a great deal in a very little time."

WILLIAM EDEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 11, Sève.—"I transmit to you by this conveyance Peypommel sur le commerce de la Mer Noire. It shows that the French have a very advantageous traffic in that quarter, but we must not forget that much of it will now be in English goods; and if they will not interfere with our position in the East Indies, we may composedly see their enjoyment of this trade, for which they have some local advantages over us.

"I have received from Abbé Morellet a copy of his mémoire on the French East India Company; I am told that it is a curious performance. I will send it next week to England.

"Can you send me one or two copies of Monsieur de Calonné's mémoire?"

"Pray read my despatch of this date and expedite matters.

"Whilst I am writing this, I receive your letter and the despatches of the 8th instant. It is understood here that Amsterdam is settled completely, though after some resistance. If that should not be the case, certainly the embarrassment might grow great. I foresee no other difficulty. You surely cannot wish me to attempt to force this Court to sign the words suggested by Sir James Harris. I will write an additional despatch to make the remark which occurs to me upon them."

WILLIAM EDEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 13, Seve.—"The enclosed were brought by a courier to Monsieur de Goltz, who sent them to the Duke of Dorset, from whence I received and opened them; and I have taken a copy of them for information if necessary. They were clearly written previous to knowing that the business was likely to settle itself without discussing the Dutch constitutions. If however you feel disposed to give a meeting to Monsieur d'Alvansleben I shall be cordially glad to see you, and we are using all possible means to make this large house a little warmer than when you left it. In the meantime I will take care to see Monsieur d'Alvansleben immediately on his arrival, and will say everything to him that I think you would wish. It is possible that he may enable me to bring this matter to an immediate conclusion.

"I much doubt whether any delay will arise even if the Prussian troops should not absolutely have evacuated. The disposition to peace here is decided and earnest if we do not drive too far; and I have great faith in our making a good use of the moment; for it is no compliment to Mr. Pitt to say that his attention to foreign politics is of the most efficient kind possible, and infinite advantages will result from it."

WILLIAM EDEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 17, Seve.—"Sir James Harris's messenger brought the enclosed to the Duke of Dorset's hotel on Sunday with a verbal desire that in case of your absence it should be opened; and his Grace communicated it to me immediately. You will observe that it contains nothing but what was passed under a supposition of different circumstances, except the welcome intelligence from Amsterdam.

"M. D'Alvansleben has never appeared, and as it is probable that Stayley arrived previous to his departure, it begins to appear probable that he will not come.

"I had by the same messenger a private letter from Sir James Harris merely referring me to the one addressed to you, with a few general remarks, and therefore I do not trouble you with a copy."

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, October 24, Hague.—"I was almost vexed at seeing your letter of the 19th dated from Whitehall, as I am satisfied, without the most distant idea of conveying a compliment to you, that you were by far the properest person for terminating our discussions with France relative to the affairs of this country. I cannot write what I feel on this subject, but the confidence with which you treated me when you was here, would induce me to speak freely if the opportunity existed.

"Things here in general go on very well, but there is still a most laborious work to perform, and our instruments are not the best calculated for measures which require decision and expedition. The French are still working under ground, and if the levity of the Prince of Orange induces him to give up the idea of proceeding criminally against some of the chiefs of the faction, they will still maintain a very improper and very dangerous degree of influence on the Republic.

"It is in my mind very much to be lamented that we cannot obtain from France something like the formal guarantee I mentioned. She has yielded on every point we have pressed as yet; and as our management for her proceeds from motives of prudence not from regard, I could wish we were to go to the very last stretch of the cord. Is it impossible to make her add to her declaration, that she engages not to molest the House of Orange in the quiet possession of the hereditary Stadtholderate, or in future take any measures en haine de la constitution établie en 1747. This is less than a guarantee, which binds her to stand forth in defence of the Stadtholderate, and only expresses clearly an intention which seems implied in the act she is now about to pass, and exchange with us. Its effect however would be very great here, as it would be an official avowal that she deserted her party.

"I do not think it impossible to reinstate the Scotch brigade; but they seem here to insist on the permission to raise and recruit it in Scotland, which, I presume, would meet with insurmountable difficulties at home."

WILLIAM EDEN to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, December 6, Seve.—"You will probably see by last night's despatches, and therefore I will not repeat, Monsieur de Montmorin's observations on the papers taken in Holland respecting the French detachment, which (by the bye) whether he knew it or not, was a much less extensive transaction than I had supposed from the general tone with which it has been mentioned. Its insignificance however makes it more disgraceful when stated as a measure of French Government, and we are fairly authorised to treat it in that point of view. I do not believe that Monsieur de Montmorin had been apprised of Monsieur de Ségur's letter; at most he had heard of it inadvertently and confusedly. I am more inclined to suspect that, in the bustle of office, it had been settled between our friend Monsieur de Rayneval and the Maréchal. Monsieur de Montmorin certainly disliked the Dutch pursuit even before its embarrassments grew great, but his chef de bureau had a family fondness for them.

"I not only agree with you in doubting the information which you have received of the project of the Triple Alliance, but I go farther; I utterly disbelieve it. At the same time I think that there is a tampering going forwards between this Court and the Imperial Courts. I could fairly ascertain the whole business if I had any materials to work with; but I am utterly without information or instructions. If we had any system or plan to propose, I could either carry it with this Court, or at least I am much mistaken if I could not make it the means of drawing Spain nearer towards us; for I had again a letter from Mr. Liston last night, expressing a solicitude from Monsieur de Florida Blanca to know what we wish, and a disposition to concur in it Surely with a Court so basely disposed as this is, it is always right to keep communications and discussions amicably afloat as much as possible; particularly when the personal attentions are such as I happen to experience from Monsieur de Montmorin.

"We also delay settling, or declining to settle, a naval system; and the arrangement of the foreign forces for the islands, and the eternal old story of the consulships, which ought to be completed. I wish that you would urge the first quiet moment for attention to these matters.

"The enclosed will amuse you. As it requires proof, I ought to inform you that the memorial really was presented to the Most Christian King by the Duke of Orleans.

"I have doubts as to the utility of paying foreign subsidies in time of peace."

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1787, December 27, Hague.—"You will see from my official correspondence the state of the negotiation here.

"The result of my private as well as ministerial conferences is, that if it were possible for us to restore Negapatnam unconditionally and forego our claim to an equivalent, in consideration of the renewal of friendship and alliance between the two countries, it would produce the best of all possible effects here; it would please and satisfy the mercantile part of the nation, and be such a clear and unequivocal proof of our fairness and goodwill, that no pretext could remain with the French party to call in question our sincerity, or to keep alive that spirit of animosity and of suspicion the last war has left behind it. It is needless to inquire whether this spirit (after what has passed) ought to exist; it is enough to know it actually does exist, and that it is of great importance to destroy it if we cannot refute it. It is on this principle that I have endeavoured to transmit so exactly all that Monsieur Vander Spiegel said on the subject. I have mixed up, in my reports, the opinions and arguments of the other leading people with whom I have conversed. I can have no doubt of their good intentions or good understanding, and they all unanimously concur that the restitution of Negapatnam in the way proposed would be a measure highly requisite to render the re-union between the two countries permanent and sincere and solidly beneficial. I readily conceive that we too have motives of ménagement to observe towards our nation, and that these influence our conduct more than the real value of the place itself, or the departing from a right so clearly expressed. But I should think it would go a great way to be able to say, 'Our situation with respect to Holland is now again become precisely what it was before the rupture. The former system of friendship and union, although it appeared to be lost beyond the reach of recovery, is restored and consolidated between the two countries; and England has besides acquired a right by the treaty to make such arrangements in India as not only will put an end to the eternal objects of dispute between them in that quarter of the globe, but also may in their consequences lead to put its whole trade and influence into their hands.' For, you will observe, that the renouncing the privileges granted by the 6th article is made subservient to the conclusion of these arrangements, and the one is not to take place if the other fails; and this is certainly so much clear gain to Great Britain since the year 1780.

"The final determination of these arrangements will undoubtedly be a difficult and delicate point, on which, at this moment, our ideas here and in England are very wide. I do not however despair that, on all the essential considerations, they will meet at least as to the effect, though perhaps not as to the form. The subject is so intricate one, and in general so new to me, that I wish it greatly to be discussed and concluded in England, in the way I indicated in my despatch (170), and not sent here for any other purpose than for me to insert it in the treaty under the sanction of the States General.

"Our declining to lend either part or the whole of our Hessian auxiliaries to supply the place of the Prussians has (although I never encouraged them to think we should do otherwise) disappointed a good deal some of the leading members of the Government, and I fear may in the end distress them. His Prussian Majesty declares his peremptory resolution of withdrawing his troops in six weeks. It is morally impossible, before the expiration of that period, for the Republic to have found any others in Germany; and without some better support than its own army (which is in a deplorable state) very serious evils may follow. May I ask whether it is decidedly impossible for us to spare 6,000 Hessians for six months? or, if not, 6,000 Hanoverians? and could either of these corps be brought here in six weeks? Unacquainted as I am with the various objections against such a measure, it appears to me that if we were to have in the Republic, for the protection of its constitution and for the maintenance of its police and good order, a body of troops entirely dependent on us, it would be the strongest hold we could have over it; the stronger as it would be a footing of authority acquired by an obligation which would be greatly felt. I wish, if you think there is no objection to it, you would communicate these reflections to Mr. Pitt. They possibly may be easily overthrown, but they strike me as of some weight. They are not of a nature to find a place in a despatch, and I had rather they should reach him through you than by troubling him with a private letter. I shall consider whatever you may say to me in consequence as meant for my private instructions and better guidance on the work in which I am employed.

"My great object is, if possible, to connect this country by indissoluble ties to Great Britain. This is to be effected partly by affection (if such a sentiment may be allowed to exist between nations) and partly by specific engagements. Affection will follow complaisance, gentle usage, and not too rough and unqualified an exercise of our influence. The reverse of this lost us the Republic. The guarantee of the Stadtholderate and the other conditions of the treaty constitute very binding engagements; and if to these we were to add the military support they require for the security of their persons and property (which they think in danger) and assist them in raising their loans, they would, I think, be so completely entangled that they never could escape us; and we might direct and employ the influence and strength of this country in any way we pleased, provided we led them gently and adroitly into our views."

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1788, January 4, Hague.—"The easterly winds which have continued to blow for near a fortnight, detained the post so long at Harwich that I got both your letter of the 17th and that of the 25th at the same time. It will not be in my power to answer to-day fully, but I will not delay thanking [you] for them and assuring you that I will pay every attention to their contents.

"The African slave trade is an exclusive branch of commerce belonging to the Province of Zeland. I have spoken to M. Vander Spiegel and written to M. Lynden de Blytterswyk who is now at Middelburg, on the subject, and endeavoured to prevail on them to use their influence with the persons engaged in this trade to co-operate in carrying into execution the humane measure yourself and Mr. Wilberforce intend to bring forward. As soon as I am in possession of any conclusive information relative to their sentiments or intentions I will immediately let you know, although I fear the principles which actuate you and your friend are not likely to make such impression on the Dutch merchant.

"I was happy to find in your letter of the 25th December that my ideas relative to the bringing a corps of Hessian into this Republic coincide with yours. I never had a wish that they should be granted permanently, but only for a stipulated time, during which the Republic was to endeavour to hire some other troops, or put its own army on a more respectable footing. The prospect you hold out of there being a possibility of obtaining Hanoverians, is still better; and, strong as the measure is, I think in the present temper of the States I would be responsible to carry it through.

"I most perfectly agree with you in every thing you say relative to the Indian arrangements with this country. The making the restitution of Negapatnam a preliminary article, however, grateful it would have been to these people, I evidently see must not be thought of; and it is given up by the Pensionary in consequence of what I said in my late conferences with him.

"The other two points, namely the obtaining Rhio and Trincomalé I fear will be nearly impracticable, to the extent proposed in the report of the Commissioners. At all events the discussions on them will necessarily tend to lengthen the negotiation so much, if the treaty is to wait till they are determined, that I am very glad to find it is your opinion that they should be postponed for an after convention, and the alliance signed directly. I have urged this very strongly in one of my despatches to-day, and hope it will meet the approbation of His Majesty's servants. I refer you to this despatch for a provisional article I have drawn up for the purpose of conciliation till such time as East Indian business is finally settled."

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1788, February 5, Hague.—"After various attempts as well by letter as by conversation to induce the Zelanders to explain themselves on the idea now in contemplation in England to abolish the African slave trade, I have at last prevailed upon M. Lynden de Blytterswyk, the leading man in that Province, to give me the enclosed answer in writing, which, though far from being so complete as I could have wished, may at least be produced as if there was an inclination on the part of these people to concur in the beneficial work you are going to undertake.

"I shall not fatigue you with a detail of the reasonings of most of them against the project which, as it seems at first sight calculated to affect their interest, cannot be made palatable to them by any application to their feelings; and I confess in the upshot I fear it will be very difficult to make them acquiesce in it. You may [be] assured no pains on my part shall be spared, and I will avail myself to the utmost of any lights you may think proper to furnish me with in order to promote its success.

"Boers returns to England. He is soured and disappointed; his ambition carries him beyond his sphere. I could easily have got him made Pensionary of Dordt or Haarlem, but nothing short of a Department at which he is to preside will satisfy him. He read me the paper he read to the India Commissioners. I told him it was all on one side, and fitter to separate the two Companies and two nations for ever, than to conciliate them. I was displeased with him for some injudicious not to say unfriendly language he had held about England, which, after the reception he had met with, was unpardonable. He has no commission whatever from any body here, and, if he affects to be employed, it is an error into which he wishes to lead you.

"The Zelanders are very anxious to know whether the two millions Mr. Pitt (through Boers) gave them some hopes of lending them are to be soon forthcoming. They are in great want. I mean the Chamber of Zeland who solicited the loan. You will greatly oblige me by enabling [me] to answer something to their urgent enquiries on this point.

"I am every day more and more pleased with M. Vander Spiegel; he is everything that can be wished.

"A Colonel Colyear Robertson has produced a plan here to reinstate the Scotch brigade. It seems to me that no idea of this kind should come otherwise than ministerially; and although I see Colonel Robertson often at my house, he concealed from me the letter and plan he sent in last night to the Pensionary. My idea is that this country should solicit us to let it be restored, and not that we should ask it of them as a favour; and it is from this principle I wish to set aside the numberless proposals Scotch officers are continually coming forward with, without any authority whatever, or without any other view than to get rank and employment."

Enclosure.

G. H. C. DE LYNDEN to SIR JAMES HARRIS.

1788, February.—"Je ne puis qu'applaudir au dessein louable, dont on s'occupe chez vous, pour régler la traité des nègres sur des principes plus conformes à l'humanité, et aux devoirs du Christianisme, que ne l'est la méthode actuelle; surtout si la chose peut se faire, comme on le croit, sans porter préjudice à la culture Américaine, qui est devenue de première nécessité pour l'Europe. Je vous sollicite bien instamment de vouloir me communiquer le plan sur cet objet, dès que vous l'aurez reçu; et j'ose vous assurer d'avance, que dans ce pays-ci, on concourra volontiers avec les autres nations qui ont des colonies de la même nature que les nôtres, aux changements par rapport aux esclaves, que la culture des terres pourra admettre. Je serai charmé d'entrer plus en détail avec vous sur la matière, lorsque j'aurai vu le projet."

French.

W. W. GRENVILLE to SIR JAMES HARRIS.

1788, February 27, Whitehall.—"I am very sorry that it has been impossible for me to answer your last letter sooner. I am much obliged to you for the trouble you was so good as to take on the subject of the slave trade. The answer is not very encouraging, but I am still not without hopes that if we should ultimately be able to secure the acquiescence of other countries, something may be done with Holland.

"I have not neglected the point which you mentioned to me about the money for the Chamber of Zeland. But a real difficulty arises from the situation of the whole of the East India business between the two countries. There seems to me much danger in concluding the treaty with the insertion of the article even as now returned to you, although, on the whole, I think it right on the ground of the reasoning which you have stated. It is certainly impossible for any one to judge with the same accuracy as yourself respecting the effect on the Dutch nation of holding out expectations in present which may probably not be realised hereafter, or, on the other hand, of obstructing the immediate conclusion of a treaty of alliance between us. At all events it seems to me essential on every principle of good faith that the Pensionary should clearly understand all that is meant to be engaged for.

“With respect to pecuniary aid, it seems to be the opinion of those with whom I have conversed that this ought not to be considered in a separate point of view from the rest of this subject. If there was a real disposition in the Government of the Dutch East India Company to unite and blend their interests with ours, much advantage might result to both, and many arrangements might be made for their mutual accommodation. In such a case it would be our interest to prevent the effects of any temporary embarrassment in their affairs. But how could a measure of this sort be justified to our own Company on any different supposition? A circumstance on which much stress is laid with respect to this point occurred in a conversation which I have had with Boers since he has been here. He came to show me a paper which he had received, I think, from Amsterdam. It contained a proposal that our East India Company should send people over to bid at the Dutch sales in March, in order to keep up the prices of teas, and thereby to prevent their being purchased on such terms as might enable the buyers to smuggle them into England so as to defeat the operation of the Commutation Act. Amongst other arguments on this subject the paper states that the Dutch Company were by no means under any necessity of bringing all their teas to market in the present moment, but that they might reserve a certain quantity so as to enable them at all times to command the price of tea in England. Now I think on that statement one might almost put it to themselves to decide whether it would be reasonable, or just to our own Company, that we should give the Dutch a loan of money in order to enable them to reserve their teas so as to command the prices of our own sales. It seems quite impossible that we should go on together tolerably on this footing, or without a real good understanding on all these points. Even in the particular instance which I have just mentioned, our interest is in fact the same, and appears sufficiently evident; but it cannot be pursued except by mutual agreement; and without that, by giving pecuniary aid, we should run the risk of doing an essential injury to our own East India Company; and that too with respect to an object which is materially connected with the interest of the public in many different points of view.

“It is on this ground thought absolutely necessary that some explanation should be previously entered into, with respect to the real situation of the Dutch Company, and their intended operations both in present and in future. If there is a confidence between us this explanation can only lead to mutual accommodation and advantage; and without this, it is surely impossible for us to employ the public purse of this country in setting up rivals against our own Company.

“On this subject however I think it right to add that what is felt with respect to rivalry relates to this particular case, and is by no means founded on any idea entertained by us that the trade of the Dutch East India Company should in any respect be sacrificed to ours. We consider it, on the contrary, as our best and true policy with regard to India to encourage the trade of foreign European nations with our provinces there. And the same principle extends in its operation to their competition with us in European markets, which it is far from our wish to discourage, provided it is carried on upon just and equal principles. It is impossible to allow that a speculation of reserving tea to be smuggled into England falls at all under that description.

"There is some difficulty with respect to giving a public answer on this point, because Boers' communication was not an official one, nor would it perhaps even be fair to him that his name should be mentioned by you in this business. With respect to the proposal itself it was entirely discouraged, both because we felt that under all the circumstances he was not the proper person to treat with about it, and because the idea itself was for many reasons impracticable.

"It is really a thing to be much lamented that there appears so little disposition to establish a confidential communication on these points. We have much in our hands which would be materially beneficial to them, and we have a real desire to feel ourselves justified in giving it. The point of the spice trade, in the extent in which it was proposed in our projet, can certainly be given for nothing but Trincomalé. But arrangements might, I think, be made by which the Dutch Company might be to purchase at a given price a certain quantity of opium and manufactures in Bengal, paying the price into our Treasury at Canton; and in this case the article of navigation could be so confined as to relate merely to a commodious and safe passage through the Eastern seas to China, to the exclusion of all trade to or from the islands situated there. I mention this to you only as a loose idea which has been started in conversation, and which we are inclined to think practicable; but it is above all necessary, as I conceive, that they should feel themselves disposed to treat with us as friends, and not as rivals anxious for their destruction.

"I have troubled you with a very long letter on this subject; but I was desirous to convince you of the eagerness which I feel at all times to obey your commands, in any business in which you think I can be of the least service to you in promoting the important objects in which you are engaged."

Draft.

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1788, March 4, Hague.—"I have many thanks to return you for yours of the 27th February. If I see any opening to promote your wishes here relative to the African trade, or if you can point out any way in which I can contribute towards the success of the humane undertaking you have in hand, I shall most willingly seize the opportunity.

"As you will probably see my private letter of to-day to Mr. Pitt, as well as my official ones, I shall not waste either your time or mine by useless repetitions. I hope all will end well, yet I shall not sleep sound till the treaty is signed.

"I am sorry there should be any obstacles relative to the loan we were to assist the Zeland branch of the East India Company with; yet the reasons you give are too real ones to admit of argument. Boers in November last wrote word that he had a specific promise from Mr. Pitt, and that one of the two millions required would be immediately supplied from the Civil List. This prevented the Company from applying elsewhere, and as the time of payment and settling their accounts now draws near, they are greatly distressed how to go on. I confess, at the same time, that however conclusive the motives you allege for withholding this supply from them are, yet that I am rather prevented to employ them, and wish some other plea could be devised for a refusal, as I think that [which] you state to me would breed acrimony and ill will.

"The idea of employing some one on our part to bid for the teas which are to be put to sale at Middelburg on the 10th instant, did not originate with Boers. Mr. Rich wrote a long time ago a letter on the subject to Fraser, and I enclose you a copy of one I received some weeks since from Mr. Hope. As I cannot entertain the remotest doubt of his private or public principles, I am certain he did not mean to lead me into a false measure when he wrote to me; but, as no notice was taken of Mr. Rich's letter, I took it for granted there was reasons for not adopting the plan Mr. Hope proposed. I send his letter to you now, as it is probably the best kind of information you can have on the subject.

"I think it possible, though I will not venture to pledge myself for it, that I could, in return for Negapatman, get Trincomalé on something like the same terms on which the Dutch held the barrier towns; but I fear there is no hope of getting a more positive possession of it."

SIR JAMES HARRIS to W. W. GRENVILLE.

1788, June 2, Whitehall.—"My motive for wishing to see you this morning was this. Mr. Pitt, in consequence of what you had been so good as to say to him, mentioned to me the other day the reasons which had put a stop to my receiving an honour which he confessed it had been in contemplation to bestow upon me. I told him, and with perfect truth, that although nothing could be so grateful to me as such a mark of Royal favour, yet I should be very sorry to embarrass a Government to which I wished so heartily well as his, or, after the favours I had already received, to appear craving for others still. However sincere this declaration is, I will not conceal from you that I shall return to the Hague hurt, mortified, and disheartened, if I am to go back without this distinction. It has been universally understood both here and in Holland that it was intended, and the impression of the public in both countries will naturally be that something has since passed, which has induced his Majesty to withhold from me now an honour of which he did not think [me] undeserving some time back. Besides the very unpleasant feeling such a supposition will give me, it will also materially affect my public situation; and it will lessen considerably that influence so necessary to carry through the points which still remain unsettled between the two countries.

"The new French Ambassador who is just got to the Hague will well know how to avail himself of this circumstance; and I shall not be able to meet him on the same high ground if I return to my post without such a mark of approbation, and under the idea that I may have done something to forfeit it.

"You can, I am sure, readily guess why I could not say this to Mr. Pitt, though I felt it at the time; but he has behaved so kindly and honourably by me that I wish him to know my feelings. It was to request you to convey them to him that I wished to have seen you this morning. You will now perhaps be good enough to communicate to Mr. Pitt this letter, which is a very real and sincere picture of them."

W. W. GRENVILLE to SIR JAMES HARRIS.

1788, June 3, Whitehall.—"I have taken the first opportunity which I had to obey your commands in communicating to Mr. Pitt the contents of your letter of yesterday. I am persuaded that it is unnecessary for me to repeat to you what he has himself expressed to you; the just sense which he entertains of your services in Holland, and the sincere desire which he feels that you should receive every mark of that distinction to which you are so much entitled. I understand from him, with respect to the particular object in question, that he does not consider the point as finally determined; although there are circumstances which throw considerable embarrassments in the way of it. He has desired me to say that whenever the thing is ultimately decided either way, he will lose no time in acquainting you with the result; and that, in the meantime, you may be assured of the sincere desire which he feels on your account to promote an object so interesting to you."

ACCOUNT OF THE FLIGHT OF LOUIS XVI. FROM PARIS.

1791, June 26, Brussels.—"About eight months ago, it was resolved to attempt to bring away the Royal Family from Paris. The King earnestly desired to leave it, though the risk of his being stopped, either in endeavouring to get out of the town, or in the course of his journey, was represented to him. Monsieur de Bouillé who commanded in Champagne, Lorraine, and the adjacent districts, was perfectly disposed to co-operate in the execution of the project. According to a Decree of the Assembly, and by orders from the Minister of the War Department, he was to take measures for securing the frontiers against attack; under pretence of doing so, he brought regiments he could depend on towards Montmédy, and sent thither camp equipage, ammunition, and a train of field artillery. The place, though small, is strong; behind it are the Austrian territories; nor could anything be apprehended from the inhabitants of the town, as it is entirely commanded by the cannon of the fort.

"Some who had access to the King and Queen recommended that they should endeavour to get to the Low Countries by the shortest road, and from thence proceed to Montmédy. Had they done so, it is beyond a doubt they would have got thither in safety. Though many carriages left Paris before, and on the same day theirs did, they all arrived here without difficulty. But the King was unwilling to quit the French dominions, though but in travelling; and the route given by Monsieur de Bouillé by the way of Chalons was preferred. It was agreed that all the Royal Family at Paris should leave it on the night of Monday the 20th June, and Monsieur de Bouillé was advised thereof, that he might make his dispositions accordingly. The Comte de Fersen was to bring off those that were in the Tuilleries, and Monsieur and Madame were to set out at the same hour from the Luxembourg.

"A Baronne de Korffe, who I understand is a native of Russia, applied to Monsieur de Simolin for a passport to go to Francfort; the number of persons mentioned in it corresponded with the number that were to go in, and attend, the carriage of the King and Queen. Under pretence that the first passport had been accidentally burnt, she obtained another; she went off with one, and gave the other to serve for the Royal Family.

"A strong travelling coach and four excellent carriage horses were provided by Fersen; likewise an ordinary coach and a pair of horses, like those that are hired by strangers, called des carrosses de remise. Between five and six on the evening of the 20th June, Fersen went to receive the King's definitive orders. The King observed to him that La Fayette had just given an order to double the usual guards, and that he imagined he entertained some suspicion of their design, as he knew of no other circumstance that could have occasioned this precaution ; but, before the other could reply, he added, ' Things are now gone too far to recede. Happen what will, I am determined to go on. I can never be more unhappy than I am at present.' He then spoke with cheerfulness, and said that, having taken his final resolution, he now felt himself at ease.

"Three gardes de corps had been selected by M. D—— under pretence of being employed on a commission that required secrecy, and were provided with buff coloured coats, such as many servants in France and Germany travel with. About nine in the evening, two of them were sent to the King, when they were informed by him, for the first time, that they were to accompany him; and though he was sure of their fidelity, yet to guard against indiscretion, he locked them up in his closet. The other garde de corps was sent to Fersen a little before midnight; he and Fersen's coachman, riding as postillions, drove the travelling coach about a quarter of a mile beyond the barrier St. Martin; they likewise brought with them two riding horses, and they had orders, when they saw any ope, to move gently on and return to their station. About a quarter past eleven Fersen, acting as coachman, went with the other coach to the Cour des Princes at the Tuilleries; some other carriages were likewise waiting there. He stopped near the door of M. de Villequier's apartment. Madame de Tourzelle came very soon out of it, with Madame Royale, and the Dauphin dressed as a girl. Fersen having put them into the coach, drove gently out to the petit Carrousel, near to the house that was formerly inhabited by the Duchess de la Vallière. Neither this house nor several others in that quarter have any court, therefore carriages are often seen waiting there for company. Madame Elizabeth came next, and Fersen having spoken to her, she immediately went into the coach. About a quarter of an hour after her, the King came, dressed with a brown round wig and a great coat; he was followed by one of the gardes de corps, and in a few minutes, the Queen came, followed by the other. She was obliged to pass very near to two sentinels. One near the Dauphin's apartment was sitting down, and probably asleep; and she took the opportunity of getting past the other while he turned his back in walking. Whilst the coach was waiting in the petit Carrousel M. de la Fayette passed it twice in his carriage, followed as usual by two troopers; the second time the King, who was sitting in the coach, saw him. As soon as the Queen was in the coach, the two gardes de corps got up behind it, and Fersen drove away to the place where the other was waiting. The Royal Family having gone into the travelling coach, Fersen and one of the gardes de corps mounted the riding horses; another garde de corps got upon the coach box, which was made to carry servants; and the third, as I have already observed, acted as a postillion. The coach that brought them from the Tuilleries was drove to a little distance from the road, and overturned into a ditch. The four horses that brought the coach from the barrier St. Martin were changed for post horses at Bondy; nor could this occasion any suspicion, as it is very common for those who come from Paris to come to the first stage with their own horses, to avoid paying for the poste royale. One of the gardes de corps continued on the box, one rode by the side of the carriage, and the other went on before to order horses at the next stage. Fersen accompanied the Royal Family about three miles beyond Bondy, and there took leave of them, to go and join his chaise that was waiting for him at Bourget. He came from thence to Mons, where he arrived in the night of Tuesday, and Monsieur likewise came there nearly about the same time. Fersen came to Mons, I believe, in order to deliver a message to Monsieur, and to give advice of what had been done to M. de Mercy here, and to the King of Sweden at Aix la Chapelle. Having done this he set off for Montmédy, but on the road thither he met M. de Bouillé, who informed him of what had happened at Varenne. You may conceive what their feelings were. Those of Fersen arose purely from gratitude and affection; but besides those sentiments, de Bouillé felt all the pangs of disappointed ambition, which, if I am not extremely mistaken, is his predominant passion; though, by the accounts of all who know him, he is a very honourable and worthy man. While under the first impressions of his grief and indignation, de Bouillé has written a letter to the Assembly, a copy of which I have seen. I think had he deferred it till he was more in possession of himself, he would have wrote in a manner that would have been more generally approved, and that would have been less exceptionable; for, in speaking of the intentions of Foreign Powers, if what he says were true, it is indiscreet to mention; if not, it is ridiculous. He tells the Assembly that it required all that love which he possesses for his country, all that inviolable attachment and respect that he entertains for his Sovereign, to have so long given him force to subdue his feelings, and submit to the humiliation of corresponding with them, and of, apparently, obeying their Decrees.

"The Proclamation, or Manifest, that was left by the King, was written by himself and Monsieur, but is principally his own composition."

Endorsed.—Account of the attempt of the King of France to quit that kingdom in the month of June 1791, by the Comte de Fersen and others.

AN ACCOUNT OF M. DE BOUILLÉ'S ESCAPE.

(From Monsieur de Calonne).

"Monsieur de Bouillé, finding that of all the regiments under his command he could place most confidence in the regiment Royal Allemagne, determined to employ it in protecting the King's escape, and advanced with it himself to a place between Stenay and Verdun. From thence he sent out parties, one of which found the King at Varenne, and was witness of his being stopped there. A trooper who escaped from this party, returned with the greatest expedition to the place where M. de Bouillé was waiting with the remainder of the regiment. Monsieur de Bouillé immediately put himself at the head of this corps, and advanced to Varenne. He found that the King had left it two hours before, and having inquired to what place the King was carried, he advanced forwards with a view of overtaking him; but he soon found that a bridge which he was to pass, was broken down. He then ordered part of the regiment to enter the river, and try to swim over; but he soon found that this attempt would not succeed, for, from the length of the march and the expedition he had used, the horses were so fatigued that they could not pass the river, and two or three of the troopers were drowned. He then gave up all hopes of overtaking the King, and returned with the remainder of the regiment to their former quarters in the neighbourhood of Stenay. When the troopers had dismounted, he then acquainted them with his resolution immediately to leave the kingdom. The whole regiment offered to go with him. He would not accept of this offer, saying that it was not proper he should enter the Austrian territories with the appearance of military force, and ordered the troops to go to their quarters. He set out immediately, and all the officers to the number of thirty-six followed him. About one hundred more officers from the garrison at Metz have since joined him at Luxemburg. The common troopers of the regiment Royal Allemagne, who are chiefly Germans that talk French, were so disgusted with M. de Bouillé's refusal to accept of their service that, through anger, they have now joined the rest of the troops that have taken part with the National Assembly.

"Monsieur de Calonne says that the Baron de Breteuil principally promoted the King's escape, and urged it through the Queen, with whom he is in correspondence; being desirous that the King should put himself at the head of the party who are to attempt a counter-revolution, and that it should not be conducted solely by the Count d'Artois, with whom he has little influence or connection. The Count d'Artois knew nothing of the King's intention to escape. The Baron de Breteuil, who was informed of it, left Soleure and came as far as Liege; but hearing that the King was retaken, and being informed of the persons who were then at Brussels, and of all that was passing there, he did not come on to Brussels, but returned immediately back to Soleure.

"Monsieur de Calonne says that the Baron de Breteuil was constantly counteracting the plans which the Count d'Artois, by his advice, was pursuing; objecting particularly to any connection or interference with England, and urging this consideration very strongly to the Emperor and Queen of Naples; which was the reason that the Emperor varied in the language he held in the different conferences with him.

"When Monsieur took leave of the King his brother at Paris, his Majesty gave him a paper signed by himself, appointing him, in case of accident, Lieutenant Général du Royaume. Monsieur, being apprehensive of this paper being found in his custody in case he was taken, returned it to the King; but when M. de Fersen took leave of his Majesty at Bondy, he gave M. de Fersen a paper, the purport of which was to devolve his authority on Monsieur, in case of any accident happening to himself. These papers, though signed by his Majesty, and sufficiently expressive of his intention, were not probably drawn in any legal form. When Monsieur joined the Count d'Artois at Brussels, a meeting was held, consisting of all the members of the ancient Parliaments of France then in the neighbourhood of Brussels, and of Monsieur de Calonne, in the presence of the two brothers, in which the question was agitated whether Monsieur should take upon himself the title and authority of Regent, or Lieutenant General of the kingdom of France. All the Gens de Robe who were present were of opinion that, as the King was a prisoner and no longer a free agent, and as Monsieur was the first Prince of the Blood then in a state of liberty, he might legally assume either of the titles before mentioned. The two precedents of the Dauphin Charles, afterwards Charles the V., who assumed the quality of Regent and Lieutenant of the King during the imprisonment of King John his father, who was taken at the battle of Poitiers by the English; and of the Dauphin, afterwards Charles the VII., who took upon himself the like title and authority after the treaty of Troyes, by which his father, then in the hands of the English, had in fact disinherited him, were quoted; but it was observed that the assumption of a title of this nature, which could not be acknowledged either by the Etats Généraux, nor by any of the Parliaments of France, since none were in existence, and which probably would be denied and rejected by the majority of the people, would, in effect, be of no service; especially as the present National Assembly, who pretend to represent the nation, would certainly disclaim any right which Monsieur might pretend to have to such a title; and would probably oblige the King his brother, who is now their prisoner, formally to renounce any authority pretended to be derived from him ; so that the idea of assuming such a title was on this account relinquished."

JOSEPH EWART to LORD GRENVILLE.

1791, July 5, Berlin.—"I think it proper to give your Lordship the earliest intelligence of a conversation I had yesterday with the Duke of York, and of the consequences which have resulted from it; though I have acted in this affair only in my private capacity.

"His Royal Highness communicated to me, in confidence, his passion for Princess Frederica, the King of Prussia's only child by his first marriage; his desire to marry her, and his wish to have His Prussian Majesty's dispositions sounded, in order that, if they were favourable, he might immediately write to the King to ask his permission to make a formal proposal of marriage. After a good deal of conversation with the Duke, particularly on the reasons which made him believe that this step would be agreeable to His Majesty, I complied with his request, in communicating his wishes to the King of Prussia, whose answer was that nothing could be more agreeable to him, as he loved the Duke, and had observed with pleasure his daughter's partiality for him; but that he could not give his consent until he knew His Majesty's sentiments. His Royal Highness writes to the King by this opportunity, and I have his permission to give your Lordship this information. Though he pays particular attention to the Princess, he has, hitherto, made her no declaration of his wishes; but the passion appears to be perfectly mutual, and has, in fact, existed for the last six years. The Princess is pretty, though not remarkably handsome, but very agreeable and accomplished. She was subject, about a year ago, to some nervous or hysterical complaints, but she is perfectly well at present.

"In conversing on this subject with Count Schulemberg, through whom I made the communication to the King of Prussia, the prospect of the marriage of the Prince Royal was naturally mentioned; when that Minister told me that His Prussian Majesty would certainly prefer an English Princess to any other; but that, having experienced the hardship of marrying a Princess he had never seen, he was determined to make his son travel, especially to England, to choose for himself.

"Your Lordship will be best able to judge what good effects the union in question might have in strengthening the political connection between England and Prussia, the force of which has been certainly considerably diminished here of late.

"I shall be impatient to receive your Lordship's instructions on the subject of this letter, as it places me in an embarrassing situation."

1791, July 7, Berlin.—"The departure of the Duke of York's messenger having been delayed, I think it right to add to my preceding letter that nothing can exceed the satisfaction the King of Prussia receives from the prospect of the marriage of His Royal Highness with Princess Frederica, and his eagerness to see it accomplished. His Prussian Majesty expressed these sentiments to the Duke last night, in the strongest terms; observing that this new tie of connection with His Majesty would make him happy on every account, public and private, and that he would rejoice to see his favourite daughter so happily settled. His Royal Highness having, with the King's permission, mentioned his wishes to the Prince of Prussia, he likewise expressed the greatest satisfaction."

1791, July 22, Whitehall.—"I have received your three private letters of the 5th, 7th and 9th instant, respecting the communication made to you by His Royal Highness the Duke of York, and what had since passed on that interesting subject. As I understand that His Majesty intends writing to His Royal Highness upon it, there remains nothing for me to mention to you relative to it, except to express His Majesty's gracious approbation of the steps which you have taken, and to congratulate you upon the prospect of an event so interesting in itself, and which I cannot but look forward to with peculiar satisfaction, as tending to strengthen and improve the union between this country and Prussia. I desire that you will omit no opportunity of expressing these sentiments to His Prussian Majesty, and to those of his servants who may be informed of this business."

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUKE OF YORK.

1791, July 22, Whitehall.—"The King has been graciously pleased to allow me to have the honour of informing your Royal Highness that it is his Majesty's intention, in the course of a few days, to write to your Royal Highness, and to the King of Prussia, on the subject of your Royal Highness's late letter to his Majesty. And I have the very great additional satisfaction of being permitted by His Majesty to add, that His Majesty's sentiments relative to that subject are such as your Royal Highness would wish.

"I hope your Royal Highness will not think it presumptuous in me if I take the liberty of availing myself of this opportunity to be the first to offer to your Royal Highness my sincere and respectful congratulations on an occasion which must be, on every account, so highly interesting to all his Majesty's subjects, and more particularly to those who, like myself, are bound to his Majesty by the ties of personal gratitude and attachment, as well as by those of duty and allegiance."

JOSEPH EWART to LORD GRENVILLE.

1791, August 4, Berlin.—"The King of Prussia has expressed to me, in the strongest terms, the satisfaction he received from his Majesty's letter, announcing to him his consent to the marriage of the Duke of York with Princess Frederica. But His Prussian Majesty, at the same time, testified his regret that the ceremony should be delayed till after the meeting of Parliament, and asked if this difficulty could not be obviated by an assurance from his Majesty respecting the Duke's establishment and the Princess's jointure, with which his Majesty said he would be perfectly satisfied. The Hereditary Prince of Orange is to be married here to the Princess Wilhelmine in the beginning of October, and the King is very desirous that the Duke of York's marriage should be celebrated about the same time. His Royal Highness desires me to entreat your Lordship to exert your influence in his behalf, on this occasion, as the greatest mark of friendship you can show him."

Extract.

1791, September 2, Berlin.—“The Duke of York is extremely distressed at not having received any positive accounts relative to the time his marriage may take place. I acquainted your Lordship in a former letter that the King of Prussia is very desirous the ceremony should be performed a few days before that of the Prince of Orange, for different reasons, and, among others, that by this means much trouble and expense would be avoided. I know that His Prussian Majesty is extremely impatient at the delay, which circumstance tends much to increase the Duke's uneasiness; and it is at the desire of His Royal Highness that I state these particulars to your Lordship, though I have repeatedly explained your situation in regard to business of this nature.”

W. PITT to JOSEPH EWART.

1791, September 2, Downing Street.—“I have received the King's commands to communicate to you, in this private letter, the outline of what His Majesty has in contemplation, with a view to the establishment to be formed for His Royal Highness the Duke of York, on the happy event of his approaching marriage.

“His Majesty has thought it best to adopt this mode, not choosing himself to state, finally, his intentions on the subject, without some previous knowledge of the ideas of the King of Prussia; and meaning that what is now to be intimated to you should be considered as open to any farther explanation and discussion which may appear to be necessary.

“You will be aware that His Majesty can only at present undertake to recommend to Parliament to concur in making such a settlement as his Majesty may judge proper; but that it cannot actually take place without Parliamentary assistance; and it is probable, that it will be proposed to the Parliament of Ireland, to bear a reasonable share of this additional expense. The sum which His Majesty has thought of fixing is twenty-four or twenty-five thousand pounds per annum, in addition to what His Royal Highness at present receives from the Civil List, and from his regiment of Guards, so as to make His Royal Highness's income, in the whole, about forty thousand pounds per annum, exclusive of the revenues arising from the Bishopric of Osnaburgh. His Majesty will also wish to recommend the settlement of a proper jointure on Her Royal Highness the Princess, the amount of which would naturally be six thousand pounds per annum, being what His Majesty has by Act of Parliament been enabled to settle on the Princesses his daughters. This however would be independent of any settlement which it may be thought right to make of whatever may be the sum intended to be given by the King of Prussia as the Princess's portion, with regard to which I am not aware that any explanation has hitherto taken place.

“You will understand that it is left to you to take the properest mode of communicating to His Prussian Majesty, and to His Royal Highness the Duke of York, the contents of this letter; and you will, of course, acquaint me with what may pass in consequence, in order to its being laid before His Majesty.”

JOSEPH EWART to W. PITT.

1791, September 10, Berlin.—“I had the honour of receiving yesterday your private letter of the 2nd instant, containing the outline of His Majesty’s intentions respecting the establishment of His Royal Highness the Duke of York on his marriage. His Royal Highness having immediately communicated to the King of Prussia the purport of His Majesty’s letter to him, and of your letter to me, His Prussian Majesty, after expressing entire satisfaction with the amount of the proposed establishment, determined that the marriage should take place on the 29th instant, and gave orders for his Cabinet Ministers discussing with me the different points to be arranged. I have just had a conference with them on the subject; and great difficulties and objections were made to the ceremony being celebrated without a formal contract, or rather treaty, of marriage being signed. After much discussion, the particulars of which were of too little consequence to be mentioned, it was proposed to draw up and sign, sub spe rati, a preliminary Act containing the most essential points, and referring to the treaty or contract to be concluded as soon as possible. Finding that unless I complied with this form, the Prussian Ministers would make a representation to the King their master against the marriage taking place till after the meeting of Parliament, I agreed to this proposal, with the reserve that the preliminary Act should be signed sub spe rati, and consequently subject to be modified in the formal contract, in whatever manner His Majesty may judge advisable. The projet of this Act is to be drawn up and signed as soon as possible, after having been laid before the King of Prussia; but, as the marriage is so soon to take place, I lose no time in despatching this messenger with an account of what has been already settled.

“The Act is to consist of eight articles, of which the enclosed paper contains the substance. The first article is for the sake of form. The sum, specified in the second, is that which has been given to the Princesses of the House of Brandenburg on every similar occasion. The renunciation to be made by the Princess, according to the third article, is conformable to the laws of this country; as the present, specified in the fourth, is to its customs. The Duke of York fixed himself the sum of four thousand pounds per annum for pin money. The counter-portion, mentioned in the sixth article, is likewise established by the laws of this country. The King of Prussia made no objection to the jointure of six thousand pounds, but his Ministers told me that seven thousand five hundred pounds had been settled for the Hereditary Princess of Orange, whose contract of marriage is founded on the same principles with those contained in the enclosed articles.

“It is proposed to sign this preliminary Act in the course of a few days; and the Prussian Ministers require that I should have a full power, though I could not receive it.

“I have made no objections to the marriage ceremony being performed by one of the King of Prussia’s chaplains of the reformed religion; but, as there is an English one at Dresden, he could be sent for, if judged necessary.

“I shall be very anxious to know if my conduct, on this occasion, be honoured with His Majesty’s gracious approbation, and with yours.”

Enclosure.

SUBSTANCE OF THE PROPOSED PRELIMINARY ACT.

“1st Article. To state the nature of this preliminary Act, and the reasons for making it.

"2nd Article. The settlement of the portion, to consist of one hundred thousand thalers, about thirteen thousand pounds, besides a suitable trousseau.

"3rd Article. The renunciation of the Princess to this portion, which is to be paid to the Duke soon after the marriage.

"4th Article. Mentions the present to be made by the Duke to the Princess, the day after the marriage, of six thousand pounds sterling; but of which Her Royal Highness is only to receive the interest during the Duke's lifetime.

"5th Article. Four thousand pounds per annum for pin-money.

"6th Article. Counter-portion, or one hundred thousand thalers, which the Duke is to deposit, or give security for, in order to receive the Princess's portion.

"7th Article. The jointure to consist of six thousand pounds per annum, with a residence and suitable establishment.

"8th Article. Signature of the Plenipotentiaries, sub spe rati, of their respective Sovereigns; but with a ratification on the part of the Duke and the Princess for what depends on them."

JOSEPH EWART to W. PITT.

1791, September 15, Berlin.--"I have now the honour of transmitting to you the preliminary and provisional Act which the King of Prussia and his Ministers have required to be concluded, previous to the celebration of the marriage of His Royal Highness the Duke of York with Princess Frederica. I need scarcely observe that by my signing sub spe rati, and from its being specified that the instrument is only provisional, it may be altered, or even superseded, according to His Majesty's pleasure, by the stipulations of the formal contract of marriage. Upon the same principle, though I have signed sub spe rati for the reason already mentioned, the King of Prussia does not require His Majesty's ratification of this preliminary Act, but only that, if approved, it should be acknowledged in the full power for the signature of the contract, which His Prussian Majesty wishes to be concluded as soon as it may suit His Majesty's convenience, in order that the business may be terminated.

"In this country the attachment to old forms is very strong, and, though I prevailed upon the Prussian Ministers to omit several singular ones, they insisted upon retaining that specified in the fourth article; though its origin is very absurd, and that the interest of the six thousand pounds being included in the pin-money reduces the engagement simply to the payment of the capital in the event of the Duke's death.

"After what I stated in my last letter, there seems to be nothing essential to add on the subject of the other articles, and I have only to repeat my hopes that His Majesty will not disapprove the measures which I have been obliged by the circumstances to take upon myself to adopt in regard to this affair."

W. PITT to JOSEPH EWART.

1791, September 23, Downing Street.--"I received on the 19th instant at Weymouth your private letter of the 10th (enclosing the substance of a proposed preliminary Act relative to the marriage of His Royal Highness the Duke of York, and mentioning that the marriage ceremony was to take place on the 29th instant), and I lost no time in laying it before the King. I have not received His Majesty's commands to make any observations on the paper stating the substance of the preliminary Act, as it seems difficult to form a precise opinion on some parts of it until the articles themselves are received; and also as, according to your letter, the signature must have taken place before a messenger could reach Berlin. I must, however, observe to you that my letter of the 2nd instant was a private letter, written only with a view to procure such explanations as might enable His Majesty to form his ultimate decision; after which His Majesty would have proceeded to signify his formal consent, and have directed the proper official steps to be taken for authorizing a regular proposal of marriage, and for observing the other formalities usual on such occasions.

"It is the more to be regretted that time has not been left for observing this course as, in consequence of the omission, the marriage ceremony will have taken place without due attention to the provisions of the Royal Marriage Act, a copy of which I enclose. The best measure which, on consideration, it has seemed possible to take here under this unforeseen difficulty, has been to endeavour, if possible, that His Majesty's consent should be signified by an instrument which may pass the Great Seal previous to the 29th instant, and should also be declared in Council before that day; but the precise time when the Great Seal can be affixed to such an instrument is rendered uncertain, from the Lord Chancellor's being on a tour at a distance from London. In this situation, His Majesty has been pleased to approve of my apprising you, as expeditiously as possible, of these circumstances, for the information of the King of Prussia and of His Royal Highness the Duke of York, in order that they may be prepared for taking such steps as may, on full consideration, be thought most advisable for preventing any inconvenience or embarrassment in future, in consequence of this informality. If any accident should prevent the due signification of His Majesty's consent before the 29th instant, or if, on consideration, it should be thought that, according to the terms of the Act of Parliament, the Duke of York ought actually to have received such formal consent previous to the marriage, it may become necessary that the ceremony should be repeated after the previous forms have been observed; and it must also be considered whether, for greater security, it would not be advisable that the ceremony should be performed by a minister of the Church of England. If this should be the case, it probably could not be necessary that any greater number of persons should be present than might be sufficient for the purpose of being witnesses, and of attesting a proper certificate to be entered on the books of the Privy Council here. On this point, however, and on any other which upon consideration may appear material, you will receive more particular information, together with such official instructions as may appear necessary, with as much expedition as the circumstances may admit."

JOSEPH EWART to LORD GRENVILLE.

1791, October 6, Berlin.—"I have communicated to His Royal Highness the Duke of York the contents of your Lordship's private letter of the 23rd ultimo, expressing your concern at the difficulties which have arisen respecting the forms which ought to have been observed previous to the celebration of his marriage, and particularly at the omission of the official steps usual on such occasions. I am desired by His Royal Highness to repeat to your Lordship the assurances I have already frequently communicated, of the sense he has of the friendly dispositions you have all along shown to facilitate the conclusion of his marriage; and His Royal Highness readily admitted that whatever informality may have happened, had been occasioned by His Prussian Majesty's impatience, and his own, to have the ceremony performed, and to their inattention to all forms.

"I beg leave to add, that nothing but extreme circumspection in what I conceived to be my duty, prevented me from writing to your Lordship officially on the subject of the Duke of York's marriage; for, as both your communications and Mr. Pitt's to me were conveyed in private letters, I thought it would be improper to answer them in a despatch. I need not repeat how much I regret the embarrassment occasioned to your Lordship by this business, and that nothing but the extreme impatience of the King of Prussia, arising in a great measure from his desire to have the two marriages concluded at the same time to save trouble and expense, could have induced me to consent. At the same time, your Lordship will be sensible that, had I refused to concur with His Prussian Majesty's wishes, I should have been placed in a very disagreeable situation with respect both to His Prussian Majesty and the Duke of York; and I believe I may safely venture to say, that the consequences of such a state of things might have been more embarrassing than those produced by any informality.

"I shall be very sorry if, after what I have said, my conduct should appear blameable to your Lordship; but I acted to the best of my judgment, and have been more harrassed and perplexed by this affair than by much more important ones."

LE BARON DE BRETEUIL to W. PITT.

1792, August 8, Brussels.—"Quoique je n'aie jamais eu l'honneur d'avoir aucun rapport avec votre Excellence, je n'en suis pas moins convaincu que je puis parler avec confiance à ses vertus comme à ses grandes qualités d'homme d'état; et je me flatte que les grandes occupations de ma vie m'empêchent de vous être absolument inconnu. C'est dans toutes ces persuasions que je vais m'ouvrir à vous, avec la franchise qui doit toujours entre nos deux nations faire la base de leur langage. Mais afin d'autoriser le mien auprès de vous, je dois commencer par vous faire connaître le plein pouvoir dont il a plu au Roi de m'honorer depuis le commencement de ses malheurs pour traiter de toutes les affaires avec les Puissances de l'Europe. Je vous envoie donc copie de ce plein pouvoir, et j'ose espérer qu'en voulant bien y ajouter foi, vous aurez aussi la bonté de le mettre sous les yeux du Roi d'Angleterre pour légitimer auprès de Sa Majesté les services que je viens réclamer auprès d'Elle au nom du Roi, et pour le Roi.

"Sa Majesté, depuis ses malheurs, a mis au nombre de ses plus sensibles consolations, tout ce qui lui est revenu sans cesse des expressions de l'amitié de Sa Majesté Britannique. Le Roi ne croit pas pouvoir mieux témoigner au Roi d'Angleterre combien il est touché de son intérêt, qu'en voulant être son obligé, et en lui fournissant l'occasion de lier à la fois sa reconnaissance et celle des vrais Français à la personne de Sa Majesté Britannique. Votre Excellence est instruite des nouvelles fureurs des factieux Français depuis qu'ils voyent la marche des armées combinées pour secourir le Roi. Elle sait que le Maire de Paris a présenté à l'Assemblée Nationale la prétendue pétition de la Municipalité pour la déchéance du Roi; tous mes avis secrets me forcent de croire que les factieux veulent décidément le succès de ce crime sous cette frénétique Assemblée, et attenter aux jours du Roi. Dans cette affreuse position, mon amour et mon devoir pour le Roi m'ont fait penser que je devais m'adresser à votre Excellence pour qu'Elle obtint du Roi d'Angleterre une démarche dont j'attendrais autant que de la force des armées pour contenir les rebelles et leurs forfaits, et je fais M. l'Evêque de Pamiers, associé à mon travail, porteur de cette lettre pour votre Excellence. Je vous prie de lui accorder croyance et confiance entière sur tout ce qu'il pourra vous dire. Je le charge de vous demander ardemment de proposer à Sa Majesté Britannique de vouloir se montrer assez l'ami du Roi et de la famille Royale, pour ordonner à son ambassadeur de déclarer au Ministre des Affaires Etrangères, que si on attentait à la vie du Roi, de la Reine, ou de M. le Dauphin, les scélérats seraient poursuivis par sa vengeance. Je suis persuadé que ce prononcé de l'amitié du Roi d'Angleterre arrêterait tous les crimes dont nos factieux se montrent capables. Vous jugez de l'obligation de la France pour un aussi grand service, et je me contente de la présenter à votre ame. Jamais deux nations rivales sans cesse de s'estimer et de s'honorer n'auront été réunies par une action dont la vertu soit aussi égale à l'éclat. Jamais votre Ministère n'aura pu donner un plus bel exemple au monde politique. Toujours je croirai le mien honoré de n'avoir pas hésité à mettre cette confiance sans mesure dans la grande ame du Roi d'Angleterre et dans les principes de son Ministre. Je ne crois pas en conjurant Sa Majesté Britannique de venir au secours du Roi par une démarche de son cœur, que je puisse paraître vouloir atténuer le système de neutralité que Sa Majesté a cru devoir adopter dans les troubles de la France, et je me flatte que votre Excellence en jugera ainsi. Je la prie, si elle est favorable à mes instances auprès du Roi d'Angleterre, de vouloir bien ne pas différer de les faire connaître à Sa Majesté pour que le bien que le Roi peut recevoir de son amitié arrive avant les scélérates actions. Je me sens bien soulagé en faisant mes très humbles prières à Sa Majesté Britannique, et en les remettant, pour qu'elles lui arrivent, entre les mains d'un ministre qui a fixé également l'estime et les regards de l'Europe avant l'âge qui permet ordinairement de les rechercher."

LE BARON DE BRETEUIL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, August 8, Brussels.—"Votre ministère et la reputation de vos talens ainsi que de vos vertus me suffisent pour me donner la confiance de m'adresser à votre Excellence dans la circonstance la plus majeure et la plus importante pour le Roi comme pour son royaume. M. Pitt à qui j'adresse les documens qui m'autorisent à vous prier, l'un et l'autre, de vouloir bien m'écrire sur les grands intérêts qui me sont confiés, voudra bien sans doute vous faire part de ma position ; et je me flatte, qu'ainsi que M. Pitt, vous m'accorderez assez d'estime pour croire à la vérité du titre avec lequel je me présente, et avec lequel je vous prie de me permettre de vous présenter le porteur de cette lettre, M. l'Evêque de Pamiers, associé à mon travail depuis que le Roi a bien voulu me remettre la conduite de toutes ses affaires, pendant qu'il n'a pas la possibilité de les diriger directement. Je vous prie de vouloir bien accorder audience et croyance à M. l'Evêque de Pamiers sur tout ce qu'il pourra vous dire. Je le charge de vous exposer les dangers du Roi, et de vous engager de concourir à déterminer le Roi d'Angleterre à couvrir Sa Majesté de l'égide de son amitié la plus prononcée, en faisant entendre aux factieux Français tous les ressentiments de Sa Majesté Britannique, si le Roi, la Reine ou M. le Dauphin se trouvaient victimes des forfaits de ces scélérats, comme tout indique que tels sont leurs horribles projets. L'Evêque de Pamiers dira à votre Excellence combien le temps presse. Si Sa Majesté Britannique croit pouvoir faire tenir à nos factieux le langage imposant que je sollicite de son amitié pour le Roi, je serai ravi que Sa Majesté contracte la plus vive reconnaissance pour Sa Majesté Britannique et pour la personne de son Ministre, qui réunit l'opinion de l'Europe à celle de ses compatriotes. J'éprouve une double en m'adressant à votre Excellence pour la plus grande, pour la plus juste cause que les annales du monde aient jamais présentée, parceque je sais que je la sou mets aux vertus publiques et particulières que la réputation de Votre Excellence m'a appris lui appartenir également."

M. CHAUVELIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, ce 16 Août, Portman Square, l'an 4 de la Liberté Française.—"Le soussigné Ministre Plénipotentiaire de Sa Majesté le Roi des Français, informé par diverses lettres particulières et par les papiers publics, des événements criminels et désastreux qui ont eu lieu à Paris dès le vendredi 10 du courant, doit à la Nation Française et au Roi qu'il a l'honneur de représenter, de mettre sous les yeux de Sa Majesté Britannique ce qui dans les circonstances actuelles lui paraît le plus digne de sa considération.

"La liberté de l'Assemblée Nationale vient d'être violée; des furieux qui ont égaré la multitude, convaincus par des faits récents et notoires que la grande majorité des Représentans de la Nation repoussait leurs coupables desseins, ont attenté à la sûreté de plusieurs d'entre eux. Après avoir déstitué les Magistrats du peuple, nommés par lui dans sa plus entière liberté, ils ont attaqué à main armée l'asile inviolable du Roi, ils l'ont réduit ainsi que Sa famille à chercher un refuge dans le sein de l'Assemblée Nationale; et au milieu des terreurs et du carnage, au bruit du canon, à la lueur de l'incendie du Chateau des Tuilleries, ils ont arraché au petit nombre des Représentans de la Nation à qui ils avaient permis de se rassembler, la suspension du pouvoir royal, l'emprisonnement du Roi et de Sa famille, et autres actes également contraires aux articles fondamentaux de la constitution que l'Assemblée Nationale a jurée avec tous les Français.

"L'Assemblée voyant sa propre liberté violée, a tenté de conserver celle de la Nation par un appel solennel qu'elle lui adresse en décrétant une Convention Nationale; mais les clauses mêmes qu'elle a jointes à cet acte conservatoire prouvent toujours plus à quel point elle était subjuguée par la crainte de provoquer de nouveaux crimes, en irritant les rebelles.

“ Convaincu que les malheurs actuels de la France et du Roi sont principalement dus à cette ligue qui s'est formée entre divers Princes de l'Europe contre l'indépendance et la liberté de la Nation; allarmé des désordres et des crimes qui peuvent encore désoler la France, si ces puissances persévèrent dans des mesures oppressives; persuadé que la Nation seule, rendue à elle-même et à ses propres forces, peut venger dignement de tel attentats et rétablir l'ordre sans altérer la liberté; le Soussigné, au nom de Sa Majesté le Roi des Français, et en vertu des instructions et des pleins pouvoirs qu'il en a précédemment reçus pour tout ce qui peut contribuer à l'union et au bonheur des deux empires, vient conjurer Sa Majesté Britannique de déployer en cette occasion toute son influence et, s'il en est besoin, d'agir de concert avec les autres puissances demeurées neutres à l'effet d'empêcher que des armées ennemies n'envahissent le territoire Français, n'y donnent des prétextes à de nouvelles fureurs, ne compromettent encore d'avantage la liberté, la sûreté, et l'existence du Roi et de Sa famille, et ne consomment ainsi les malheurs qu'ont amenés leurs Déclarations incendiaires, et enfin à l'effet d'inspirer à la Nation, si indignement outragée, le courage nécessaire pour se réunir, pour faire justice des forfaits commis en son nom, et pour ramener incessamment au milieu d'elle, le règne des loix et le respect dû aux autorités constituées.”

MINUTE of Mr. DUNDAS.

Mr. Aust will not allow any copies of the paper delivered this day by M. Chauvelin to get out of the office, and will inform (by circulating this note) His Majesty's confidential servants who attended the Cabinet this day, that M. Chauvelin having, in the most earnest manner, requested the paper to be returned to him, Mr. Dundas after consulting with Mr. Pitt, thought the reasons stated impossible to be resisted.

Mr. Aust will send a copy of this note to Lord Grenville, as Mr. Dundas mentioned it this day in a letter to him.

Endorsed.

“ Copy of instruction from Mr. Secretary Dundas to Mr. Aust, after his conference with M. Chauvelin at 6 p.m., August 17, 1792.”

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GOWER.

Private.

1792, August 17, London.—“ Along with this you will receive an official dispatch, in consequence of which you will leave Paris as soon as convenient. Your residence there at present cannot be a pleasant one, and the present state of the Government supercedes all your official powers. You will observe that the official dispatch is prepared in such a way as to relieve you from the difficulties of any very formal communication of his Majesty's feelings as to the present state of the Royal Family; for the best way of performing that duty will be by giving a copy of the dispatch (at the same time you ask your passports) as the most authentic explanation of the grounds of your leaving Paris, and the least formal way of expressing the sensation which any outrage to the Royal Family would naturally excite. It does not occur that I have anything more to trouble you with."

J. W. MILES to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, August 18, Cleveland Row.—"It may be proper perhaps to inform Lord Grenville of the character of the man who is become Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in France. His name is Le Brun. He was originally a private soldier. He deserted from his regiment, and left his country. After an absence of several years he returned, and, in conjunction with another, complimented the late Monsieur de Vergennes for his interposition in favour of the Americans; for which compliment he was, with his associate, conducted to the frontier of the kingdom and forbid to return. He went to Liege, and set up a paper called Le Journal Général et Politique de l'Europe. His indirect attacks on the clergy, and abuse of the Empress of Russia, occasioned complaints to be made by the latter; and he was ordered to submit his manuscripts in future to a Licensor, or to quit the territory. He moved to Herf, pays de Limburgh Autrichien, and commenced under the auspices of Monsieur de Ste. Croix, the French Envoy at Liege, a regular attack on the English Funds, with a view of obtaining his pardon from the French Court. The favourable part of his history had been told to me in the year 1786, and not being so well acquainted with the arcana politics and with mankind as I am at present, I attributed his gross misrepresentation of our Funds, and his libels on the public faith of my country, as the effects of ignorance, and from patriotism undertook to undeceive him. My information arriving at the time that he suspected M. de Ste. Croix was playing him foul, and qu'il fut joué par le Ministre à Paris, from whom he found he had nothing to expect, he answered my letter, and was afterwards very modest, and finally silent on the subject of our finances. He even came round and approved of them. Le croyant de bonne foi, and not being at that time instructed with his relation with M. de Ste. Croix, I considered him as a candid, honest, and oppressed man. In 1787, the States of Brabant issued an order for seizing his person, and he had only half an hour's notice to make his escape. He fled to Vienna, with only a crown in his pocket, to claim the protection of the Emperor. The Bourquestre Fabry told me his distress, and thinking I had made him friendly to this country, and knowing the influence of the public prints on the minds of the people abroad, I sent him twenty louis by a bill of exchange on Ratisbon, to enable him to pursue his journey, and with the view, I confess, of attaching him by gratitude to defend the interests of my country. The Emperor received him, ordered him to return, and promised his protection, which was all the recompense he had. At this time public report gave out that our Court, by its intrigues at Constantinople, had seduced the Porte to declare war against Russia, and the Journal Politique echoed the report. I wrote to Le Brun that he was mistaken, reasoned with him by letter, for I had never seen him, and convinced him of the falsehood of the slander. He contradicted what he had inserted, and rejected for some time all letters on the contrary side. Lord Torrington, I afterwards found, had recommended him to the Duke of Leeds to allow him something; and this by some means was communicated to Le Brun who, counting upon the success of the application, was the more hurt at not finding his hopes realised, and soon revived the Russian business, and never ceased to abuse Mr. Pitt and the English Government. Being ignorant of the cause I became incensed, and expressed my sentiments in pretty strong terms. He pretended to apologise, declared he had been deceived by the Government of Bruxelles, acknowledged his regret, and begged I would assist him with eighteen louis as he was in the utmost distress; which I declined. He then sent the Marquis de Langle from Herf to Bruxelles to trick me out of twenty. His attack on the Emperor in 1789 compelled him to fly to Liege, which the abdication of the late Bishop had left open to him. On the shameful flight of Dalton he returned to Herf, from whence he was again driven by Van Ensen and Vandernoot, and Liege was no longer an asylum to him when the Austrians entered to execute the Imperial decree. He then came to Paris, but, previous to his departure from the Low Countries, made an offer of his pen to the Government of Bruxelles, to whom he was the less obnoxious for having abused Van Ensen.

"A negotiation was opened, but his terms were considered as too extravagant, and being admitted into the Jacobin club at Paris where I saw him, he proposed setting up a paper in France, and actually published a prospectus, when he saw that by cabal and intrigue he might get into office. This is the short history of a man whose life was fully detailed to me in France, and which is marked by all that is atrocious and mean. Le Garde de Sceau, Danton, is also a terrible fellow, and such are the men to whom France is confided."

EDMUND BURKE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, August 18, Beconsfield.—"I do not know whether I can perfectly justify myself in venturing to trouble your Lordship, in my imperfect state of knowledge, with any suggestion of mine; but I trust that, however weak you may find my notions, you will believe that they are formed with general good intentions, and that they are laid before you with all possible respect to yourself and to your colleagues, and with real good wishes for whatever may contribute to your reputation in the conduct of the King's business.

"The late shocking though long expected event at Paris has rendered, in my opinion, every step that shall be taken with regard to France at this conjuncture extremely delicate.

"The part of a neutral Power is in itself delicate, but particularly so in a case in which it is impossible to suppose that, in this neutrality, there should not be some lurking wish in favour of one of the parties in the contest. The conduct of such a Power will be looked up to with hope and fear during the contention. Every thing which such a power says or does will be construed by an application to the circumstances.

"The present circumstances are an attack upon the King of France's palace; the murder of all who were found in it; the imprisonment of the King; his suspension, stated by the faction itself as a deposition; acts of violence which have obliged the majority of the National Assembly to absent themselves from their functions. Add to these the intention, not in the least ambiguous, of bringing the King and Queen to a trial; and by many, of putting them to death, with or without that formality. The effect of these things, from their very nature, and the nature of men, as well as from the principle on which they are done, at a time when theories are rashly formed and rapidly pass from speculation into practice, and when ill examples, at all times apt to infect, are so unusually contagious, it is unnecessary for me to state to one of your Lordship's sagacity and penetration.

"This last revolution, whatever name it may assume, at present bears no one character of a national act. It is the act only of some desperate persons, instigating and hiring at an enormous expense the lowest of the people, inhabitants of one city only, to destroy the monarch and monarchy, with whatever else is respectable in society. Not one officer of the national guards of Paris, which officers are composed of nothing higher than good tradesmen, has appeared in this business. It is not yet adopted throughout France by any one class of people. No regular government of any country has yet an object with which they can decently treat in France, or to which they can rationally make any official declaration whatsoever.

"In such a state of things to address the present heads of the insurrection, put by them[selves] into the nominal administrative departments of state office, is to give a direct sanction to their authority on the part of the Court of Great Britain. To this time the King of France's name has appeared to every public act and instrument; and all office transactions to our Court, and to every other foreign Court, have appeared in their usual form. If we pleased it was in our power to shut our eyes as to everything else, but this is now no longer possible. I should therefore beg leave to submit it to consideration, whether to recognise the leaders in the late murderous insurrection as the actual Government of France is not, at best, a little premature. Perhaps it may be a doubt, as a matter of sound policy, whether more would not be lost by this hasty recognition on the side of the great, settled, and acknowledged Powers, than we can hope to gain by pressing to pay our court to this, at best, unformed and embryo potentate.

"I take it for granted that it will not be easy for Lord Gower to continue in his present situation. If it were even thought for the dignity of this Crown, no man of honour and spirit would submit to it. It is a sacrifice too great to be made of all generous and noble feeling. I should humbly propose it for consideration whether, on his retreat, great reserve ought not to be used with regard to any declaration. If any person standing in the place of a Minister should apply to him for an explanation, he ought, in my poor opinion, to be absolutely silent; but if that should not be the best course, he might say that he had leave to return on his private affairs. The King of Spain has no Minister at Paris, yet his neutrality has hitherto been complete. The neutrality of this Court has already been more than once declared. At this moment any over prompt and affected new declaration on that subject, made to the persons who have lately vaulted into the seat of government, after committing so many atrocious acts and threatening more, would have all the force and effect of a declaration in their favour. Although it should be covered with mollifying expressions with regard to the King's personal safety (which will be considered as nothing but a sacrifice to decorum and ceremony, and as mere words of course) it will appear to the Jacobin faction as a direct recommendation to their meditated act of regicide; knowing, as the world does, their dispositions, their menaces, their preparations, and the whole train of the existing circumstances. In that case to say, 'I hope you mean no ill, and I recommend it to you to do no ill, but do what you please, you have nothing to fear from me,' would be plainly to call upon them to proceed to any lengths their wickedness might carry them.

"It is a great doubt with me whether a declaration to this new Power, a creature almost literally of yesterday, and a creature of treasonable and murderous riot of the lowest people in one city, is not a substantial breach of the neutrality promised to the Power to whom originally the neutrality was assured on the interposition of foreign Powers, namely to the Most Christian King. To take the first opportunity with the most extraordinary haste to remove all fears from the minds of his assassins, is tantamount to taking a part against him. Much I fear that, though if such a declaration were made nothing could be more remote from the intention of this Court, if the act of atrocity apprehended should actually take place, we shall be considered as ready accomplices in it, and a sort of accessories before the fact; particularly when no declaration on the part of our Court has been yet called for by the new Power, and that as yet they have no Minister at this Court. If the step of the recall of our Minister, supposing such a step in contemplation, should produce any fears in them, I see no use in removing those fears. On our part the navy of France is not so formidable that I think we have any just ground of apprehension that she will make war upon us. It is not the enmity but the friendship of France that is truly terrible. Her intercourse, her example, the spread of her doctrines are the most dreadful of her arms.

"I do not see what a nation loses in reputation or in safety by keeping its conduct in its own power. I think such a state of freedom in the use of a moral and politic reserve in such unheard of circumstances, can be well justified to any Sovereign abroad or to any party or person at home. I perceive that much pains are taken by the Jacobins of England to propagate a notion, that States have not a right to interfere, according to their discretion, in the interior affairs of another. This strange notion can be only supported by a confusion of ideas, and not distinguishing the case of promoting rebellion and sedition in a neighbouring country, and taking a part in the divisions of a country when they prevail and are actually formed. In the first case there is undoubtedly more difficulty than in the second, in which there is clearly no difficulty at all. To interfere in such dissensions requires great prudence and circumspection, and a serious attention to justice, and to the policy of one's own country as well as to that of Europe. But an abstract principle of public law forbidding such interference, is not supported by the reason of that law, nor by the authorities on the subject, nor by the practice of this kingdom, or by that of any civilized nation in the world. This nation owes its laws and liberties, his Majesty owes the throne on which he sits, to the contrary principle. The several treaties of guarantee to the Protestant Succession more than once reclaimed, affirm the principle of interference, which in a manner forms the basis of the public law of Europe. A more mischievous idea cannot exist, than that any degree of wickedness, and violence, and oppression may exist in a country; that the most abominable, exterminatory, and murderous rebellions may rage in it; or the most atrocious and bloody tyranny may domineer, and that no neighbouring power can take cognizance of either, or offer succour to the miserable sufferers.

"I trust your Lordship will have the goodness to excuse the freedom taken by an old member of Parliament. The habits of the House of Commons teach a liberty perhaps improper with regard to office. But be assured there is nothing in mine that has the smallest mixture of hostility; and it will, I trust, appear that my motives are candid and friendly, if ever this affair should come into discussion in the House of Commons, and I should feel myself called on to deliver my opinion. If I were, as formerly I have been, in systematic opposition (most assuredly I am not so now) I had much rather, according to my practice in more instances than one, respectfully to state a doubt to Ministers whilst a measure is depending, than to reproach them afterwards with its consequences in my place. What I write will, I hope, at worst be thought the intrusion of an importunate friend. I am thoroughly convinced that the faction of English Jacobins, though a little under a cloud for the present, is neither destroyed nor disheartened. The fire is still alive under the ashes; every encouragement, direct or indirect, given to their brethren in France, stirs and animates the embers. So sure as we have an existence, if these things should go on in France, as go on they may, so sure it is that, in the ripeness of their time, the same tragedies will be acted in England. Carra and Condorcet, and Santerre, and Pétion, and their brethren, the Priestleys, the Coopers, and the Watts, the deputies of a body of the Dissenters and others at Manchester who embraced Carra in the midst of the Jacobin club, the Revolution Society that received Pétion in London, the whole race of the affiliated who are numerous and powerful, whose principles, dispositions, and wishes are the very same, are as closely connected as ever; and they do not fail to mark and use everything that shows a remissness, or any equivocal appearance in Government, to their own advantage. I conceive that the Duke of Brunswick is as much fighting the battle of the Crown of England as the Duke of Cumberland did at Culloden. I conceive that any unnecessary declarations on our part will be, to him, and to those who are disposed to put a bound to this empire of anarchy and assassination, a signal discouragement. The cause of my dread, and perhaps over officious anxiety at this time, has arisen from what (you will have the goodness to pardon me) I thought rather too much readiness to declare on other occasions. Perhaps I talk of a thing not at all in contemplation. I have never heard that it was. If no thoughts of the kind have been entertained, your Lordship will be pleased to consider this as waste paper. It is at any rate but an hint to yourself and requires no answer."

EDMUND BURKE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, September 19, Bath.—"I am to acknowledge with my best thanks the honour of your Lordship's letter of the 6th instant. I ought to be the more sensible of this mark of your polite attention, because in submitting to your Lordship's judgment my weak and crude sentiments upon an important subject, I did not desire or expect an answer. The fact is (and I am afraid it is but too visible) I wrote the letter in some haste, and under some agitation, the effect of the extraordinary events of the 10th of August, which made, though far from unexpected, as they and their consequences do still make, no slight impression upon my mind. But recollecting, that there was little in what I then wrote which I had not suggested before in a discussion of the probable effect of the French Revolution upon the whole of Europe, written at the close of the year 1791; that this paper had been communicated to your Lordship, and that it did not meet your ideas, I resolved not to send my letter. It lay by me, until on some conversation in a meeting merely accidental with our common friend Mr. King, I showed to him what I had hastily thrown down on what, I thought, a most melancholy state of things. He seemed rather to wish it to be communicated to your Lordship, and so I sent it, as I recollect, without even the formality of a direction.

"I knew very well the determination of this Court with regard to the neutrality. But I humbly conceived that, even on that determination, the declaration had been made sufficiently; and that, under the circumstances, a frequent and affected renewal of the same assurance might be considered, by the regicide faction in France, as amounting to an encouragement to proceed to the final execution of its designs on their unhappy prisoner; as well as to continue to affront His Majesty our Sovereign, by never referring to him, but to the English nation as a body separate and distinct, and, in its intercourse with foreign Powers, not fully represented by the Crown. This, since the removal of Lord Gower, they have done.

“Our object, as your Lordship very truly observes, is the same; namely the prevention of the prevalence of these principles in this country. But it is my misfortune that I have very different ideas on the mode of compassing our common end. I am very ready to allow that I ought to entertain them with the greatest diffidence myself, and that they ought to have the less comparative weight with others, that I am not officially responsible for their effects.

“Whatever weight they may have, most certainly the object of them, the French business, is no light or trivial thing, or such as commonly has occurred in the course of political events. At present the whole political state of Europe hinges upon it. On the Continent, there is little doubt, every thing will take its future shape and colour from the good or ill success of the Duke of Brunswick. In my opinion, it is the most important crisis that ever existed in the world. I know it is the opinion of His Majesty’s Ministers that the new principles may be encouraged, and even triumph over every interior and exterior resistance, and may even overturn other States as they have that of France, without any sort of danger of their extending in their consequences to this kingdom. My poor opinion is that these principles, considering their quality and the means by which they are supported, cannot possibly be realised in practice in France, without an absolute certainty, and that at no remote period, of overturning the whole fabric of the British constitution. On that head, however, I do not mean to trouble your Lordship any further. My sense of a very urgent, certainly a most unpleasant duty, may lead me, if I can obtain an hearing, to a full explanation of my sentiments in my place. I do not expect the good fortune of the coincidence of any of the King’s Ministers. But if I may seem (a thing which I assure you gives me an heartfelt concern) to differ with them, they will be amply indemnified by the support of many, and some of those men of the most brilliant abilities in the House, and in the kingdom.”

GENERAL MONEY to CAPTAIN GORDON.

Extract.

1792, September 19, Camp Coté-bien, near St. Ménéhould.—“In my last I informed you of the positions taken by General Dumourier and General Kellerman to prevent the enemy penetrating, and that my position is in the gorge of the mountains at a very important pass, which I apprehend from the manœuvres of King of Prussia must soon be evacuated. I also informed you I had given in my resignation, and which has been refused to be received.

“I think it a duty I owe myself that my friends should know it; I think it a duty I owe the public that through you [they should have] authentic accounts of the most important events that attend this army.

“General Dumourier has been obliged to retire from his position at Grand-pré. He had taken a very advantage post between two woods; he had advanced General Chauzaud to another pass still more on his left; but there was a small gorge in the mountain which was thought of little consequence; the enemy penetrated these the 15th. General Chauzaud returned and attacked the head of the column of the enemy, and they fell back in some disorder. The Prince de Ligne who commanded the enemy was killed, and his two aides-de-camp. In a few hours after, the enemy returned in great force and obliged the French to retire. The next day the enemy appeared on the left flank of General Dumourier, he immediately ordered his tents to be struck and began his march to join us. Unfortunately the baggage of his army took a route never meant for them, in consequence of which a great deal of baggage was lost; I believe all that belonged to the Generals, but not the military chest. Our hussars, it is said, behaved exceedingly well, twenty-three in one regiment were killed or taken. The 12th regiment of cavalry behaved ill; the National Guards behaved ill also, as they threw themselves into the woods without availing themselves of the advantage they had in being there. Two pieces of cannon only were lost. Had Dumourier been hard pressed he would have lost all his artillery, but it arrived safe near St. Ménéhould on the 17th. He has taken another position, and is joined by General Kellerman and 11,000 men from the frontiers of Flanders. The army now consists of 60,000 men, they say more; on this ground they mean to risk a battle, which I think will be fatal to them, though we have 10,000 cavalry which will certainly contribute to prevent a total defeat. I think this afternoon or to-morrow they will be obliged to fight or quit their position, then of course I must quit mine. I have issued the order of retreat. I expect from my situation to lose not only my baggage but all my artillery. I have, however, taken every precaution in my power to save both. On the 18th the enemy cannonaded my post for near two hours, and threw a number of shells amongst us; the men behaved exceedingly well and stood to their post, though shot and shells were continually dropping amongst them. The enemy, on my sending some men into the woods on the right beyond my abbatis, retired; very few men were killed on either side. I expect them again the moment the Prussians attack Dumourier.

"This is our present situation. I shall write to you again after the action, which I hope Dumourier will act with more prudence than to risk, for, if he retires before the enemy, they never dare to penetrate into the country and leave so formidable a force in their rear. We have eat up everything the country affords. The Prussians are obliged to take the cows of the poor peasants for the subsistence of their army, and their light troops live by plunder. The inhabitants are in the most distressed situation it is possible to conceive, particularly those who are between the two armies."

GENERAL MONEY to GENERAL RAINSFORD.

1792, September 20, Camp Coté-bien, near St. Ménéhould.—"I still command here. It is now the right flank of General Dumourier's army; the enemy are in considerable force opposite, but I think they will not risk a serious attack on this post. I have only 5,000 men, as the pass is so very strong by nature and art that even that number is not necessary to defend it; but our engineers, like all others, have erected so many works that we must occupy in our front, that we cannot dégarnir the post more than it has been. I had a warm cannonade the 17th, which lasted near two hours. I hear the cannon on my left whilst I am writing, about five miles off at Vienne de Chateau; the Prussians are advancing to attack our grand army which, I understand, amount to near 70,000 men, most of them troops of the line. We have 15,000 cavalry. Notwithstanding this great army, I think we shall be beat. It rains very fast and that is in our favour, as the ground over the plains and corn fields is soft, and the enemies horses are in bad condition; and they are in great want of bread, insomuch that their light troops and advanced corps live by plunder. I am in a critical situation. The right of Dumourier's army is about two miles from St. Ménéhould; I must retreat if he is beat, which cannot be done by St. Ménéhould. I am five miles from it, and by the time I arrive there the enemy will be in possession. I have a road through the woods which is in a bad condition."

"September 21.--Whilst I was writing yesterday an attack was made on my post in consequence of the grand armies being engaged. The left of Dumourier's has given way considerable, insomuch that our communication with Chalons is cut. Dumourier is marching by his left to secure our communication. The business of yesterday was only a heavy cannonade on our right; the left was only amused, while the enemy pressed the right. This has had so far the desired effect. We must certainly prevent the enemy from turning our left flank or retire to Vitry; the latter is by far the measure we ought to adopt. The enemy have two objects in view, to fight us on advantageous terms, or oblige us to retire and quit this pass which will open his communication by a short rout to Verdun. The attack on my post did not last above an hour. General Dillon was at dinner with me; we went down and ordered two eight pounders out of the retrenchment, for their howitzers were out of reach of our guns. We advanced under the cover [of] a rising piece of ground, and drove them back in great disorder into Clermont. I expect them every minute to come, as we attacked last night their grand guard. Our men behaved shameful. We had 2,000 men, and as soon as the firing began in the front, those in the rear dispersed, and the greater part have been wandering all night in the wood, and a terrible bad night it has been. Maréchal Luckner is or was at Chalons when the Marseillais arrived. They began their freaks by cutting off the head of a man apprehended as a spy. The line of the Maréchal was menaced; he and Dillon are both announced by one of the party writers of Paris as traitors to the cause. If the Marseillais put the Maréchal to death the army will not leave a man of them alive; if they come here, they are held in the most sovereign contempt by the troops of the line. I have the pleasure to say I am on the best terms possible with the national guards as well as with the troops of the line. I will do my duty while I am with them, which shall be no longer than the campaign lasts, which I apprehend will not be before Christmas. I hope to get my Christmas dinner with you yet. When you come to town, write to my sister for game. I have ordered all my game to be destroyed except my pheasants.

"I shall only add that I expect to lose all my cannon and camp equipage whenever we quit this post. We must retreat by the forest towards Vitry. I have taken every precaution possible; the roads are repaired, and I have 200 workmen with hatchets to cut the trees in our rear. But if we get out of the forest we are not sure we shall meet our friends on the other side. 'To be or not to be' is the question now. Dillon is very brave and understands combination well, but he has wild ideas, and he is indiscreet in the extreme in speaking his mind too freely on public affairs. I should not be surprised to hear he is put in arrest, which is tantamount to a death warrant. I shall conclude till to-morrow.

September 23.--"Yesterday passed without a shot being fired on either side. The King of Prussia has cut our communication by the great road to Chalon. I went last night to St. Ménéhould. I went on purpose to give my opinion to Dumourier. I found General Kellerman with him. I told them from the situation of the two armies we ought to retire immediately towards Vitry, that I was certain the enemy dare not march towards Paris and leave 70,000 in rear. I have the pleasure to find both of them not to differ in opinion with me, and I expected this morning at daylight orders to strike our tents and be prepared to march in a moment's warning. But an extraordinary event has taken place which may be attended with consequence of the greatest importance to these unhappy and miserable people. The King of Prussia has sent to demand a conference between Dumourier and one of his generals between the two armies. I leave you in England to form your conjectures of what may be result of this conference. The enemy are certainly in great distress for want of bread and forage, and we shall be in the same situation in a few days. I have never varied in my opinion a moment; we have no business to fight the Prussians; we must retire before them, not on the rout to Paris, that would be the greatest folly in the world. They would be masters of all the country in their rear. Now they can only forage on their left flank. If we risk a battle we must be beat, but this I have said before. The generals seem sensible of it themselves. I am inclined to think the enemy have a deep finesse in this conference; it is to gain time to bring all their force from Verdun in rear of our right flank. Monsieur and Le Comte D'Artois is with the King of Prussia; a large body of the emigrants and the Hessians are opposite me; there is little desertion on either side. I shall write to you again soon and let you know the result of this conference."

GENERAL MONEY to GENERAL RAINSFORD.

1792, September 24, Camp Coté-bien, near St. Ménéhould.—"The conference which I mentioned in my last, held between the two armies with Monsieur Manstein, a Prussian General, and Dumourier yesterday, was this day renewed. The subject of this conference is a profound secret; some say the Prussians have desired a cessation of arms for six months, and that it has been refused; others say that propositions are made for the return of the emigrants. This, however, is certain that the enemy are in a bad situation. The country in their rear furnishes no forage or provisions of any kind; they must either risk a battle in a day or two or retire. It is said they are near 60,000, but we are augmented to near 100,000 with those arrived at Chalons, most of them troops of the line. The enemy are formed en potence; a part of their army face General Kellerman, the other Dumourier; their cavalry on their right flank, ours on our left. They thought by gaining the grand chaussée to Chalons we should be obliged to retire, and open their communication by a short route to Verdun. I must confess I thought we could not have remained twenty-four hours here; but I understand our position is strong, that we have now in our camp, pointed on the direction the enemy must take, eighty-three pieces of cannon, eight and twelve pounders, besides near four hundred pieces of four pounders battalion guns. Our communication is not cut to Chalons; we had five hundred waggons loaded with bread yesterday from thence. We have a friendly country behind us, they a pillaged and enraged peasantry.

"This is the present situation of the two armies. I leave you to form your conjectures on the probability of events. It rains very fast, which is much against the enemy whether they advance or retreat, as the ground is soft and slippery.

"The enemy opposite me have been very quiet these two days; we have neither annoyed them or they us. They are fortifying the gorge opposite me, which looks as if they feared our penetrating here, if their grand army retire. If the enemy do not risk a battle, which may be fatal to them, they must quit France, and never think of entering it in this direction, as all the gorges of this forest, as well as those beyond Verdun, will be occupied. Probably these people will be left to themselves to cut each other's throats.

September 25.—"General Dillon arrived last night from St. Ménéhould to visit the posts. He informed me that he had seen the Prussian General who told him they had been deceived by the emigrants, who had assured them all our cavalry and the troops of the line would have joined their army. It is very true that they hold in abhorrence those assassins who have committed such outrages at Paris and Versailles; but not a man will quit his post to join the enemy; but if the enemy retire it is probable they will have great desertions. The force of the enemy is greatly increased by a body of emigrants.

September 26.—"Not a shot was fired yesterday. The Prussian General was yesterday at St. Ménéhould and dined with Dumourier. I am inclined to think this is a deep finesse of the enemy, and that they meditate an attack on us, when they [we?] are off our guard, and when all their force is assembled. If they direct their whole strength against Dumourier's left flank and separate the two armies, and they succeed, we at this post are lost; at least all our cannon and baggage must be taken, as the heavy rains have made roads through the forest impossible. Or if Dumourier is obliged to retire, I will never believe that an army of 60,000 Prussian and Austrians will retire without risking a battle. I every moment expect to hear it begin, and, of course, this post attack[ed] not [to] force us, [but] to keep us here, and prevent our sending succours to Dumourier."

MEMORANDUM BY LORD GRENVILLE ON THE INSURRECTION OF AUGUST 10, AND THE SEPTEMBER MASSACRES, IN PARIS.

1792, September 24.—"M. Talleyrand told me that the Princess de Lamballe had been acquitted by the tribunal which was established at the prisons by the mob. That all the prisoners, whether condemned or acquitted, were obliged to pass through a wicket where two men stood to give the first blow to those who were to be massacred. That, on going out of this wicket, she stepped into the blood of the victims who had preceded her, and being sickened by this, her head (by a convulsion to which she was subject) fell on one side, which made those near her think that she had been struck by one of the men at the door; and that it was in consequence of this that she was immediately pierced through with a pike, and afterwards despatched.

"A. M.—an aide-de-camp of M. de Narbonne, was acquitted by the same tribunal; but they told him that he must not go out yet, because the man who immediately preceded him had been likewise absolved, and the people expected some one upon whom they might satisfy their fury. He insisted that he would not stay unless they would tell him that it was for their safety and not for his that they made the request. They did, and he stayed.

"On the 10th August there were in the palace 2,000 of the national guard, on whom dependence might have been placed. A battalion of this guard whose sentiments were doubtful had been sent away. The King had reviewed them in the morning, and the national guards appeared as much determined to stand by him if he was attacked, as the Swiss. On the first appearance of the mob the King took fright, when he announced his intention to go to the Assembly. M. de Ste. Croix spoke to him in strong terms, and told him that if he went there, and abandoned the national guards, the Swiss, and the gentlemen who had been three days in the palace to defend him, il ferait une lâcheté. He went, but, as he left the palace, told those who were there to defend it. This appeared from that moment to be impossible.

"Before his flight on the 21st June, he had 1,800 of the national guard of Paris in pay."

WILLIAM LINDSAY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, September 27, Cavendish Square.—"I have this morning seen Sir Robert Smyth who is just returned from Paris; which place he left the 21st instant, after the arrival of the news of Dumourier's defeat, which, he says, did not make so much impression as might have been expected from what he (though a violent democrat) confesses was a great victory on the side of the Prussians. Sir Robert informs me that the first business the Convention intends to enter upon is fully to debate the great question whether a monarch is necessary to their form of Government. It is pretty well known which way this matter will be carried; but the Deputies thinking it more prudent to have their decision on so weighty a point sanctioned by the eighty-three Departments, are to ask their advice on the subject before they come to a final determination. They are next to revise and new model the late constitution, lopping off such parts of it as may not appear to coincide with the present state of men's minds. Some reforms are also to be made in the municipalities whose powers have been found too extensive and dangerous. It is expected that an order of the Convention will authorize M. Pétion to continue in his office of Mayor of Paris, notwithstanding his being a Deputy. It is not intended to murder any of the Royal Family, and their personal safety is not likely to be endangered except by the momentary caprice of an ungovernable mob. Her Most Christian Majesty has had a return of an old complaint, a swelling in her legs, but she is not dangerously ill. Should the Duke of Brunswick approach too near to Paris the Convention will remove to Tours, and adjourn from place to place as circumstances may require, in the same manner as was practised by the American Congress in the late rebellion.

"Mr. Thomas Payne on his arrival in France was received with great honours; some cannon were fired to salute him, and the municipality waited upon him to congratulate him on his safe landing in a land of freedom.

"As Sir Robert Smyth is, I know, intimately connected with some of the leading Republicans, much of this intelligence is likely to be true, and I hope your Lordship will not think me impertinent for troubling you with it.

"The above person is extremely violent, and will do all the mischief in his power during his stay here. He proposes to return next week; he says he is come on private business."

GEORGE MUNRO to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, October 1, London.—"I arrived here this morning after a tedious passage; I have therefore but little to communicate, as the Thursday's mail only left Paris some hours before me. You, of course, have heard that Monsieur Robespierre was denounced in the National Convention for having an intention of aspiring to be dictator. The whole of the Parisian Deputies considered themselves as in some degree involved in this accusation, and many of them separately made their defence. Monsieur Danton in particular spoke much in vindication of himself, and moved that the punishment of death should be inflicted on any one who dared to propose a dictator, or who should propose any division of the French Republic. In this debate of the greatest confusion and heat, Marat, the friend of Robespierre, was violently attacked for his different affichées, in one of which he had openly proposed electing a dictator. This man mounted the tribune to defend himself, and, after an odd sort of defence, took a pistol from his pocket, and declared that, had they decreed to accuse him, he would instantly have shot himself.

"On Wednesday morning the Ministre de la Guerre gave in his resignation, on a pretence of bad health, an excuse which no one believed.

"I think I told you in my last General Luckner had arrived in Paris. They recalled him on a pretence of asking his advice respecting the mode of defence they ought to adopt in defending the capital; and a member proposed that this should be done in writing, and in German, as the General had once before retracted a conversation he had with a Deputy respecting La Fayette's marching his army to Paris, on a pretence that he must have explained himself wrong, not understanding the French sufficiently. The old man submitted to this insult, and sent his mémoire to the Convention; the nature of its contents were of course not made public.

"General Montesquiou's having entered Savoy and taken Montmelian [Montméliart?] had put all classes of people in the greatest spirits, and the National Convention had suspended that General's dismissal till the Deputies that were sent to his camp should make their report of his conduct.

"These are the chief circumstances that had happened in Paris prior to my departure. The minds of the people were much agitated, and it was easy to discover a want of confidence in the whole National Convention rapidly increasing amongst all classes of people. The massacre of one party or other was already talked of, and I daresay will soon take place. They were making no progress in the works about Paris; last time I was there I saw scarce any one working. All along the road they were complaining much of the want and dearness of provisions. I am sure many of the people will soon rise and pillage the magazines, and they seem now only anxious for some settled government, not caring of what kind it may be."

STEPHEN ROLLESTON to GEORGE AUST.

1792, October 19, Dover.—"I have seen a great many private letters from France and Germany within these few days, and have conversed with very well informed gentlemen recently arrived from the Continent, some zealously attached to the cause of one of the contending parties, and some to that of the other, and have endeavoured, to the best of my judgment amidst a great inundation of exaggerated details on both sides of the question, to separate truth from falsehood, and to penetrate, as far as I was able, into the nature of the secret negotiation that took place between his Prussian Majesty and the Executive Council in France during the late suspension of arms, which was immediately followed by the retreat of the Prussian army, under circumstances that appeared to me to be somewhat mysterious. My attention was principally directed to this point by a Declaration of M. Lebrun (the Minister for Foreign Affairs) to the National Convention on the 25th ultimo, which I alluded to in a former letter to you. After taking a review of the private politics of every Court in Europe, this Minister concluded his Rapport by throwing out 'that there were negotiations then on foot ' with Foreign Powers, and one in particular upon which the future ' existence of the Republic depended.' He forbore communicating anything further on that head. I forwarded by my servant to Mr. Pitt at Walmer Castle the Moniteur of the 26th September which contained that Rapport; and took the liberty at the same time of marking the paragraph in question with my pen, in order to direct Mr. Pitt's attention thereto, as I conceived the result of the negotiation alluded to might possibly materially affect the future interests of this country.

"The intelligence which made the greatest impression on my mind, and appeared to be accompanied by the strongest marks of authenticity, was to the following purport:

"That the Executive Council in France are in possession of the originals of some private letters which passed between their most Christian Majesties and the late and present Emperor, relative to an armed interference in the affairs of France on the part of their Imperial and Prussian Majesties, with a view to bring about a counter-revolution in that country. That copies of these letters were sent by the Executive Council to M. Dumourier during the late truce, with instructions to communicate them to his Prussian Majesty, with an offer to show the originals to any person whom the King of Prussia should confidentially authorize to inspect them in Paris; and in the meantime these letters should be kept secret from the Convention. That in some of these papers (written during the time he manifested a disinclination to co-operate with the Emperor in this business) the character and talents of his Prussian Majesty were commented upon, in a manner that could not fail to excite the indignation of the King of Prussia. That M. Dumourier was empowered to follow up any impression which this communication might make on the mind of his Prussian Majesty, by an offer on the part of the French Republic calculated to gratify the ambition of this sovereign, and to humiliate his natural rival. That the language which the King of Prussia made use of upon this occasion was exceedingly guarded, and though he did not commit himself in any manner to the Executive Council, yet that his manner has given ground to conclude that he has taken their proposition ad deliberandum. That his Prussian Majesty intends to keep well with the Emperor, for the present at least, as thereby he will carry two strings to his bow. Upon the one hand, if the present contending factions in the National Convention should again produce general anarchy and unbridled cruelty throughout the country, and that their Imperial Majesties should meet the King of Prussia's wishes with regard to the formation of the new government in France, and in respect to other objects in a more distant quarter from hence, he might come forward at the commencement of the next campaign, at the head [of a] far more extended and formidable combination of Powers, and accomplish with greater facility the re-establishment of the royal authority in that country, in a manner the most favourable to the reciprocal interests of these three sovereigns; and, upon the other hand, in case the exertions of the National Convention should produce any degree of order in the country, and appear likely to retain the confidence of the nation at large, his Prussian Majesty will have it in his power perhaps to secure the gratitude and attachment of the bulk of the people, by withdrawing himself from the Emperor, and thereby giving permanency to the present form of government in France, while he avails himself of the proffered boon. It is supposed that his Prussian Majesty will be the more disposed to steer the latter course, provided the internal affairs of France take a turn favourable to the adoption of such a line of conduct towards the commencement of the next campaign, as, in addition to the impression which is supposed to be made by the letters before alluded to, he is said to have a misunderstanding with the Emperor in consequence of his Imperial Majesty's retaining possession of some post (contrary to the remonstrances of the King of Prussia) in the Turkish territories (which is of considerable consequence in the present subjugated state of Poland), and as he does not consider himself fairly dealt with by either of their Imperial Majesties in respect to Dantzic and Thorn.

"I have felt it my duty to state to you, with as much precision as I was able, but with a considerable degree of diffidence, the above particulars, because I conceived that the peace and happiness of this country might possibly be involved in the game now about to be played upon the Continent; and as I heard from authority, which I look upon to be undoubted, that the King of Prussia declared not long since that 'he considered this country as completely unconnected with any other Power as she ever was since she became a nation.'" 1792, October 19, Treves.—"I was prevented from giving you the news of the operations of the inglorious campaign we have made, by not having the smallest communication with any post town, nor indeed with the main body of the army; being always at the advanced guard with the Prussian and Austrian hussars, with whom our regiment was starving in the barren plains of Champagne pouilleux.

————— to SIR MORTON EDEN.

"The reason of our unexpected and disorderly retreat probably you diplomatic gentlemen can account for; as no military man of either of the three armies with whom I have conversed can form the most distant conjecture of it. Three superior armies in numbers, almost surrounding the undisciplined rabble of Dumourier, and after waiting ten or twelve days till half the army perished by famine and disease, retreating as we did.

"I give you the position as near as I remember, and you may judge. The French, desponding and impatient in adversity as they are insolent in prosperity, but ill recompense the King of Prussia for the loss of half his army, and active part he took for them. They openly accuse him and the Duke of Brunswick of either betraying them or, at best, say that the Duke committed numberless faults, in first cannonading without either bombarding or besieging in form Thionville. Secondly, in advancing precipitately into the plains of lousy Champagne, almost as barren as the deserts of Barca, without provisions or communication behind him; and leaving behind him Metz and Thionville, where, if he could not have advanced to Paris, he might have formed a line of communication for the winter; namely, the left of the armies in Metz or Toul, and the right extending to Sedan and Mezières, by Verdun, Stenay, and Montmédy. And lastly, in the council of war on the 28th or 29th, being the only negative for an attack on Dumourier, which Clerfayt offered singly to do, and which, though it would have cost a number of men, particularly in the attack on the Islets which he neglected to take possession of, and where Arthur Dillon was posted, but certainly must have dispersed and discouraged that army, and prevented their harassing the armies in the manner they have done.

"Far from forming any impertinent remark on the conduct of a General so universally looked up to as the Duke, I wait with impatience for the reasons which I am certain he had, but with surprise and concern have been an eye-witness to the ruin and disorder of so great a part of the finest army in the world; and the ruin and desolation which marked our entrance into France, and which must have estranged from our cause any unfortunate inhabitant (if such a one there was) who might have been inclined to us; as not only the villages were pillaged and burnt, the inhabitants deprived not only of their cattle of every kind, hay, and straw, but mostly of their houses; as for the want of fire we were often obliged to burn their barns and the wood of their houses; and even the country layed waste of the only crop which grows in it, rye; so that it must have had the appearance of the Ukraine layed waste by the double scourges of heaven, the locusts and Tartars.

"The sometimes want of even bread, and that which we had being of sour rotten rye, bad water and even that (as happened at a post I was at, at Croix in Champagne) where we were obliged to send a league and a half for it, no brandy, and the war (unexampled in the memory of man) which the heavens declared against us, brought on the dysentery which almost totally destroyed the half of the Prussian army.

"From the 2nd of August but three days without perpetual rain even till the moment I am writing, destroyed the horses, so that the whole country was covered with dead horses; and in the retreat between Longuion and Longwy, in the bad roads through which the convoy of the sick passed, I saw, as I passed with the rear-guard, five Prussian soldiers thrown off the waggons, and lying in the mud, dead and neglected at the side of the carriages lying also there, and nineteen thrown into a waste barn. The magazines which followed the Austrian army, and indeed I believe the great coats which the infantry have, in a great measure contributed to the mortality not being so great as it was in the Prussian army; and on every occasion they have shown a steadiness, patience, and discipline superior to any other, which I was once far from imagining.

"The Princes with their numberless train of domestics, maison du Roi, maison de Monsieur, maison du Comte D'artois, generals, cooks, and aides-de-camp without number, remained in Asiatic magnificence behind the armies, consuming the little forage left for useful soldiers. They had always eight thousand cavalry to protect them, and which otherwise were useless. Berching's, Chamborra's, and Lauzun's hussars, with another corps of light cavalry, composing in all about two thousand, formed the advanced guard, and in the retreat we were the rear guard. At first we had Koeller's (Prussian) hussars, and afterwards Esterhazi's (Austrian) hussars, and lastly Wolfrath's Prussian with us, and some small detachments of light infantry. We had perpetual employment, and always in the nights, during which we were always on horseback from twelve till five in the mornings. And even in the retreat we were once in the same village with the enemy, a bridge separating us which they had barricaded, and our regiment had nothing to support us but a company of Clerfayt's and fifty Austrian Tyrolians. The numberless little skirmishes were uninteresting. The first unsuccessful attack of the Prussians cost them a number of men; and the Austrian affair at La Croix near Besancy also, where eight hundred of Clerfayt's regiment repulsed six thousand and with the loss of only eighty killed and one hundred wounded by grape shot.

"We were three times attacked in our retreat, at the famous camp at Attila, also near where he was defeated, and in a defile near Stenay where we lost some baggage burnt. The numberless blunders our generals committed could not be believed, but the few officers of that rank they had, who had a distant idea of military business, were unemployed. Marshal Broglie is doating and has lost his memory, at any rate has lost his brother to whom, it is said, he owes the reputation he had acquired; and it is lucky for us we had neither experienced generals nor troops against us.

"On the arrival of the army at Arlon the Princes disbanded their numerous household trains and corps of gentlemen who did nothing but manger et murmurer, and nothing now remains but the regular regiments who are gone into quarters in the Pays de Havelo. The Princes themselves go to Liege, or Aix-la-Chapelle.

"The situation of the unfortunate disbanded émigrés is to be pitied, though less than any other people. They are pillaged and robbed by the Prussians, the Prussian by the Hessians, and both and émigrés by the Austrian light troops; and I believe, on the whole, such a scene of indiscipline and disorder has never been exhibited."

LORD GRENVILLE to M. de TALLEYRAND.

1792, December 22, St. James Square.—"Lord Grenville fait bien ses complimens à Monsieur de Talleyrand, et il a l'honneur de lui accuser la reception de son billet, et de l'assurer que ce n'est nullement par manque de considération personnelle qu'il se croit obligé de se refuser le plaisir de voir M. de Talleyrand dans les circonstances actuelles."

M. MALOUET to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792 [1793 ?], January 2, London.—"L'évêque d'Autun avait à faire à my lord une proposition de la plus grande importance. M. de Giliers en est instruit, et peut-être l'intermédiaire de cette négociation qui a trait aux plus grands intérêts de ce moment-ci. Je prie, my Lord, d'accorder un rendez-vous à M. de Giliers aujourd'hui; il se présentera chez lui dans la soirée pour savoir sa réponse.

Ce mercredi matin. Je désirerais pouvoir écrire par voie sûre à Paris pour avoir les renseignemens les plus positifs sur ce que my lord m'a demandé. S'il a l'occasion d'un courier, je le prie d'avoir la bonté de m'en faire prévenir."

M. MALOUET to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, January, London.—"J'ai différé de répondre à my lord pour consulter M. de Monciel et M. Bertrand qui pouvaient avoir mieux que moi dans la tête la nomenclature des décrets. Nous ne nous rappellons qu'il y en ait eu d'autres relatifs aux étrangers que celui qui supprime le droit d'aubaine, et celui qui détermine les conditions de la naturalisation.

"L'évêque d'Autun est venu me voir hier. Il m'a demandé si j'avais parlé des confidences qu'il m'avait faites. Je lui ai dit que d'après la permission qu'il m'en avait donné, je m'étais empressé de faire parvenir aux Ministres des informations qui m'avaient paru importantes, et que je lui en avais fait honneur ; que j'avais même espéré qu'il n'en resterait pas là, l'ayant laissé dans l'intention de voir my lord Grenville ; qu'il devoit avoir d'autres détails et de nouveaux renseignemens ; et que puisqu'il était aujourd'hui décrété d'accusation il n'aurait plus rien à ménager.

"Il m'a paru avoir toujours le désir et le projet de négotier. La presence de M. de Gilliers et ensuite du Prince de Poix, qui sont arrivés au milieu de notre conversation, l'ont interrompu. L'Evêque m'avait déjà annoncé qu'il verrait demain my lord Grenville, qu'il faudrât éviter la guerre, la différer ; que la République ne pouvait pas se soutenir plus d'un an, attendu le discrédit très prochain des assignats ; que Dumourier n'attaquerait pas la Hollande ; qu'il négocierait volontiers avec le Ministère Anglais ; que lui, évêque, se chargerait bien de l'y décider ; qu'on sauverait ainsi le Roi, qu'on arrêterait le torrent dévastateur. Mais il a ajouté à ces réflexions d'autres raisonnemens qui m'ont paru bizarres. Il prétend que le Gouvernement Français croit toujours en audace et en prétention ; que Malet a été chargé de rapporter hier à M. Pitt une réponse insolente du Ministre Le Brun ; qu'ils ne craignent point la guerre, qu'ils veulent bien perdre leurs colonies, sûrs de détruire aussi celles des Anglais, et de ruiner leur commerce en se bornant à armer une multitude de corsaires ; que M. Fox, avec qui il a passé hier une partie de la journée, persiste à dire qu'on se gardera bien ici de déclarer la guerre, que cela serait fou, qu'il faut traiter avec la Convention absolument.

"C'est ici où j'ai vu un point de contact entre les opinions de l'Evêque d'Autun et celles de M. Fox. Qu'est-ce que cela signifie, il mettra peut-être my lord dans le cas de le deviner. Il ne demande pas mieux que de causer, et en lui faisant entrevoir la possibilité d'une correspondance avec Du Mourier, on lui fera dire ce qu'il sait et ce qu'il veut."

M. MALOUE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, January 10, London.—"Je m'empresse de prévenir my lord que deux mulâtres Français, auteurs de la révolte et des désastres de St. Dominique, sont arrivés à Londres dans le dessein de passer à la Jamaïque. Leurs noms sont Raimond et François ; ils ont été rencontrés hier par un habitant de St. Dominique qui est venu m'en avertir, en attendant qu'on puisse avoir leur signalement, et connaître leur logement, leur correspondant, et toutes leurs habitudes à Londres. Je crois qu'il importe à la sûreté de toutes les colonies Anglaises d'en interdire l'entrée à tout mulâtre ou négre libre Français soit qu'il arrive d'Europe ou des colonies Françaises. Raimond et François qui m'ont été dénoncés, sont les associés de Brissot et de Grégoire, et ont dirigé la première insurrection des mulâtres à St. Dominique et ensuite la révolte des négres. L'arrestation de ces deux hommes ici ou à la Jamaïque serait d'un grand intérêt pour les colonies Anglaises et Françaises."

COUNT LALLY-TOLENDAL TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, January 24, Richmond.—"Je dois, quelque pénible que soit un tel effort, m'arracher une minute à l'unique pensée qui m'obsède, pour donner un avis essentiel au Gouvernement. Il ne peut trop se mettre en garde contre la passion des différents partis qui cherchent à le rendre l'instrument de leurs ressentiments personnels, justes ou injustes, dans l'exécution de l'Alien Bill. Entre diverses personnes, dont je regarderai comme un devoir de me porter la caution, je citerai dès aujourd'hui, la fille de M. Necker, l'ambassadrice des Suèdes, que j'ai vu pleurer amèrement le malheur qui nous opprime tous, qui a fui avec horreur la terre coupable d'un si grand forfait, qui vient ici s'ensevelir pendant quelques mois dans une retraite profonde, et qui a été déjà accueilli par la méchanceté de quelques gens beaucoup moins affectés qu'elle de l'horrible catastrophe. Hélas ! j'en sais plus que je n'en dirai de longtemps sur les causes qui ont amené cette catastrophe. Les partis les plus opposés semblent avoir travaillé de concert à immoler le plus innocent des hommes. Il eut été sauvé, si l'on eut connu en France un débat comme celui de Lord Grenville et de Lord Spencer. M. de Bouillé disait dernièrement à Londres : 'Il n'y a qu'une classe d'hommes que je hais autant que les Jacobins de Paris ; ce sont les Jacobins de Coblenz.' M. de Bouillé avait trop raison."

LOUIS DE NOAILLES to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, January 29, London.—"J'ai eu l'honneur de vous proposer un moyen d'arracher M. le Dauphin aux assassins qui le menaient, et je me suis offert pour le mettre à exécution. J'ai choisi M. de Breteuil pour vous en faire part, comme ayant eu plus qu'aucun autre la confiance du père de ce malheureux enfant. Il m'a communiqué la réponse de l'homme sensible ; il ne m'a point caché celle du ministre ; et je l'avoue, j'attendais plus de succès d'un projet que l'Europe entière devrait avouer.

"Mon parti est pris. Je laisse aux autres leur opinion, je ne consulte que ma conscience.

"Pour exécuter mon projet, je ne puis me conformer aux loix du royaume. Je pars avec un faux passeport, et j'emporte des pistolets à vent. J'espère qu'on mettra quelque différence entre ne pas se seconder et ne punir. La prudence exigerait que vous me permissiez verbalement d'enfreindre la loi ; mais le même motif qui vous porte à ne prendre aucune part à mon projet vous décide à me refuser une entrevue. Il est encore possible que vous ne répondrez pas à ma lettre. J'ai prévu tous ces obstacles, et pour que rien ne m'arrête, je les ai surmontés. J'attendrai encore ici vingt-quatre heures ; après ce délai, je regarderai votre silence non comme un aveu de mon projet, mais comme une permission tacite de violer une loi qui, certes, ne peut pas être appliquée à celui qui va sacrifier sa tété pour tacher de sauver celle de cet enfant, sur lequel reposent aujourd'hui de si grands intérêts, de si hautes espérances, et tous les regards de l'Europe.

"Je partirai donc en déposant la copie de cette lettre entre les mains d'un ami. Si Milord Grenville, simple particulier, ne tenait pas les rênes d'un grand état, il ne me laisserait pas partir sans le voir. Eh, pourquoi faut-il donc qu'une si grande distance sépare l'humanité de la politique ? Comme Ministre il doit penser qu'il aura sa place dans l'histoire, et réfléchir que mon projet en sera une page."

LORD GRENVILLE to LOUIS DE NOAILLES.

1793, January 29, St. James Square.—"J'ai reçu ce matin votre lettre, et après m'être déjà expliqué sur le sujet de votre entreprise, je ne vous répondez que parceque vous paraissez vouloir attribuer à mon silence une interprétation que je ne puis pas autoriser.

"C'est assurément au Ministre que vous avez voulu confier le projet d'une entreprise pour laquelle vous avez demandé l'assistance du Gouvernement. C'est en cette qualité que je vous répète que le Gouvernement ne croit pas devoir s'y compromettre, et cela pour les raisons qui vous sont connues. Je dois maintenant ajouter qu'aucun Ministre n'a ici le pouvoir de donner une permission, ou tacite ou verbale, de violer la loi.

"Mes sentiments comme particulier vous doivent être peu importants. Mais puisque vous m'en parlez, je vous dirai seulement que je rends assurément justice à vos motifs, mais que je ne me dissimule pas combien votre entreprise pourrait compromettre les intérêts et la sûreté de ceux que vous désirez servir."

LOUIS DE NOAILLES to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, January 30, London.—"J'ai voulu faire une bonne action et non pas une belle chose. J'ai voulu être utile et non pas desservir, et non pas donner aux autres des dangers que je réservais pour moi seul.

"Je me conforme aux ordres du Ministre, et j'obéirais de même aux simples vœux de Lord Grenville. Je ne distingue point les intentions du premier, de la prévoyance du second. Quoi ! je compromettrais les intérêts ! A ce mot je m'arrête, et n'y eut-il que de l'incertitude, je dois également rester. Non, my lord, il n'est pas vrai que vos sentiments personnels puissent m'être peu importants ; et puisque vous voulez bien rendre justice à mes motifs dans le projet que j'ai eu l'honneur de vous proposer. Permettez que je vous renvoie les deux lettres que vous avez écrites. J'aime encore mieux vous les rendre que les brûler. Les miennes n'existent plus. Si le projet pouvait nuire, sa divulgation aurait le même inconvénient. Voyez combien vos craintes m'ont frappé moi-même."

[THE EARL OF ELGIN] to LORD GRENVILLE.

Extract.

1793, February 3.—"M. de Mercy, who is most deeply affected with the late melancholy event, has written to consult a friend of his at this place, whether any and what means could be employed to rescue the Queen from the danger with which she is so eminently threatened. While his anxiety and zeal prompt him to do something, the fear of committing a step (in times when there is no rule to go by, and when nothing is held sacred) that may do harm instead of good, seems to withhold him from acting, and to make him look abroad for advice, rather than trust entirely to his own judgment. He asks whether the Emperor should demand her, and if so, in what manner and to whom he should apply. His friend is of opinion that if she is demanded at all, instead of losing time by applying to Vienna and waiting for an answer, M. de Mercy should do it immediately in the Emperor's name ; merely to claim Marie Antoinette, Archduchess of Austria and widow of Louis XVI., without any reflection or expression that could be applied to any political question whatsoever. From the aversion which the Orléans party have, with so much industry and success, infused into the mob at Paris to the Queen personally, and the House of Austria in general, I am very doubtful whether a public demand of this nature, instead of having the desired effect, might not be made use of to lead them to commit what it is intended to prevent. And if the demand was even complied with, I am almost convinced that the Queen would never consent to come away and leave her children behind her. Some months ago she might have escaped with the Dauphin, but she positively refused to quit the King, though persuaded that her death was almost certain if she remained. The friend of M. de Mercy that I have alluded to, and who I mention to your Lordship in confidence, that you may judge yourself of the weight that may be given to his opinions, is the Count de la Marck; who, as far as I can presume to say, appears to me to possess a considerable share of ability, has for a long time past shown great zeal for the unfortunate royal family of France, has effected his reconciliation at Vienna, and is sometimes consulted. Both M. de Mercy and he think that the only reasonable hope that can be entertained of being able to save the prisoners at the Temple, is on the efforts that may be made by His Majesty's Ministers to gain the protection of those who have it in their power to destroy them. It must be undoubtedly very painful to apply to men of so horrid a description; but the sentiment that dictates the measure will be probably powerful enough to overcome the just reluctance to the means that it may be necessary to employ. To address the Duke of Orleans himself, I am persuaded, would not only be in vain, but might precipitate the fate of the royal family, by alarming the jealousies of those who direct him. His mind, like his body, is (if I may be allowed the expression) a mass of corruption, void of energy, but susceptible of every vice. He may, and must yield to the advice of those who guide him; but will do nothing of any consequence himself, especially if the thing desired of him be honourable and humane. It is known with certainty that, at different epochs since the beginning of the Revolution, he has wished to recede, but was compelled to go on. Hence I mean to infer that, were it possible to gain some of the principal persons of the Cabal, perhaps De la Clos and Santerre, the royal family might be preserved; but to accomplish this, or to avoid the ill consequences of a miscarriage, your Lordship will be sensible require much address and an extraordinary degree of caution. Perhaps his Majesty's Ministers may have already taken measures on this subject. If they have, or if they propose to do so, there is a person in England who is perhaps capable of giving them many useful intimations. His name is Pelenc; he was Mirabeau's friend or secretary, and, it was thought at the time, composed many of his papers and speeches. From the time that Mirabeau was brought over to Government, Pelenc has been very zealous in its services, and has uniformly given the most exact intelligence, as the event always proved. I am not at all acquainted with him, but have read many things of his writing."

COUNT LALLY-TOLENDAL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, February 9, Lisle Street.—"J'ai reçu à dix heures une lettre du Lord Chancelier qui me marque que vous désirez l'explication d'une idée dont je lui ai parlé sans détail, et que vous m'attendez ce matin. La matinée est fort avancée, parceque j'ai voulu fixer cette idée par écrit, et en tracer le développement dans un mémoire que je finis actuellement à trois heures. Je me rends à vos ordres à tout hasard, et dans le cas, trop vraisemblable, où l'heure de vous entretenir serait passée, j'ai l'honneur de vous écrire ce peu de mots pour vous renouveler l'offre de mon dévouement absolu.

“ Si je ne vous trouve point, je remporterai mon mémoire pour en prendre copie, et j'aurai l'honneur de vous l'envoyer le soir.

“ Permettez-vous que j'aie l'honneur de vous offrir complet le douloureux et inutile monument que j'avais consacré à la défense de cet adorable Louis XVI, et dans lequel je n'ai, malheureusement, travaillé que pour l'histoire. Vous n'avez sûrement pas le temps d'en achever aujourd'hui la lecture ; mais je tiens à ce qu'il soit dans la bibliothèque de Lord Grenville.

“ Vous avez essayé une perte douloureuse pour votre cœur, et je l'ai ressentie, je vous assure, quoique je vous l'aie tardivement exprimé par l'organe d'un ami. Je ne crains rien tant que d'importuner ; mais quand vous aurez des instants de liberté, je me réserve le droit d'en réclamer un pour cultiver vos bontés.”

COUNT LALLY-TOLENDAL TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, February 12, Lisle Street.—“ Peut-être pourrai-je vous faire hommage ce soir au moins de la première partie de ma défense du Roi ?

“ J'ose, au nom de cet intérêt sacré, vous prier de vouloir bien me faire dire un mot chaque fois que vous aurez un courier traversant Paris.

“ J'ai vu M. l'Aubépy. Il est venu ici comptant qu'il était question du pauvre Roi, et il m'a attendri quand je l'ai vu verser un torrent de larmes sur la destinée de son malheureux maître. J'ai causé ensuite d'affaires avec lui. Il m'a paru avoir le flegme, l'adresse, et surtout la discrétion nécessaire aux services que vous désirez de lui ; beaucoup de probité, et d'exactitude dans les faits, ce qui est encore si nécessaire. Il désirerait, ce me semble, que l'on conservât Longchamps, en le restraignant absolument à ce qu'on lui demanderait, et à un traitement modéré, mais fixe par mois tout le temps qu'il servirait. Vous savez mieux que moi de quelle utilité peut vous être ce dernier. J'ai seulement représenté à M. le Long, il y a quelques jours, que si Longchamps servait utilement, il me paraissait indispensable de lui assigner un traitement fixe par mois (25 livres sterling me paraîtraient magnifiques, en n'entendant parler d'aucune dépense) et que s'il était inutile, il convenait à la dignité du Gouvernement de l'en prévenir, et de lui donner une gratification définitive qui pût le mettre à même de chercher pendant trois mois à se placer, sans être troublé dans les démarches par la crainte de n'avoir pas de quoi manger dans le jour.”

————— to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, February 25, Paris.—“ Le pain nous donnera une insurrection. Nous n'avons d'approvisionnements que jusqu'au 20 Mars, et comme il est ici à meilleur marché que dans nos environs, les paysans viennent de deux lieues pour leur provision. Il est vraisemblable que les Départements des frontières ne laisseront pas passer les bleds et farines qui nous sont destinées, parcequ'ils en manquent eux-mêmes, et que nos armées serviront de prétexte. Le midi est entièrement dépourvu, et n'a pas de moyen. La Normandie paye le pain 4s. 6d. la livre. Jugez si elle laissera passer nos farines. Je ne peux pas vous dire ce que ferait une insurrection populaire sur le Temple. La Reine seule en serait l'objet, et elle sera sacrifiée, soit au premier [succès] des troupes étrangères, soit au premier murmure du peuple contre la Convention. Elle n'intéresse aucun parti. Il n'en est pas de même de Louis 17 ; il trouverait des défenseurs, et on fera de grands sacrifices pour le sauver. Mais dans une insurrection, le peuple se laisse bien commander pour la commencer ; peut-on être certain qu'il s'arrêtera où on lui aura dit ? surtout lorsque la contre-partie est attentive aux mouvements. Un scélérat, pour cent louis, peut tromper la vigilance de plusieurs milliers. Je vous ferai passer incessamment tous les détails que vous me demandez. L'argent est aujourd'hui à 35. Un décret ne tardera pas à en interdire la vente, afin qu'on ne sache pas à quel prix la Convention l'achètera.

“Je vous envoie par M. Martin quatre feuilles sous quatre numéros écrit en blanc. Il faudra faire paraître l'encre seulement pour Milord. M. Martin doit passer demain.”

1793, May 30, Paris.—“I arrived safe here yesterday. You cannot form to yourself an idea of all I suffered. Not a word of that. You shall hear from me as often as I can with safety write to you. This city is in the greatest confusion. The cannon of alarm is just fired, and the tocsin rings everywhere. The minority, or Maratists, with the sections, want to murder the majority, and dissolve the Convention. The insurgents in Poitou have had great advantages ; all the gendarmérie à cheval deserted to them. If you send them some assistance, the business will be soon decided. You have no time to lose, as troops are everywhere in motion to go and attack them. Everything announces to-day the speedy dissolution of the Convention. The most sanguinary motions are making carnage and destruction hang suspended over the head of this guilty city. How I shall escape, heaven only knows. I am afraid to go out this morning to acquire intelligence. The most hellish cries interrupt me every moment. Custine commands the army of Flanders ; his headquarters are at Cambray, and advanced posts in the environs of Bouchain. That army is considerably weakened by the great draft of soldiers sent from it to combat the insurgents. The royal family are all well in the Temple ; not a word is spoken of them here. All the division rests among the people themselves. You shall hear from me as often as I can find an occasion of writing to you. Barrère proposed yesterday a decree for the expulsion of all strangers, especially English.

“The Girondists have to-day all the power of the Convention in their hands, but Paris, with its sections and Jacobins, will in the end triumph. Blood and massacre will be the result of their success. The troubles of the provinces occasion here more fear than all the combined armies. Send them speedily some assistance, if you wish to put a speedy end to an expensive war. If I can find nobody to go to carry you my despatches, I shall endeavour to be bearer myself. Adieu, my dear friend, never doubt of my zeal and fidelity to serve you.”

MONSIEUR MALOUEU to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, August 23, Twickenham.—“Je crois devoir vous faire hommage d'un nouvel écrit de M. Mallet Dupan. Au milieu d'une récapitulation de crimes et de folies que vous connaissez aussi bien que nous, vous trouverez des idées neuves et profondes, dignes certainement d'être méditées par votre sagesse. L'agitation, la mélancolie, le découragement ont nui sans doute à la perfection de l'ouvrage, mais il n'en n'est pas moins fait par un des observateurs les plus pénétrants, par un des meilleurs écrivains politiques qui existent aujourd'hui en Europe, qui, pendant trois ans, a vécu dans le feu de la Révolution Française et en a écrit l'histoire entière, et qui sera trop compté par la postérité pour ne pas l'être un peu par les contemporains. Son opinion a pour moi d'autant plus de poids que, depuis la guerre déclarée, il a eu des relations directes avec les Ministres de Vienne et de Berlin. Dans son désespoir qui ne paroît hélas ! que trop fondé, il m'a écrit une lettre particulière remplie de détails déchirants. J'ai l'honneur de vous en faire passer quelques extraits. Vous y verrez qu'il regarde le Cabinet de Londres comme le seul que puisse préserver l'Europe d'une longue suite de désastres. S'il était permis de se citer soi-même, j'oserais vous rappeler le mémoire que j'ai pris la liberté de vous présenter aussitôt que la guerre a été déclarée. En rapprochant les annonces que je fis alors, et les résultats que présente aujourd'hui M. Mallet Dupan, on doit sans doute être moins porté à se méfier de ce qu'on appelle les jugemens de notre intérêt particulier, qui, dans cette occasion, est bien véritablement l'intérêt universel. Je n'affligerai pas votre sensibilité par le souvenir douloureux du stérile mémoire que nous avons présenté en commun, M. de Lally, M. de Gilliers et moi, pour le salut de l'infortuné Louis Seize ; je ne répéterai pas tout ce que j'ai dit depuis huit mois sur les colonies. Louis Seize n'est plus, les colonies ne sont plus ; la veuve et le fils de Louis Seize vivent encore ; les Gouvernemens de l'Europe sont encore sur pied ; il est bien sûrement encore des moyens de salut ; mais s'ils sont négligés, si les ennemis intérieurs de la Convention ne sont pas secourus, si la guerre se prolonge, si elle se fait de manière à réunir et à aguerrir tous les partis de cette monstrueuse République, la subversion de l'Europe suivra probablement celle de la France.

“Au sentiment des maux publics se joint pour moi celui d'une inquiétude cruelle sur le sort de ma famille, retirée à quinze lieues de Cambrai, près Compiègne. J'ai le projet de passer dans le Brabant et jusqu'à Valenciennes, pour tenter d'en avoir des nouvelles. Serois-je vous prier de m'accorder des recommandations pour le Ministre Anglais à Bruxelles et pour un des généraux de l'armée de Monseigneur Duc d'York. Je voudrais profiter de la première occasion favorable pour faire sortir de France ma femme et mon fils, et je ne peux en avoir l'espérance que par une protection puissante dans l'armée alliée.”

Extract.

MONSIEUR MALLET DU PAN to MONSIEUR MALOUE.

1793, August 16, Brussels.—“Montlosier vous a tracé, il y a deux jours, la véritable situation des affaires . . . ils ont eû encore une fois la révolution entre leurs mains. La Convention épouvantée perdait la tête. Lyon et le Midi relevaient la leur. Les Jacobins de Péronne avaient déménagé jusqu'à Paris, semant l'effroi devant eux. Voilà le moment qu'on a choisi pour revenir sur ses pas, pour abandonner Cambray où se trouvaient les grands magasins, et pour venir stoïquement assiéger Dunkerque et Maubeuge. Je vous laisse à penser la sécurité et l'audace qu'une pareille conduite va inspirer à la Convention. Tremblons de l'influence que cette marche rétrograde peut avoir sur le sort de la malheureuse Reine. Vous savez que les scélérats ne sont jamais plus cruels que lors qu'on leur montre de la crainte.

“Deux ou trois sièges finiront cette campagne. Si les cent trente mille hommes que couvrent cette frontière eussent été dans les mains de Du Mourier on d'un Capitaine de Hussards, ils seraient déjà aux portes de Paris. Mais on ne peut donner de l'âme, de la hardiesse, de la célérité à des généraux engourdis par une tactique matérielle. C'est bien pire, en ce genre, que l'année dernière.

"Je n'entrevois qu'une ressource. Serait-elle mise en usage? Ce serait que le Cabinet de Londres se ressentit d'une conduite si pernicieuse, qu'il se fit entendre fortement, qu'il menaçât même, et qu'il fit adopter un autre plan. Ce Cabinet est le seul qui connaisse la Révolution, le seul qui apprécie les effets moraux de tel ou tel système d'opérations. Si son influence ne prévaut pas dans le sens que je vous indique, comptez que la Révolution est fixée. Elle survivra à la campagne, et à toutes les campagnes. Elle percera ces fragiles remparts derrière lesquels les alliés entendent se cacher, et nulle puissance humaine ne la renversera l'année prochaine. Représentez fortement cette vérité. Citez moi, si vous le voulez."

"Lyon et le Midi donnaient de puissantes espérances. Elles s'évanouissent par les mêmes causes qui font périliter ailleurs les affaires générales. Au lieu de soutenir ces mouvemens, le Cabinet de Turin, cloué par celui de Vienne, a laissé ses troupes sur la défensive derrière les Alpes. Du Bois de Crancé, rassuré de ce côté là, a témoigné assez de mépris aux alliés pour ne pas craindre de marcher, le 2, sur Lyon, avec la majeure partie de l'armée des Alpes. Il ne reste que trois bataillons dans toute la basse Savoye, et les alliés n'y font pas descendre un seul homme. S'ils eussent paru, la Convention perdait la moitié de son empire, coupé en deux. Elle aura peut-être tout subjugué, lorsqu'on se ravisera. Que voulez-vous faire avec des hommes qui sont toujours en arrière des circonstances, et qui ne connaissent ni la valeur des temps, ni celle des choses et des personnes?"

"La même négligence a annulé la Suisse, dont on pouvait tirer une immense utilité, et que les Français redoutaient plus qu'aucun autre état. On a abandonné ce pays-là à leur influence absolue. On s'en est remis à des intriguans étrangers qui ne connaissent ni les hommes, ni les moyens à mettre en œuvre dans cette contrée. De fausses mesures équivoques ont achevé de tout gâter. L'Angleterre, en particulier, pouvait gouverner la Suisse avec un fil; mais, certes, ce n'est pas avec un Ambassadeur comme celui qu'elle paye à Berne qu'on pouvait manier des gouvernemens si variés, et les ressorts convenables à ce sol."

"Insistez sur l'importance de secourir Lyon, Marseille, et le Midi, par une diversion active des armées alliées au pied des Alpes, qui occupe ou culbute les Français dans cette partie. Je crains beaucoup au surplus qu'il ne soit trop tard. Dites encore que si la Savoye n'est pas recouvrée avant l'hiver, Genève avec 150 pièces de canon, 70 mille mesures de bled en magasin, des munitions considérable, sera aux mains des Français qui s'y retrancheront, et tiendront en échec d'une part les Suisses, et les Piémontais de l'autre."

M. MALOUET to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, September 3, London.—"Je reçois au moment de mon départ le mémoire ci-joint de M. Mallet du Pan. Il me prie de vous le présenter; il m'annonce que ses liaisons en Suisse peuvent le mettre en état d'en suivre l'objet sous l'inspection de votre ambassadeur, et c'est ici le moment de vous dire que, depuis un an, M. Mallet du Pan n'est point étranger aux négociations relatives à la Révolution.

"M. de Monciel à qui je laisse ce paquet pour vous le remettre, a eût connaissance de la correspondance secrète de M. Mallet du Pan que j'avais pris la liberté de proposer au feu roi. M. de Monciel vous instruira de l'occasion et de la forme dans laquelle il a été employé.

"Une autre personne de mes amis peut vous être également utile en Suisse, et arrive incessamment en Angleterre. C'est M. Mounier, mais je dois vous dire que son voyage à Londres n'a aucun rapport aux affaires politiques. La détresse dans laquelle se trouve aujourd'hui cet homme intéressant m'a décidé à le proposer à Mylord Hawke qui désire envoyer son fils en Suisse pour y passer un ou deux ans, et M. Mounier vient chercher ici le jeune homme pour le conduire à Berne.

"Je n'ai garde de me permettre ni conseil ni recommandation. Vous jugerez le mémoire, les personnes; et si vous avez une réponse à me faire parvenir, M. de Monciel s'en chargera."

LORD GRENVILLE to the GREFFIER FAGEL.

1793, November 21, St. James's Square.—"I cannot let Lord Malmesbury proceed to the Hague without charging him with a few lines to express to you my acknowledgments for your very obliging letter, and to assure you how much I wish to cultivate those sentiments which you are so good as to entertain towards me.

"Lord Malmesbury will explain to you the whole object of his mission, and as both his instructions and his inclination will lead him to speak to you with the fullest confidence on that interesting subject I have little to add upon it. The Ministers of the Republic will, I am sure, see in the same light with the King's servants the tendency and effect of the late conduct of the Court of Berlin, and the necessity which exists of ascertaining precisely the situation in which we stand with respect to our alliance with that Court. Whatever may be the result we have no doubt of the full concurrence and co-operation of the Republic in measures which our common interests so evidently require.

"The long expected answer of the Court of Vienna is not yet arrived, relative to the business with which you were charged, and to the representations which by the King's directions I made on that head to Count Starhemberg. I flatter myself that you have not been dissatisfied with the manner in which this Government has fulfilled the assurances which I was authorised to give you here; and I will confess to you that I am disposed to be sanguine in my expectations of the result. If it is such as I wish, it may, I trust, lay the foundation of arrangements advantageous to this country and to the Republic.

"We are preparing to take such measures as are in our power towards opening a concert with the Royalists, whom our late accounts represent as being in considerable force near the coast of Brittany. But the ultimate success of all that we can do there must depend much on the disposition of that part of the country, and this can never be satisfactorily ascertained but by experience. I trust that the exertions of the Republic will correspond, in proportion to its means, with those which we are making here to terminate the war by a successful campaign next year. In the present state of France and of Europe I see no safety but in success, and that success speedy, and if possible decisive."

L'EVÊQUE DE LÉON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, October 18, London.—“Dès que le Lord Chancelier ne vous a pas prévenu du motif qui me rendait nécessaire une audience de votre part, j'ai l'honneur de vous prévenir que c'est au sujet d'une commission que le Souverain Pontife me donne par sa lettre du onze septembre dernier, par laquelle il me charge de faire connaître au Roi et à la nation Anglaise sa reconnaissance des bienfaits répandus sur les ecclésiastiques en Angleterre. En même temps que je sens la nécessité de remplir ma commission, j'en sens la délicatesse, et je suis bien résolu de ne rien faire que de la manière que vous jugerez être sans inconvénient. J'ai, en conséquence, différents plans à vous proposer qui me paraissent obvier aux inconvénient qu'on pourrait craindre. Je désire les soumettre le plutôt possible à votre décision.”

LOUIS SLANISLAS XAVIER (Comte de Provence) to GEORGE III.

1793, November 9, Hamm.—“La délivrance de Toulon du joug des rebelles par les escadres combinées de votre Majesté et du Roi d'Espagne, le retour de ses habitans à l'obéissance du Roi mon neveu, les couleurs et les emblèmes de la fidélité substitués à celles de la révolte, m'imposaient de nouveaux devoirs, mais avant de les remplir, je croirais manquer à ce que ma reconnaissance envers votre Majesté m'impose, si je ne lui faisais part de mes desseins. Je vais partir, je vais me rendre dans cette ville que les armes de votre Majesté ont rendue à son légitime souverain, je vais y exercer les fonctions que ma naissance et mon malheur m'imposent. Je connais trop la générosité des sentimens de votre Majesté pour douter qu'elle approuve ce parti nécessaire. J'oserais même compter sur ses secours, s'ils m'étaient indispensables pour me rendre à Toulon. Mais j'ose surtout compter sur son appui dans la nouvelle carrière qui s'ouvre devant moi. Eloigné désormais plus encore que je ne le suis aujourd'hui des provinces qui les premières ont relevé la bannière royale, je les recommande à la protection, aux puissans secours de votre Majesté. Elle connaît les vœux de mon frère, et les miens; je la supplie d'y avoir égard, et d'être surtout bien persuadée que devoir tout à votre Majesté, sera toujours pour nous le plus beau des titres, comme la plus douce des satisfactions.”

M. DE MONCIEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, November 10, Lisle Street.—“M. de Malouet en partant pour les Pays-Bas m'a chargé de vous remettre un mémoire de M. Malet du Pan concernant la Suisse. J'ose vous prier de m'indiquer l'heure à laquelle je pourrais avoir l'honneur de vous le présenter. Je suis à même de vous donner des renseignements sur M. Malet du Pan, ayant connu la mission dont il a été chargé en 1792 par Louis XVI., et la confiance qu'il lui avait accordé.”

L'EVÊQUE DE LÉON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, November 25, London.—“Recevez tous mes remerciements de la promptitude avec laquelle vous avez eu la bonté de me faire parvenir la réponse que je désirais.

“ Quoique je susse que sa Majesté trouvait dans la bonté de son cœur le motif de ses bienfaits et leur récompense dans le plaisir de les répandre, je n’ai pas douté qu’elle n’attacha quelque prise aux témoignages de la reconnaissance de Pie VI., et je suis très flatté qu’elle n’ait pas désapprouvé la manière dont j’ai exprimé ses sentimens.

“ Vous rendez justice à mes bonnes intentions, et vous voulez bien me juger avec beaucoup d’indulgence. Je suis très sensible à cette bonté.”

COUNT LALLY TOLENDAL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1793, November 26, Twickenham.—“ Je voulais vous demander la permission d’envoyer par votre courier, et sous le couvert de Lord Fitz-Gerald, quelques lettres à M. Mounier. Naturellement j’aurais dû attendre votre aveu avant de prendre la liberté de vous adresser un paquet ; mais il s’agit d’arracher ma fille du milieu des tygres qui la menacent. Ces misérables qui n’avaient pas voulu reconnaître ma qualité d’Anglais quand elle me sauvait, se sont hâtés de la déclarer quand elle me perdait. Je suis confisqué par un jugement spécial. Madame de Poix avait retiré mon enfant, et me remplaçait auprès d’elle. Vous savez avec quelle inhumanité Madame de Poix mourante a été transportée à sa section, puis reconduite chez elle avec trois gendarmes qui ne sortent pas de sa chambre. Les malheurs et les crimes s’aggravant de minute en minute, je n’ai pas cru devoir en perdre une seule. Je n’ai pas même hésité à supplier votre Excellence de faire parvenir mes instructions à mon ami, et je me suis dit que si le Ministre me trouvait indiscret, le père me trouverait sûrement excusable.”

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT LALLY TOLENDAL.

1793, November 28, St. James’s Square.—“ Je ne manquerai pas d’envoyer votre lettre par un courier qui part demain pour la Suisse et l’Italie, et je vous prie d’être persuadé de tout l’intérêt que je prends à une occasion qui vous regarde de si près. Ce serait avec une vraie satisfaction que j’apprendrais le succès de vos mesures à cet égard.”

THOMAS ELDRED to SARAH ELDRED.

1794, January 19, Paris.—“ On my return from Havre de Grace I found yours of the 5th instant. I note the contents. I have been under the necessity to return here, as I could not get horses or any conveyance from Havre de Grace to go to Brest and it [is] very expensive in this country at this time, more so than it is in England ; and I never found the cold so much in England as I do here, and what the people will do for bread I cannot tell ; there is not any to be got without you have a card from the Section, saying how much you are to have. There is ten gentlemen in the house with me, besides the servant, and we are allowed four loaves for twenty-four hours, which I suppose is about twelve pounds. However, we are much better off here than they are in the country. I find that there is many places that there is not any to be got. I shall leave this to-morrow morning, and I am told it will take me sixteen days to go there ; the roads is so very bad, and no horses to be got, and some part of the road we must have a guard of soldiers, as I understand that there is forty to fifty thousand men in arms in the La Vendée, but not altogether in one body. You will hear from me at all opportunities till the latter part of March, when I shall sail for America."

[MALLET DU PAN] to the EARL OF ELGIN.

1794, February 16. Extrait.—"Voici la suite du premier dépouillement,* dont vous recevrez la dernière partie par l'un des couriers de la semaine. Je voudrais pouvoir rendre ces bases historiques très complètes, pour fixer votre jugement, et prévenir les erreurs de fait, sur lesquelles je persiste à craindre qu'on n'édifie les plans de conduite par cette armée. Ne perdez point de vue que vous avez affaire à ceux qui ont organisé la désorganisation, et que vous finirez mal une guerre malheureuse, qu'il faudra recommencer bientôt, si elle n'en trouve pas avant six mois le cœur même de la Révolution.

"J'ai reçu un billet timide et couvert de mon voyageur à Paris. Il me demandait d'explications; aussitôt qu'il les aura reçus, il doit se remettre en route. Il renvoye à ce moment de me rendre compte, n'osant pas, avec raison, le confier à la poste. Il a eu beaucoup de peines à s'accréditer auprès des personnes que je lui ai désignées. On n'ose se fier à son meilleur ami, à plus forte à un visage étranger, avant d'avoir bien authentiqué son caractère et sa mission.

"Par les derniers avis que j'ai reçus en date du 2 et du 6, j'apprends que le Comité va lever la seconde réquisition de 25 à 45; preuve de plus que la première n'a servi qu'au complément des cadres de l'armée. La seconde donnera plus de sujets, ainsi que vous le verrez dans le travail inclus.

"Par un nouvel état plus correct que n'a été fourni, je vois qu'à la date du 24 Janvier, le Comité avait 75 millions monnoyés au trésor public, et pour au-de-là, de 330 millions de matières d'or et d'argent. Cette somme est un peu plus forte que celle que je vous avais indiquée. On en verrait bientôt la fin, si de nouvelles rapines ne remplaçaient les vides. Les assignats sont retombés au dehors à 56 par 100 de perte; dans l'intérieur point de prix fixe. Il varie depuis le pair jusqu'à 33. Le papier étant devenu rare surtout dans les campagnes, et personne n'osant payer en espèces pour vivre, les particuliers sont obligés de sortir leur or, et leurs écus, et d'aller les échanger au pair, au bureau de leur district ou de leur municipalité. Le Comité va faire fendre des espèces qu'on réduira en lingots, pour s'en servir au dehors, et marquer la source. Cette manœuvre n'a point suspendue les remises, et les opérations, que l'on fait aux trois chefs lieux, Gènes, Basle et Genève. Là entr'autres elle rachète les assignats, à 55 ou 56 de perte, pour les replacer dans l'intérieur au pair, à 10, 20, 30, suivant les lieux et les circonstances.

"Les plans de corruption extérieure continuent à regarder essentiellement l'Angleterre et l'Italie. Voilà les deux points fortement travaillés. Le Piémont c'est à l'outrance; l'esprit du peuple s'y gate visiblement, et à la manière dont les choses y sont dirigées, on peut croire que l'argent de Paris n'y a pas été semé en vain.

"Quant à l'Angleterre, ils espèrent toujours y exciter quelque éboulement, et y former un embryon révolutionnaire que l'on soutiendrait ensuite à main armée. Les troupes ci-devant employées contre la Vendée doivent renforcer celles des côtes de la Manche. Mais pour l'instant, le grand effort va se porter sur la Flandre. L'attaque de Valenciennes, et une irruption dans les Pays-Bas, sont à l'ordre du jour. Si l'on pénètre dans la Belgique, le projet est de la chatier en la mettant à feu et à sang.

"On compte employer 100 mille hommes et les garnisons à cette entreprise. Vous ne tarderez pas à être vigoureusement attaqués; et l'on ne vous laissera sûrement pas le temps de finir vos longs préparatifs, ni terminer vos quartiers d'hiver. La seconde réquisition sera encore plusieurs mois hors de service, car on est hors d'état de l'équiper, de l'armer et de la nourrir; mais si l'on fait la même faute que l'année dernière, si l'on se moque de cette levée, et qu'on lui laisse le temps de s'organiser, cette nouvelle pépinière vous tombera sur les bras au milieu de l'été.

"Le nombre des malades dans l'armée est prodigieux; la mortalité y est terrible. Il en est mort 6,000 dans les seuls hôpitaux de Besançon. Une fièvre épidémique les moissonne, et est même passée aux habitants. Elle vient aussi de se déclarer à Lyon, où elle peut devenir pestilentielle par l'infection des cadavres qu'on laisse presque sans sépulture, ou qu'on jette dans le Rhône, d'où ils sont portés sur la côte où ils pourrissent. Toutes les campagnes des environs de Lyon sont infectées de cette puanteur.

"Le système pillard des massacrans ne discontinue point à Paris. Tous les banquiers, négociants, et marchands y passeront. On a formellement exclus de l'admission au Jacobin tous les individus de ces classes. C'est assez vous dire qu'elles sont destinées à la boucherie; il y a des Départements où les  $\frac{7}{8}$  des propriétés sont aux mains de la Convention.

"Roberspierre, toujours meneur en chef, commence à sentir le poids de sa dignité, le danger de son élévation, et des embarras de toute espèce. Il voudrait arrêter l'action du Gouvernement Révolutionnaire, et ne sait comment s'y prendre. Il emploie Camille Desmoulins à lui ramener l'opinion populaire qu'on lui enlève jour par jour; il est observé par ses co-adjuteurs, qui épient le moment de le culbuter, et qui font son tourment. Quoique son crédit actuel soit encore très supérieur au leur; il n'ose les attaquer de front. Il a perdu sa cause dans l'affaire de Ronsin, Vincent, et Maillard, qui sont élargis, et qui vont travailler avec ses ennemis à lui debaucher l'armée révolutionnaire, qui formait son corps de Janissaires. Si les Alliés feraient autrement la guerre, et qu'ils pussent de grands et rapides succès en débutant, le Comité de Salut Public volerait en pièces, Roberspierre et Danton seraient éborgés.

"Il a péri 350,000 âmes dans la guerre de la Vendée, y compris les vieillards, femmes, et enfants. Les cinq départements qui en ont été le théâtre sont en cendres.

"Par les derniers renseignements que j'ai vus, je vois que la disette de plusieurs articles essentiels est au plus haut degré. Les bestiaux manquent généralement; il est défendu au peuple de manger du bœuf, et de la vache; cette viande étant réservée aux troupes. Dans beaucoup de départements, il ne reste pas un mouton. Cela est vrai même du Dauphiné et de la Provence, qui en abondaient. La loi du maximum a achevé cette dépopulation, en mettant la viande à la portée de toutes les classes du peuple. La disette des bestiaux a entraîné celle des cuirs; celle des moutons, la rareté des laines. On ne trouve presque plus de marchandises dans les villes, bourgs, et villages de la Provence. Au pied de la lettre, il est impossible en Franche Comté et en Bourgogne, par exemple, d'acheter une culotte.

“La conversion des rentes viagères en annuités à un prix très onéreux pour les rentiers est arrêtée, et passera au premier jour à la Convention.

“Les troupes qui étaient survenues en Savoye sont reparties pour les Pyrénées.

“On poursuit les exécutions à Lyon, 40, 50, 80 par semaine ; 140 maisons à démolir par mois. Mêmes scènes à Marseilles et à Bordeaux.”

[MALLET DU PAN] to the EARL OF ELGIN.

MÉMOIRE SUR LE COMITÉ DE SALUT PUBLIC.

1794, [March].—“Vous avez vu, dans la première partie de ce travail, que le Comité de Salut Public formait la clef de la voûte. Je vous ai tracé sommairement la nature, l'exercice, les effets de ce pouvoir qui est parvenu au phénomène d'organiser la désorganisation, et de réunir les forces du despotisme à celles de l'anarchie. Il me reste, maintenant, à vous entretenir de sa composition, du but de ses chefs, des dangers qui les menacent, et des divisions qui le déchirent, ainsi que la Convention et les Jacobins. On ne saurait accorder une trop grande attention à cette analyse qui repose sur des informations précises, immédiates, uniformes ; car, le destin de la guerre et de la révolution peuvent dépendre de celui du Comité de Salut Public. L'explosion chaque jour travaillée qui le fera sauter, ira jusqu'aux entrailles ; où elle déplacera seulement les membres actuels de ce conseil absolu, où elle remettra en vigueur l'anarchie du pouvoir populaire. L'un ou l'autre de ces événemens précédera l'été. Si les alliés ont la sagesse de le prévoir, de diriger leurs premières opérations sur cette prévoyance, et de préméditer les moyens de tirer parti d'une circonstance si décisive, ils pouvaient encore regagner les avantages qu'ils laissèrent échapper l'année dernière après la défection de Dumourier, et pendant les divisions des Brissotins et de Maratistes.

“Le Comité de Salut Public est composé de douze membres ; qui sont : Hérault de Sechelles, Lindet, Roberspierre l'aîné, Billaud-Varennnes, Couthon, Prieur, Carnot, Fabre d'Eglantine, (accusé et détenu), Barrère, Jean-Bon St. André, Collot d'Herbois (le douzième vacant au 25 Février).

“Hérault de Sechelles, retenu dans le Comité par la crainte de se rendre suspect en s'en détachant, sentant qu'il marche sur la lame d'un rasoir, effrayé de son nom, de son ancienne noblesse, de son ancien état, voulant à tout prix se faire pardonner ces tâches, et se montrant, par conséquent, aussi exagéré que ses collègues. Impitoyable de sang-froid, il propose en souriant les mesures les plus atroces ; cherche à se rendre populaire par des décrets de rigueur ; s'en fait ordinairement nommer l'organe pour en avoir le mérite ; inaccessible à aucun repentir tant que la peur le subjuge, instrument flexible sûr et féroce de quiconque le fait trembler. N'ayant ni les talens ni l'activité d'un chef, aujourd'hui il paraît tenir aux intérêts de Robespierre, qu'il égorgera s'il le faut à l'instant où ce dictateur sera près de succomber.

"La maison de Hérault fort riche, et celle de son parent Pelletier, frère de Pelletier St. Fargeau tué l'année dernière, sont les rendez-vous où les Dieux infernaux se rassemblent, dînent fréquemment, et se livrent à la plus crapuleuse débauche.

"Lindet, Député du Département de l'Eure, protégé et placé par Buzot qu'il trahit; il vient à Robespierre, qui l'a fait nommer au Comité, et à qui il ne sera pas plus fidèle au premier orage qu'il ne le fut à Buzot. Chef du second ordre, il ne parviendra jamais au premier rang.

"Robespierre, jusqu'au commencement de février a dominé le Comité qui domine tout. L'Etranger, les Français qui le jugent sur ses succès, lui attribuent un grand talent; ils en font un chef consommé, un prodige de profondeur, un second Cromwell. Cette description est une caricature. Robespierre n'a jamais été, et ne sera jamais, capable du rôle qu'il a pris. Peu considéré dans la première Convention, même du côté gauche où il était sans crédit, oublié ensuite pendant la Législature, n'ayant jamais obtenu qu'une demi confiance de la part des Brissotins, il n'est réellement devenu le principal pivot des affaires et le principal objet de l'attention que depuis la mort de Marat. Sombre, soupçonneux, se défiant de ses meilleurs amis, fanatique atroce, vindicatif et implacable, sa vie est l'image de celle de Pygmalion Roi de Tyr, telle que Fénélon nous la décrit.

"Aujourd'hui décharné, les yeux caves, le visage livide, le regard inquiet et farouche, sa physionomie porte l'empreinte du crime et du remords. Tourmenté de terreurs, il est toujours escorté de trois sans-culottes, choisis et armés jusqu'aux dents, qui l'accompagnent dans sa voiture. Revenu à sa chétive demeure, il s'y enferme, s'y barricade, n'ouvre sa porte qu'avec des précautions extrêmes. Dîne-t-il hors chez lui? Ce n'est jamais sans avoir deux pistolets sur la table aux deux côtés de son assiette. Nul domestique ne peut se tenir derrière sa chaise. Il ne mange d'aucun plat sans que l'un des convives en ait mangé avant lui. Il promène un œil troublé et soupçonneux sur tout ce qui l'entoure, craint celui à qui il est obligé de se confier, voit un ennemi dans chacun de ses collègues, et traîne son existence entre la terreur d'un assassinat et celle d'un empoisonnement. La simplicité, ou plutôt la grossièreté de ses goûts, sa saleté, son grenier, son abstinence, sa haine des plaisirs, et l'opinion fondée de son désintéressement ont fait et soutiennent sa fortune populaire. Il n'a pas un écu; son incorruptibilité contraste avec les brigandages de ses associés. Vivant de ses appointemens de Député, il économise sur sa dépense domestique l'entretien d'un chétif carrosse qu'il a crû nécessaire à sa sûreté, et qu'il a fait numéroté comme un fiacre pour éviter jusqu'à l'apparence du luxe.

"Les Brissotins en leur temps, et ses ennemis actuels l'accusent de viser à la Dictature, au Protectorat, même à la Royauté. Ce reproche n'est pas dépourvu de vraisemblance; mais on lui donne communément trop d'extension. Robespierre aspire à rester maître, moins par ambition, que par crainte. La crainte, voilà le fond et le ressort de son caractère. Connaissant les scélérats avec lesquels il partage la faveur publique; témoin par l'expérience de ses prédécesseurs de la difficulté de se maintenir au sommet, et d'échapper à la Roche Tarpéienne, il redoute ceux auxquels il suppose l'effroi dont il est agité, les aspirans aux premiers grades, les agitateurs, les ambitieux, les hypocrites. Environné de rivaux, d'observateurs, d'hommes effrénés, et n'ayant dans le fait ni un ami dont il soit sûr, ni un partisan sur la fidélité duquel il compte, son projet fut de se défaire successivement des uns et des autres, et de régner seul pour ôter à tous le pouvoir et le droit de régner malgré lui. Nous indiquerons plus bas en quoi consiste sa puissance personnelle.

“ Carnot.—Officier du génie, membre de la première Législature, et l'un des plus utiles du Comité. Chargé de la partie militaire, il le fait avec activité, intelligence, et application. Il partage son temps entre les travaux du Comité de Salut-Public, et ceux du Comité de la Guerre adjoint au Département de ce nom. Ce dernier est formé d'officiers du génie et de l'état-major, dont les principaux sont de Rosières, Favart, St. Fief, D'arçon, La Fite, Clavé, et quelques autres. D'arçon, a dirigé la levée du siège de Dunkerque et celle du siège de Maubeuge. Personne en Europe ne le surpasse en pénétration, en connaissances pratiques, en promptitude de coup-d'œil, et en imagination. C'est une âme de feu, et une tête patrie de ressources.<sup>(1)</sup> Carnot, son collègue, assiste aux séances du Comité de la Guerre, en transmet, en développe, et appuie les résultats auprès du Comité du Salut-Public, et, une fois délibérés, rédige les ordonnances de leur exécution. Tout entier à ses fonctions spéciales, il se mêle peu des intrigues de parti, et les servira tous successivement par ambition, par intérêt, par impuissance de revenir sur ses pas.

“ Fabre d'Eglantine, décrété d'accusations et enfermé, malgré le crédit de Danton son ami, et de Robespierre qui l'avoit poussé en avant contre les Exagérés. Les rapines, la vénalité, le luxe, l'excès fabuleux des prévarications de ce comédien bel esprit, lui firent imprudemment déclarer la guerre à ses jaloux. Ceux-ci l'ayant dénoncé, ses imitateurs, pour arrêter le torrent, ont jugé prudent de le sacrifier, ainsi que Bazire et Chabot, impliqués de même dans des brigandages monstrueux, d'infâmes trafics de leur autorité, de pillage clandestin, des viols de jeunes filles mises en réquisition.

“ Barrère.—Déclamateur au brevet du Comité, chargé de la partie de rapports, subordonné aux principaux Chefs, variable dans sa conduite, et n'étant, comme tant d'autres, forcené que pour échapper à la guillotine ; il succombera avec Robespierre.

(1) Je parle de D'arçon d'après une liaison intime de dix années avec lui ; il n'est pas plus révolutionnaire que moi.

Jean-Bon St André.—Président Calviniste de Montauban, auteur du massacre des Catholiques dans cette ville en 1790, boute-feu infatigable, portant dans le crime le caractère du climat sous lequel il a pris naissance; envoyé l'automne dernière à Brest où il a raffermi la domination des Jacobins; bon suppôt de tyrannie, mais hors d'état de s'élever aux premiers rangs.

Collot d'Herbois.—Pour définir ce scélérat, il faut prendre la description d'un de ces tyrans de fantaisie, peint par les poètes, et que lui-même a joué vingt ans sur le théâtre. Tout ce que Tacite nous raconte de Tibère, aux qualités près, lui est applicable. Formé à la plus profonde dissimulation, personne n'a pu se vanter de connaître les replis innombrables de son cœur. Dévoré d'ambition, de cupidité, de jalousie, de vengeance, il réunit toutes les passions tristes. Conspirateur sombre, déclamateur étudié, impopulaire par goût et par habitude, il n'a jamais perdu l'apprêt théâtral. Mauvais demagogue, sa véritable place était celle de chef de bourreaux. Il possède le sang-froid, le raffinement, la perfidie combinée, la barbarie calme d'un tyran oriental. Il ordonne un massacre avec plus d'indifférence qu'on ne prend une glace. Jamais sa conscience n'a ressenti un mouvement, ni sa sensibilité une émotion. D'autres se font remarquer et excuser par leur fanatisme, ou par une cruauté qui tient à la violence du caractère. Collot d'Herbois ne montre aucun emportement; il est maître de lui comme de sa physionomie. Orgueilleux et dominateur, l'égalité Jacobine lui était à charge. Il fut créature mercenaire du Duc d'Orléans, et l'un des artisans des crimes révolutionnaires dès le commencement de 1789. Lorsqu'il a vu le Duc pencher vers son déclin, il a porté ses espérances aux postes les plus lucratifs et les plus élevés de l'anarchie.

“ Parvenu à force d'intrigues à se faire nommer commissaire principal à Lyon, il y a déployé la nature de son génie, et l'impassible férocité de son caractère. Longtemps il avait servi sur le théâtre de cette ville infortunée; ses caprices, ses hauteurs et la médiocrité de ses talens dramatiques lui attirèrent beaucoup de désagrémens. Plus d'une fois le public l'avait sifflé. Manet altâ mente repostum; il n'a pas oublié les outrages, il s'en est vengé comme Néron. On ferait un volume aussi épouvantable que curieux de sa gestion à Lyon. Nul pacha n'atteignit le manière, les maximes, les discours, les décisions de ce triumvir. Sa représentation solennelle ressemblait à celle du Grand Seigneur; on ne parvenait à son audience qu'après trois requêtes itératives. Une file d'appartemens précédait son salon de réception. Personne ne l'approchait qu'à quinze pas de distance; deux gardes, le fusil armé, étaient à ses côtés, l'œil tendu sur les solliciteurs. Impénétrable à volonté, il ne sortait de sa maison qu'avec une escorte nombreuse. Toutes ces précautions eussent été nécessaires et même insuffisantes avec un autre peuple. Mais le monstre qui a fait égorgé quatre mille citoyens en cinq semaines, dépouillé dix mille familles, plongé dans les cachots les sept-huits des propriétaires de la seconde ville de France, n'a pas reçu une égratignure.

“ Voice deux exemples de la politique de Collot. Un matin il avait ordonné au tribunal révolutionnaire d'arrêter un jeune adolescent suspect ; de l'interroger, et de le juger avant la fin du jour. Vers les six heures, Collot étant à table et en orgie avec des filles des baladins, des bourreaux, mangeant et buvant au bruit d'une musique choisie, entre un des juges du tribunal. Après les formalités d'usage, on l'introduit à l'oreille du triumvir ; il lui annonce que le jeune homme arrêté, interrogé, et les plus sévères informations prises sur son compte, il se trouve irréprochable, et que le tribunal opine à l'élargir. Collot, sans regarder le juge, élève la voix et lui dit ; 'Je vous ai ordonné de punir cet homme ; je veux qu'il périsse avant la fin du jour ; si l'on épargnait les innocens, trop de coupables échapperaient ; allez.' La musique et l'allégresse recommencent, et l'heure suivante le jeune homme est fusillé.

"Un, nommé Châlon, présidait la commission provisoire instituée à Lyon avant l'arrivée des commissaires. Plus honnête que ses collègues, épouvanté de l'injustice et de la violence des instructions qui leur étaient confiées, il vint représenter à Collot—d'Herbois l'impossibilité d'exécuter certaines des opérations exigées, et lui demanda des éclaircissemens positifs. 'Les Représentans du Peuple,' répliqua Collot, du ton grave d'un oracle, 'sont ici pour presser les mouvemens de la commission s'ils les jugent trop lents, et pour les réprimer s'ils ont trop d'énergie ; faites votre devoir, vous répondrez de votre obéissance.' Châlons comprit le sens de ce logogriphe, et donna sa démission le lendemain.

"Au milieu des ruines sanglantes de Lyon, un orage sourd se préparait contre l'exterminateur. Robespierre, Danton, et leurs amis, aussi peu touchés que d'Herbois de ces scènes de carnage, complotaient de les faire servir à la perte de leur ordinateur. Ils arrangèrent de le rappeler, de l'accuser, et de le faire périr comme ayant excédé ses pouvoirs. On eut ensuite exalté l'humanité de la Convention. Collot eventa ce projet. Son retour subit précéda l'ordre de rappel, il rallia les coupe-jarrets de sa clique, parut aux Jacobins, les harangua, prit le ton de menace envers ses ennemis, les força au silence, et arracha à la Convention un décret approubatif de sa conduite. De ce moment il est devenu l'implacable adversaire de Robespierre, et son tourment dans le comité. Il souffla l'incendie à la Commune, dans les sections, et aux Jacobins ; et s'est fait le chef ostensible de tous les rivaux des dictateurs du Comité.

"Cet homme ne devant pas tarder à devenir important, et à paraître à la tête d'une nouvelle domination, j'ai cru essentiel de vous le faire connaître avec quelque détail. Personne n'est plus dangereux pour diviser, calomnier, brouiller un parti. Voilà son véritable talent. Il n'en a aucun pour l'administration générale.

"En décrivant la composition et les attributs du Comité de Salut-Public, je ne dois pas omettre de vous rappeler le Comité de Sûreté Générale, créé le 2 October 1792, alors investi de la surveillance la plus étendue sur les desseins, discours, pensées, actions, correspondances ; autorisé à provoquer, à recevoir les délations, à dénoncer lui-même, et à faire saisir arbitrairement les citoyens ; ses fonctions redoutables lui assurèrent une influence qui ne l'était pas moins. Si cet empire n'a pas été fondée dans celui du Comité de Salut Public, il lui reste, du moins, très subordonné. C'est le satellite de la planète, le bras que la tête fait mouvoir à son gré, l'inquisition d'état que dirige le comité de Salut-Public. Jusqu'ici, elle avait conservé à ce dernier fidélité et obéissance. Robespierre et ses collègues la tenaient en lesse [laisse ?] mais leurs ennemis sont parvenus à jeter entre les deux conseils des semences de discorde et de rivalité. Je suis instruit que Vadier et Vouland, membres du conseil de Sûreté Générale, y ont formé un parti actif et nombreux contre le Comité de Salut-Public. Ces deux hommes, privés par eux-mêmes d'une consistance suffisante, sont très probablement les agents d'une faction plus cachée, gouvernée par des chefs plus puissans.

" Cette scission finira par conduire ses auteurs à l'échafaud, ou par soustraire le Comité de Sûreté Générale à celui de Salut-Public. Ce dernier, perdant sa sentinelle, perdra l'une des principales colonnes de sa puissance. Comme ces deux autorités s'amortiraient mutuellement par leur discordance, il faudra nécessairement que le Comité de Salut-Public repeuple le Comité de Surveillance de ses créatures, ou que le Comité de Surveillance forme un nouveau Comité de Salut-Public.

" Ce pouvoir inquisitorial qui s'exerçait sur la Convention même, qui jouissait du droit de faire les enquêtes, de recueillir les soupçons, d'ordonner les arrestations, et aussi du droit de rapporter à l'Assemblée représentative le résultat des recherches, et les fondemens de ses accusations, préparait de fait tous les décrets juridiques de la Convention, et les dicta toutes les fois qu'il marcha d'accord avec le Comité de Salut-Public. Celui-ci, par le ministère de l'autre, tenait donc dans ses mains la liberté et la vie de tous les Représentans du Peuple, et de tous les agens de la République : chaque Député soumis tremblait de voir son nom inscrit sur les tables de proscription. Ainsi, à l'exception d'un petit nombre des Montagnards aguerris, le Comité de Salut-Public disposait de l'Assemblée, en suspendant journallement sur sa tête l'épée de Damoclès.

" L'accusation contre Bazire et Chabot, l'arrestation de Ronsin, de Vincent et de Maillard, furent dictées par le Comité de Salut-Public au Comité de Sûreté-Générale. La même influence a fait rejeter l'accusation contre Philippeaux et Bourdon de l'Oise, tous deux partisans du Comité dictatorial.

" Les tribunaux révolutionnaires recevaient la même impulsion. Ceux des provinces par les Commissaires Conventionnels à la dévotion du Comité ; celui de Paris par l'action journalière et immédiate de la même autorité. Innocent ou coupable, tout prévenu accusé par l'inquisition comituelle a été sûr d'un arrêt de mort. Une dame de qualité dont le fils, émigré et rentré en France, venait d'être condamné à la guillotine, malgré les circonstances gracieuses de son état, fut exhortée par l'un des juges révolutionnaires d'aller solliciter Roberspierre. Elle employa auprès de lui la séduction des larmes, celle de l'intérêt, la justice, la pitié. Roberspierre, qui l'avait écoutée avec un visage de fer, la congédia en lui disant, 'Citoyenne, j'ai le pouvoir du faire punir, mais je ne sais pas faire grace.'

" Vous voyez maintenant que le bras terrible de la puissance judiciaire, la plus tyrannique, la plus dispensée de toutes formes, la plus indépendante de toutes loix, la plus générale dans l'exercice de ses vengeances, repose au milieu du Comité de Salut-Public. Elle glace et effroi tous les citoyens dans les chaumières comme dans les hôtels ; sur les bancs de la Convention comme dans les lits de l'aristocratie ; dans les clubs des Jacobins, comme dans les foyers du bourgeois royaliste.

" Outre la puissance qui donne au Comité cette concentration de l'autorité inquisitoriale, dénonciatrice, accusatrice, et judiciaire, il en tire une non moins formidable de la disposition absolue des deniers publics, et des fortunes particulières. Je vous ai précédemment indiqué la compétence illimitée dont il jouissait à cet égard. Maître de verser à volonté une pluie d'or, seul confident des dépenses qu'il ordonne, fécond en moyens de détourner, d'altérer, de déguiser, de justifier ses emplois d'argent, il peut multiplier suivant ses besoins tous les genres de corruption, et acheter les hommes vénals, tandis qu'il fait trembler ceux qui sont au dessus de la nécessité de se vendre.

"Indépendamment des fonds publics, il dispose des compositions; c'est à dire, de ces traités par lesquels un propriétaire incarcéré, placé entre la guillotine et la confiscation, croit racheter sa vie en sacrifiant la moitié, les trois quarts de sa fortune. Presque toujours c'est un marché de dupes, car les traitants avec qui l'on stipule sont trop avisés pour laisser vivans des témoins de ce trafic. Il n'en fait pas moins journellement passer dans le poche du Comité, et de ses entremetteurs, les portes-feuilles et la bourse des accusés admis à composition, tandis que leurs immeubles sont dévolûs à la nation.

"Avec l'argent, les dénonciations, les cachots, et les échaffauds, Roberspierre et les siens disposent encore de l'armée révolutionnaire. Ce sont là leurs janissaires, leurs prétoriens. Paris et l'empire se trouvent soumis à cette force, soumise elle-même au Comité qui en a nommé les chefs, fixé les fonctions, repartí les divisions, et qui en solde chaque individu par une paye triple de celle du soldat ordinaire.

"Cette armée que l'on croit généralement être une institution nouvelle, existe depuis 1789. Les agens du duc d'Orléans en formèrent le premier noyau. Elle se grossit, s'organisa, reçut des commandans, des lieux de rendez-vous, des mots d'ordre, un argot. On en trouve les détails dans une note Des considérations sur la durée de la Révolution, page 64, par Mallet du Pan.

"Elle fut successivement à la disposition des divers machinateurs d'insurrection, mais spécialement à celle du duc d'Orléans. Toutes les révolutions se sont exécutées avec son secours. Elle donnait le mouvement aux violences populaires partout où elle ne parvenait pas en masse; elle faisait porter le buste de Necker le 12 Juillet 1789, et fermer les spectacles, massacrer Foulon et Berthier, brûler les châteaux, courir la populace à Versailles le 5 Octobre, arrêter le Roi dans la cour des Tuilleries le 20 Avril 1791, et ensanglanter Avignon. Conduite par Westerman et Fournier, et grossie des galériens de Brest et de Marseille, elle fut le bataillon central de l'attaque du 10 Août 1792. Elle exécuta les massacres du mois de Septembre, elle convoit les Maratistes à la journée du 31 Mai 1793, qui écrasa les Brissotins.

"Le Comité n'a fait autre chose que de mettre au grand jour cette force déjà secrettement organisée, et de la constituer légalement force publique. Sa composition répond à ses exploits, et à ses fonctions. Elle renferme les scélérats les plus déterminés, des buveurs de sang humain, le rebut des échaffauds de toute l'Europe, les brigands d'Avignon, l'écumé des Marseillais, du Brabant, de Liège, de la Suisse, de la côte de Gênes. Fort augmentée depuis qu'elle a pris rang dans l'état militaire, on l'a recrutée de perquiers désœuvrés, de laquais sans place, de bandits faiseurs de motions en plein air, de misérables hors d'état de gagner leur pain par un travail honnête. Au commencement on apercevait une distinction assez tranchante entre les mœurs des anciennes et des nouvelles bandes; celles-ci se piquaient encore de scrupules; mais, de jour en jour, elles s'élevaient à la hauteur de leurs modèles, et l'on peut statuer qu'avant trois mois la police de la France et celle de la Révolution seront faites par une armée de quarante ou cinquante mille pendants effrénés, dignes de supplices recherchés.

"La capitale est contenue par dix mille de ces Mamloucks. Ils en imposent de reste à une imbécile et pusillanime bourgeoisie. Chaque Département en supporte un détachement. On en a placés dans les grandes villes, à Lyon, Marseille, Bordeaux, Nantes, Amiens, où ils exploitent tous les genres de crimes aux ordres de Commissaires.

Rouen est, je crois, la seule ville qui ait résisté à leur introduction et qui ait maintenu son indépendance municipale.

Le commandement général de cette armée a été confié à Ronsin ci-devant Procureur ; tour à tour espion, délateur, massacreur, commissaire-ordonnateur, employé du Bureau de la Guerre, et parfaitement propre à toutes ces fonctions alternatives dans le sens révolutionnaire. Pache en avait fait l'un de ces affidés, pendant qu'il gérait le Ministère de la Guerre. Il le chargea d'aller brouiller les cartes, rompre les marchés de subsistances, intriguer, voler et calomnier dans l'armée de Dumourier. Ce général l'a peint d'après nature dans sa correspondance imprimée. Devoué aux anti-Brissotins, Ronsin les servit de tous ses talens, devint bientôt un personnage, et gagna surtout du crédit dans les Bureaux de la Guerre, composés d'aussi honnêtes gens qui lui.

“ Ces Bureaux, de l'aveu du Comité, l'envoyèrent l'été dernier à la Vendée, investi d'un espèce de dictature militaire. Directeur en Chef de la guerre, sous le nom de Général Ministre, il s'associa Vincent, Secrétaire Général du Département de la Guerre, et Rossignol brigand inepte et toujours ivre (ivre), devenu aussi général par les vicissitudes du temps. Ce triumvirat, escorté d'un phalange d'états-majors, d'histrions, et de filles de joye, ne s'occupa que de disloquer l'armée, de casser des généraux, d'accabler les Commissaires Conventionnels de contrariétés et de mortifications. Ceux-ci se plaignirent vainement au Comité qui avait confié à Ronsin des sommes considérables et des lettres de cachet en blanc, que ce général remplissait à discrétion. Quand ces trois égreffins, crapuleux, et pillards, auraient été payé par les Royalistes, ils n'eussent pas dirigés autrement le cours de la campagne ; elle fut une suite de désastres tant qu'ils conservèrent la prédominance. Cependant le Comité, aveuglé clairvoyant, mais obligé de ménager les triumvirs, leurs cliens du Bureau de la Guerre, et la nombreuse cabale qui les protégeait, resta sourd aux clameurs des Commissaires. Heureusement l'Armée Révolutionnaire fut installée, on la mit sous les ordres de Ronsin ; Vincent y fut aussi employé. Ronsin expédié à Lyon avec trois mille de ses satellites pour y soutenir les vengeances des Commissaires, correspondit à leur attente et s'y montra digne de sa réputation.

“ Mais dans l'intervalle, le Comité avait été mieux instruit de sa conduite à la Vendée ; il le sut étroitement lié à Collot d'Herbois, au parti de la Commune, à tous les agitateurs subalternes ; il découvrit des brigandages inouis commis sans ordres, contre les ordres, et à son profit par ce scélérat et son armée. On le voyait affecter un ton d'indépendance et de menace. Aussitôt Robespierre le fit dénoncer à la Convention par Philippeaux, par Bourdon de l'Oise et Fabre d'Églantine. Le Comité de Sûreté Générale reçut ordre de rechercher la conduite de Ronsin et de Vincent. Après des hésitations, on se hasarda à les faire arrêter ; ainsi que Maillard, orateur des femmes de Paris dans la journée du 5<sup>e</sup> Octobre 1789, l'un des chefs des Septembriseurs et précepteur d'une société populaire de la capitale, où se forment, depuis cinq mois, les motions massacrant, les pétitions incendiaires, et la matrice des nouvelles secousses à imprimer à la Révolution.

“ Vous avez été instruit du sort de cette tentative du Comité. Les cris des Cordeliers, des sections, des clubs frénétiques, l'ont forcé de faire élargir ses prisonniers. Leur délivrance obligée, triomphe pour leur parti, est l'un des symptômes de sa prochaine supériorité. Robespierre, dissimulant son ressentiment, a non seulement témoigné une parfaite impartialité touchant le sort de ces trois hommes, mais il n'a pas hésité, crainte de pis, à laisser sacrifier Fabre d'Eglantine, chasser Philippeaux des Jacobins, et maltraiter leurs adhérens, nommés Philippotins par leurs adversaires.

“Ce détail qui, peut-être, vous paraîtra épisodique, ne l'est nullement, car il vous donnera la clef de l'impulsion, contraire au Comité, qu'on va travailler à communiquer à l'Armée Révolutionnaire. A quelles factions qu'elle s'attache, elle décidera de leur sort, comme elle a décidé celui de tout celle qui les ont précédés.

“Après vous avoir montré les trois piliers fondamentaux de l'existence du Comité de Salut-Public, l'Argent, l'Armée Révolutionnaire, la Tyrannie judiciaire, et la Terreur universelle qu'elle entretient, il serait surabondant de rechercher les états subsidiaires de cette autorité. Je me contente de vous faire observer que la multitude d'employés publics dont le salaire, les fonctions, la liberté, la vie, sont à la merci du Comité, lui forment une armée de créatures. On compte trente cinq mille de ses employés dans la seule capitale. Il s'en faut immensément que tous soient des serviteurs fidèles, ou des partisans affectionnés. Le nombre de ceux-ci n'est pas comparable à celui des traitres secrets, qui égorgeraient demain leur idole d'aujourd'hui, que le plus vil intérêt ou une basse pusillanimité enchaîne à la fortune mobile des dominateurs du jour; mais qui, par des motifs différens, les servent et leur obéissent avec zèle, dans l'ignorance de la durée d'un pouvoir qui les renverserait d'un souffle.

“Avant de mesurer la force de ces piliers dont les vacillations deviennent sensibles depuis deux mois, je répondrai à une question fort naturelle que les notions précédentes doivent vous inspirer. Vous me demanderez où tend cette puissance extraordinaire du Comité; quel est son but; quelles sont ses vues définitives; quel terme il se promet de ses travaux, de ses angoisses, et de ses crimes.

“Il serait présomptueux de répondre péremptoirement; car l'ambition n'est pas toujours diaphane, et le Comité, secret sur des entreprises moins importantes, pourrait se rendre impénétrable dans les desseins dont le plus petit nombre de ses membres serait d'ailleurs seul confident. Il faut donc s'arrêter aux idées plausibles sans se flatter d'atteindre la certitude. En vous exposant quelques conjectures je les appuie, cependant, sur plusieurs notions positives autant que sur les probabilités.

“On doit distinguer, d'abord, les vues du Comité qui lui sont personnelles, de celles qui embrassent la République même, la conduite des affaires générales, et celle de la guerre.

“L'opinion vulgaire, au dedans comme au dehors, est que Robespierre, Danton, et leurs complices dans le Comité, aspirent à perpétuer leur Dictature. Une foule de personnes à Paris même vont plus loin, en concentrant dans Robespierre seul ce projet d'usurpation, et un plan profond et suivi pour y parvenir. La conduite de ce Chef depuis quelques mois semblerait accréditer cette présomption. Il avait gagné un ascendant en apparence exclusif. Le Comité n'osait résister à ses volontés; il régnait sur la majorité des Jacobins; tous les partis s'accordaient à le flatter; ses paroles étaient des décisions, et la supériorité de son ton décelait celle de son autorité.

“Nonobstant ces divers indices, l'hypothèse de ce projet me paraît inconciliable avec le caractère des acteurs, avec la connaissance qu'ils possèdent des hazards à courir, avec leur expérience de l'instabilité de la faveur populaire, et de la fragilité d'un pouvoir que la première défiance ferait évanouir. Malgré la docilité fanatique qu'ils ont obtenu du peuple jusqu'à ce jour, ils ne s'aveuglent point sur le principe de ce dévouement; ni sur l'avantage qu'auraient leurs rivaux à tourner contre eux la fureur publique du moment où on les verrait tenter de briser le talisman de la Liberté et de l'Egalité.

“ Une semblable entreprise est au dessus des forces et des mœurs de Robespierre. Il a montré constamment plus de fanatisme que d'ambition. Cependant on ne peut révoquer en doute son intention et celles de ses collègues de prolonger la durée de leur puissance. Par quel motif ? Je les comprends tous dans un seul, par le motif de la peur.

“ Que redoutent-ils maintenant ? Ce n'est pas la guerre étrangère, dont les atteintes sont si loin de leur théâtre, dont les effets ont été si infructueux, et contre laquelle ils se regardent tous unanimement comme invulnérables. C'est encore moins les aristocrates foudroyés, les Feuillans, les Fédéralistes, ensévelis ou trainant dans d'obscures retraites leur misérable existence. Ces fripons sanguinaires qui accusent, qui confisquent, qui égorgent sous prétexte de contre-révolution à craindre, n'ont pas une minute la crainte d'une contre-révolution.

“ Les Révolutionnaires même, voilà leurs ennemis, les objets de leur terreur, et le but caché de leur tyrannie. Obsédés de ces terribles compétiteurs qu'ils ont formé au crime, qu'ils savent incapables d'aucun sentiment d'amitié ou de reconnaissance, et capables de les surpasser en scélératesse, ils les voyent impatiens de toute espèce de joug, avides de pouvoir, élancés contre celui qu'ils ont élevé. Les agitateurs du second ordre, joints à ceux que le crédit populaire ou des places importantes semblent approcher des premières rangs, sont des Furies attachées aux pas de quiconque possède l'autorité. Les titulaires actuels, se voyant menacés du châtiment qu'ils infligèrent aux Brissotins, et que les Brissotins avaient infligés aux Constitutionnels, n'ont que deux ressources de salut ; l'une, d'égaliser en barbarie et en affectation de civisme exterminateur les démagogues toujours prêts à les accuser de modérantisme et de trahison ; l'autre, de les réprimer et à travailler de s'en défaire. Pour remplir ce but, il faut maintenir le pouvoir exorbitant qu'on s'est attribué. Sous peine de passer de la dictature à l'échaffaud, il faut rester dictateur. L'abdication même est interdite ; Hérault et Bazire en ont fait l'épreuve. Mais il ne suffit pas de conserver le poignard ; il faut encore l'arracher à ceux qui l'approchent de votre gorge. Point d'obéissance, point de repos ; point de sûreté à espérer tant qu'on ne règne que par l'assistance d'alliés perfides, et par des décrets qu'un chef d'insurrection mettra en poudre dans une demie journée.

“ C'est donc pour conserver leur vie, et secondairement pour conserver leur empire, que Robespierre et son Comité s'arrogent l'omnipotence. Ils travaillent pour le présent plutôt que pour l'avenir ; environnés de massacreurs, leur prévoyance se concentre à s'en garantir. Dans l'alternative d'éteindre ces foyers de révolutions interminables ou d'en être consumés, la route est tracée ; on la suit forcément, et l'on retient en tachant de l'agrandir la puissance qui sert de bouclier.

“ Voilà dans mon opinion à quoi se réduisent ces grands desseins de souveraineté par lesquels le public cherche à expliquer les profondeurs du Comité de Salut-Public. Des rapports multipliés et un concours de faits particuliers donnent à mes conjectures le plus haut degré de vraisemblance. Je crois, par exemple, vous avoir mandé que le mois dernier une femme, liée avec Danton et Robespierre et les voyant menacés, les consulta l'un et l'autre sur le projet qu'elle formait de quitter la France.

“ “ Fuyez vite,” lui répondirent-ils, “ fuyez, nous voudrions pouvoir vous suivre ? nous ne tarderons pas à nous entregorger et la France sera un champ de carnage.” Le portrait que je vous ai tracé des habitudes de Robespierre atteste que la crainte domine sur tous ses sentimens. Danton travaille à s'éclipser, et ne paraît sur la scène que de loin en loin. Leurs collègues chassent l'ivresse de l'effroi par l'ivresse des plaisirs, et se rassurent dans des banquets crapuleux entre le vin et la débauche la plus immodérée. Lisez les discours de Robespierre depuis le commencement de l'année ; vous y verrez la dénonciation perpétuelle des faux patriotes, des exagérateurs, des agitateurs.

“ Quand aux vues générales du Comité, elles tendent toutes à maintenir et à consolider le Pouvoir Révolutionnaire qui leur assujettit la République et les armées. Aucun plan de constitution fixe, de gouvernement régulier rentre pour le moment dans leurs projets. Ils sont trop embarrassés du poids de l'édifice à soutenir pour songer à façonner cette masse informe. Leur attention est absorbée par la nécessité de faire face aux vicissitudes imminentes, et aux factions qui les provoquent. Les ressorts sont uniquement armés pour tendre de plus en plus le mobile de la terreur ; pour étouffer les semences de rébellion, et donner le change sur les motifs qui font exiger une obéissance devenue servitude.

“ Les frottemens sans nombre, les contrariétés dans l'exécution, la violence des mesures, la difficulté de faire plier l'anarchie et l'esprit d'indépendance, le besoin de surveiller tant d'agens dont la perversité légitime la défiance de leur commettans, les événemens imprévus, la discorde de tant de rouages hétérogènes échappent fréquemment à la vigilance du Comité, ou plutôt à son action directe partagée entre tant de soins diverses.

“ Mais le péril commun à tous les auteurs, facteurs, directeurs et bénéficiers de la République, fait subordonner dans le Comité ainsi qu'à la Convention, à la Commune et aux Jacobins, les conspirations de partis à la nécessité de la défense générale. Toutes les fois que le danger paraît très menaçant, on oublie un instant les haines et les rivalités. Lorsqu'il se fit adjuger la dictature, le Comité consulta l'intérêt public, autant que celui de son ambition. Il vit, et toutes les factions virent avec lui, le salut de la République dans cette institution. Ainsi l'on se tromperait de croire qu'elle tient aux vues personnelles de quelques hommes. Si le Comité actuel succombe les membres changeront ; mais le Comité restera, probablement avec des modifications.

“ Jusqu'à présent il n'a point menti à son titre : il n'en a pas même méconnu les devoirs. Il a porté dans leur exercice une application soutenue, une infatigable activité, des talens couronnés par le succès, un esprit de suite, de combinaison, et d'audace réfléchie. Les expédiens atroces dont il se sert depuis cinq mois pour soutenir le fardeau n'ont révolté que ceux dont il n'a rien à craindre. Les autres lui ont longtemps pardonné une autorité si dangereuse à leur indépendance licentieuse, et à l'impunité.

“ Il est d'autant plus fortement lié au besoin de défendre la cause de la République contre les attaques du dedans et du dehors, que le pouvoir nécessaire à cette fonction renferme en même temps un pouvoir, répressif et absolu dans l'intérieur, qui assure le propre domination de Comité autant que le salut de la Révolution. Si la crise extérieure venait à prendre fin comme celles de la Provence, de Lyon, et de la Vendée, le Comité serait chassé le lendemain.

“ L'identité de ses moyens d'autorité avec les moyens de défense publique lui a fait ajourner la paix à un terme indéfini. Sans la guerre, plus de prétextes d'extortions, de rapines, d'enrolemens forcés, de réquisition sur tous les fruits de la terre, et de saccagement universel ; sans la guerre, plus d'espérance de maintenir dans les armées cette discipline, non pas militaire mais révolutionnaire, qui prévient les réunions, les complots, les secousses intestines, et la désobéissance au Comité ou à ses préposés. Les armées perdraient cette exaltation de vanité qui les anime contre le soldat étranger ; en refluant dans l'intérieur elles participeraient au fanatisme, à la licence, à la discorde. Chaque faction travaillerait à les agiter, elles se diviseraient comme la

Convention et les Jacobins; ses chefs, devenus plus indépendans, disposeraient un jour du destin de l'empire; l'armée révolutionnaire s'anéantirait devant des bataillons fiers de leurs blessures, et indignés de se voir payer leurs services trois fois moins que les crimes de quelques brigands.

"Ainsi la guerre est aussi nécessaire au Comité que la respiration; il n'est pardonnable qu'à des Hottentots de supposer la possibilité d'obtenir la paix de la République. Lorsqu'on disserte en faveur de cette possibilité, sur la foi de quelques avances clandestines, et de quelques offres insidieuses, on confond le but du Comité avec ses démarches, et l'on se méprend sur le premier. Certainement la Convention ne se laisserait pas échapper l'occasion de diminuer le nombre de ses ennemis. Le Comité a fait, il renouvelle tous les jours, des efforts à ce sujet. Pendant le cours de l'année dernière, et même durant cet hiver, il a, par exemple, proposé sous main à la Cour de Turin de se séparer de la coalition, de réunir ses forces à celles de la République, et de prendre la Lombardie. Il n'est pas moins sûr qu'on a fait des ouvertures à la Prusse. Je ne serais pas étonné que votre Cabinet en eut reçu d'analogues; mais c'est une erreur trop grossière de voir dans cette intention de diviser et d'affaiblir la coalition, un désir de paix générale. Le Comité ne traiterait avec l'un de ses ennemis que pour redoubler avec plus de moyens la fureur de ses hostilités contre les autres.

"Le Comité veut donc continuer la guerre pour sa sûreté, par politique, par nécessité, et toujours dans l'espoir qu'elle livrera à sa discrétion les subsistances et les trésors des provinces qui avoisinent la France. Dès qu'il a vu circuler à Paris le désir de la paix, et s'élever des motions expressives de ce vœu-là, il s'est hâté de l'enchaîner par une nouvelle proclamation de guerre éternelle à tous les Gouvernemens.

"Il poursuivra cet objet jusqu'à sa dernière heure d'existence; ses successeurs le poursuivront après lui et par les mêmes motifs. Aucune faction ne tentera de s'y opposer; puisque, purement politiques, toutes ont un intérêt plus ou moins immédiat à écarter l'armée de l'intérieur; et le gros de la nation est hors d'état de résister à cette volonté. Seulement le Comité, les Montagnards, la Convention s'attacheront toujours d'avantage à populariser la guerre; quoique cette tâche paraisse insurmontable à la vue des calamités dont cette frénésie militaire accable le peuple, ils arrêteront les soupirs sur ses lèvres par des jongleries et des déclamations, et sauront bien prévenir que ces gémissemens aillent jusqu'à un désespoir dangereux. Regardez donc comme des points de conduite constants, continuation de la guerre à outrance, le séjour de l'armée loin du théâtre des factions, et le besoin de dévaster les contrées adjacentes pour supplier à la disette qui menace de dévorer les armées, après la royaume.

"Le Comité sacrifiera tout à ces trois buts. Décidé à l'emporter ou à périr, il projette de dépenser quatre cents millions par mois, d'engloutir toutes les fortunes particulières et la population valide; de porter ses masses à la suite de ses armées; de ruiner les vôtres par une agression continue; et de faire un désert des provinces où vous menaceriez de pénétrer. Il a calculé ses ressources pour deux ans; s'il atteint la prochaine récolte, il se croira sauvé. La disette actuelle, je vous le répète, ne l'inquiète qu'autant qu'elle peut s'étendre à la capitale et aux armées. Il entre dans son plan d'approvisionnement abondamment celles-ci, médiocrement Paris, et d'abandonner le reste à la famine, bien sûr qu'elle grossira ses légions de tous les males qui ne pourront plus subsister dans l'intérieur.

"Jusqu'ici je n'ai indiqué que passagèrement les causes qui travaillent à contrarier cette politique des Mille et une Nuits; à énerver ces efforts d'audace, et de malveillance ; à miner par la racine ce Comité dont la puissance, plus personnelle à ses principaux membres qu'on ne le croit, ne sera pas renversée sans ébranler dans sa chute la République entière, le système de la guerre, et la Révolution même à laquelle cet événement donnera peut-être une nouvelle face.

« Depuis que j'ai commencé ce résumé, la position du Comité a changé de caractère ; les divisions intestines qu'il maîtrisait, et dont il se servait avec habileté, ont pris des forces ; les siennes sont aujourd'hui balancées. A fin d'éviter l'exagération des pronostics, on doit s'en tenir aux faits actuels, reconnaître les combattans, peser leur poids respectifs, et à cet effet discerner exactement la nature des divisions qui les mettent aux prises. L'issue de cette lutte aura dans le cours de la campagne, vers le fin du printemps, une influence si intéressante, qu'aucun examen ne l'emporte en gravité sur celui-ci.

« Ce ne fut qu'à la fin d'Octobre dernier qu'on aperçut les indices d'un schisme naissant dans la faction dominante. Depuis la chute des Brissotins leurs adversaires, restés unis, concouraient tous dans une déférence enthousiaste pour le Comité de Salut-Public, et spécialement pour Robespierre. Toutes les voix célébraient ce dernier ; les papiers publics donnaient l'exemple et le ton de la vénération ; on n'osait contredire ce chef, ni à la Convention, ni aux Jacobins. Paraissait-il au spectacle ? Il était applaudi, comme jadis le Roi. Les prôneurs soudoyés, la canaille gagée pour occuper les galleries et les avenues de l'Assemblée, les délateurs, les tuteurs, tout était dans sa dépendance. Ebloui de cette éclat, et entraîné par la violence de son caractère, il négligea les ménagements, il heurta les amours-propres, il fit craindre ses desseins. On le voyait resserrer sa faction, et appesantir le sceptre sur quiconque lui portait ombrage. Il reléguait aux frontières les caballeurs et les motionnaires trop indépendans ; il laissait percer le désir de contenir le mouvement révolutionnaire, et d'imposer un frein à des hommes qui n'en voulaient aucun.

« Les premières étincelles éclatèrent à la Vendée par les divisions dont j'ai parlé entre les Commissaires Conventionnels, et les Ronsin, les Vincent, les Rossignols. Le Comité prudent ne désavoua ni ne soutint la conduite des Députés ; il paraissait craindre leurs antagonistes, et la cabale du Bureau de la Guerre, leur auxiliaire. Que ce parti ait conspiré dès cette époque la ruine du Comité, en lui procurant des revers dans la Vendée, ou que l'ineptie seule et le brigandage des généraux les aient occasionnés, il demeure certain que les dénonciations faites alors par les Commissaires, et auxquelles le Comité de Salut-public ne fut pas étranger, furent le signal d'une discorde ouverte.

« L'arrestation de Ronsin, de Vincent et de Maillard fit sortir des conciliabules populaires une nouvelle faction dont Robespierre connaissait déjà l'existence et méprisait les forces. Les têtes s'échauffèrent à la Commune, dans les sections, aux Cordeliers ; on demanda le jugement en forme des accusés, manière indirecte de censurer la durée de leur détention ; la secrétairerie du Bureau de la Guerre, l'état-major de l'armée révolutionnaire, les adjoints au Ministre Bouchotte se remuèrent ; on tint des conseils secrets chez Pache, et à l'Hotel de la Guerre. Les hostilités de la presse enflammèrent le différend ; les Jacobins se divisèrent et paraissaient balancés entre deux forces opposées.

« Cependant personne encore n'avait osé offenser Robespierre et le Comité qui, affectant de l'indifférence sur ces débats, voyaient avec plaisir ces dangereuses cabales s'entre-déchirer, et s'appropriaient secrètement à leur perdre l'une par l'autre sans avoir l'air d'y participer.

« Leur crédit ne baissa point extérieurement, mais leur politique fut devinée et déjouée. Ils ne tardèrent pas à se convaincre qu'une main robuste et exercée maniait ces élémens factieux, dont chacun, pris séparément, inspirait au Comité plus de mépris que de haine. Les accusés furent remis en liberté, leurs accusateurs disgraciés, Roberspierre chercha les moyens de réparer ce premier échec.

“ Il fit donner plus de consistance au Gouvernement Révolutionnaire ; il effraya la Commune par l'autorité de la Convention ; il saisissait chaque occasion de décrier et de poursuivre les faux patriotes, les contre-révolutionnaires en bonnets rouges ; il les fit attaquer nominativement par Camille des Moulins dans une feuille intitulée le Vieux Cordelier. Dès la fin de Novembre, et pour tenir tête aux Hébertistes (le parti de la Commune) il s'unit avec Danton son ennemi mortel mais menacé comme lui, ayant à se reprocher sa vénalité, les sommes qu'il reçut de la liste civile, une fortune scandaleuse, des connivences avec le Temple, et son opposition au procès de la Reine.

“ Cette coalition raffermît quelque temps le crédit suprême de Roberspierre. Il fit décréter aux Jacobins l'épure de cette société, pour en faire sortir les traitres, les aristocrates déguisés, les sans-culottes de mauvaise foi ; c'est à dire pour s'assurer d'une influence exclusive dans le club, en chassant les instrumens de ses ennemis et plusieurs de ses ennemis même.

“ Prolongée jusqu'à la fin de Janvier, cette opération a été un nouveau brandon dans l'incendie. Un ricochet de dénonciations respectives a engendré de nouvelles haines, et rendu les premières implacables. Des débats furieux ont annoncé une guerre à mort ; elle l'était en effet, puisque l'exclusion des Jacobins frappait l'exclus de l'anathème d'homme suspect, et le plaçait au pied de la guillotine.

“ On a pu juger par l'examen, et par le résultat du scrutin épuratoire, du degré de puissance des deux factions. La victoire a alterné ; mais les Hébertistes ont fait plus d'illustres victimes. Ils sont parvenus à expulser Philippeaux, Camille-Desmoulins, Fabre d'Eglantine, à entacher irrémissiblement plusieurs partisans du Comité, et à ne perdre aucun de leur chefs, ni affiliés essentiels.

Collot d'Herbois, ainsi que je l'ai dit plus haut, a paru le conducteur ostensible de l'opposition dans ces démêlés. Sans injurier, ni accuser Roberspierre et le Comité-même, en continuant à conserver avec sa cabale des ménagemens extérieures pour cette autorité légale et redoutable, il s'est étudié à en saper la base, et voici de quelle manière.

“ Il était inévitable qu'investi du pouvoir le Comité voulut en jouir ; qu'il exigea l'obéissance après avoir concouru à subvertir le principe de toute obéissance ; que régnant par la terreur, il invoqua le respect de l'ordre ; et que, créateur de la puissance révolutionnaire, il entendait la subordonner à son impulsion, la retirer des mains de la multitude et de ses agitateurs ; et en arrêter le mouvement toutes les fois qu'il lui paraissait trop fort, ou contraire à ses projets.

“ Voilà le défilé mortel qu'il fallait traverser pour dominer sans trouble ; défilé dans lequel périrent les Brissotins. Le Comité se jettait dans le même danger à l'heure où la faux qui moissonne les Royalistes, paraissait menacer les perturbateurs populaires, jaloux de recommencer une révolution. Faire emprisonner ou guillotiner les anarchistes, c'est soulever contre soi ses propres troupes ; les laisser agir librement, c'est exposer à en recevoir la loi.

“ De plus, comment espérer d'enchaîner jamais des scélérats dégoutans, et non rassasiés de carnage, en immolant toutes les victimes dont ils demandent la mort ? Ceder à leur férocité, c'est l'accroître, et accroître l'opinion de leur puissance. D'ailleurs, le Comité, calculant plus froidement les sacrifices de sang humain, a vu des inconvéniens à les perpétuer : il a vu la commisération chasser la fureur dans l'âme de la populace, l'effroi tuer tout attachement à la Révolution, les supplices perdre leur efficacité, et la guillotine ne plus être accompagnée que d'un poignée de gueux, qu'on envoie avec un assignat de vingt-quatre sols crier Vive la République autour du tribunal révolutionnaire et de l'échaffaud. Le Comité avait donc arrêté de diminuer ce fleuve de sang, d'incarcérer au lieu d'égorger, et de prendre les biens de ceux à qui l'on conserverait la vie.

“En conséquence quelques-uns de ses membres tel que Fabre d'Églantine, ses créatures à la Convention et aux Jacobins commençaient à parler de clémence. Camille Desmoulins la prêchait, tête levée, dans ses pamphlets. On avait ralenti les exécutions à Bordeaux, à Nantes, à Marseille. On faisait arriver des Lyonnais à la Convention avec des pétitions de miséricorde; les compositions, à prix d'argent, se multipliaient; toutes les motions sanguinaires des clubs subalternes et des sections étaient écartées.

“Collot d'Herbois et sa faction ont monté leur artillerie sur ces affûts: ils ont imprimées aux Clémentins l'odieuse que les Rolandistes jettèrent sur les Septembriseurs; ils ont représenté ce relâchement d'inhumanité éffrénée sous les couleurs d'une conspiration d'une coalition aristocratique; ils ont poussé des clameurs à l'arrestation de quelques patriotes combinée avec cette perfide modération envers les rebelles; ils ont dénoncé un projet formel de sacrifier les colonnes de la République.

“Alors, la cohue des sans-culottes, des Jacobins, des sections, a commencé à prendre des soupçons et à faire chorus. La majorité des Montagnards de la Convention a répété ces imprécations; le Comité et ses Moderés ont été forcés de rétrograder, et de cacher leur jeu; on a ouvert les prisons à la plupart des scélérats citoyens que détenait le Comité, et réclamés comme des patriotes immaculés. Cette lie, se melant à la lie des agitateurs de Paris, a grossi le torrent. Le despotisme de Robespierre et du Comité a été à l'ordre du jour; on a rompu la glace, on a jetté de la boue sur l'idole. Robespierre au milieu de février ayant, par une boutade subite, fait chasser des Jacobins deux égrégins nommés Bricket et Saintex qui se récriaient contre la mollesse des mesures actuelles, le lendemain Paris fut tapissée de placards inflammatoires contre Robespierre; où on le dénonçait sous le caractère d'un tyran.

“A aucun période de sa faveur il n'avait encore essayé une bourrasque si publique, indice de son décadence dans l'opinion. De jour en jour, l'ascendant de ses adversaires s'est fortifié; ils ne mettent plus ni bornes, ni retenue dans leurs pétitions. Le chagrin ayant rendu malades Robespierre et Couthon depuis trois semaines, l'opposition a profité de leur absence, Collot d'Herbois triomphe seul, et absorbe les applaudissemens aux Jacobins.

“Je ne peux mieux vous peindre l'audace croissante de cette faction, qu'en vous transcrivant le placard suivant, affiché dans toutes les rues de Paris les 2 et 3 de ce mois, par arrêté du Club des Cordeliers. C'est le procès-verbal de la séance du 28 pluviose, tenu à la Société des Défenseurs des Droits de l'Homme.”

“Ce parti, humble et timide jusqu'à la fin de l'année dernière, maintenant audacieux et ouvertement hostile, a ses principales phalanges dans les sections, et dans les sociétés populaires de Paris. Quoique le Comité ait entièrement suspendu dans les départemens cette influence anarchique de la démocratie délibérante, il n'a pas osé la frapper à la source dans la capitale. Comprimée quelque temps par la vigueur de la Dictature, et par les accidens de la campagne qui favorisaient l'action despotique de celle-ci, elle n'a pas tardé à se ranimer. Les sections sont devenues le refuge de tous les ambitieux désappointés, des coquins indisciplinables, des perturbateurs subalternes, des matamores de la sans-culottisme, et encore d'un nombre de contre-révolutionnaires cachés qui, sous la moustache, le bonnet rouge, et le pantalon brun, forcent de poumons dans ces tripots, propagent la discorde, et se font remarquer par la véhémence de leurs motions. Chaque section renferme un comité de surveillance et un comité révolutionnaire, dont la compétence devrait se borner aux objets de police locale, et qui, dans le fait, sont autant de foyers d'intrigues, d'innovations, d'indépendance et de troubles.

"Cette démocratie élémentaire, en collision par sa nature avec le pouvoir représentatif, tend invinciblement à échapper à la Convention, à usuper une partie de ses fonctions, et à la gouverner. Tantôt, elle se permet des actes d'autorité révolutionnaire; tantôt elle enfante des pétitions; un jour elle les fait appuyer par le Conseil Municipal, le lendemain par les clubs.

"La Commune extraite de ces sections, la Commune dont l'autorité sur Paris est contrôlée, et souvent contrariée par la Convention, la Commune qui, depuis l'origine, s'est toujours considérée comme une Convention au petit pré, ne reste soumise à celle-ci qu'autant qu'elle manque de moyens de désobéir. Ses chefs étant par leur crédit et par leur places les premiers en rang, pour arriver aux premiers honneurs, sont autant d'ennemis nés et de rivaux ardens de la puissance conventionnelle.

"Les Jacobins renferment dans leur sein les municipaux les plus accrédités, les oracles des sections, les agitateurs secrets qui les travaillent. Ainsi, le parti populaire a plus ou moins d'influence sur ce club central et primitif. Quant à club des Cordeliers qui a toujours entraîné les Jacobins, et aux sociétés subalternes qui en dépendent, il médite révolutions sur révolutions, et par essence, s'élève toujours contre toute autorité qui peut se prolonger six mois.

"Telle est la confédération qui ébranle le Comité de Salut-Public; et devant laquelle viendra échouer tout pouvoir qui n'aura pas eu la force, la volonté, ou le temps de fermer les sections et les clubs, et d'enchaîner la Commune, mais ce ne sont là que les instrumens; la faction obéit à des ressorts moins manifestes, qui communiquent et dirigent les mouvemens. Hébert et Chaumette ont passé longtemps pour les opérateurs principaux; ils n'étaient, cependant, ni assez habiles ni assez généralement accrédités pour un rôle si difficile. Les projets sont conduits par des mains plus exercées et moins connues.

Une partie des Montagnards de la Convention, les Bureaux de la Guerre que leur nombre et l'immensité des fonds qu'ils ont à distribuer rendent très influens, et les chefs des clubs des Cordeliers semblent former le noyau de la faction. Nous avons vu que les chefs de l'armée révolutionnaire courent la même carrière. Henriot Commandant des débris de la garde nationale de Paris, ci-devant laquais de Monsieur de Brehan, marche avec la Commune quoiqu'à jeu couvert; sa scélératesse sans bornes le pousse invinciblement à une nouvelle révolution.

Au milieu de ces troupes coalisées dont Collet d'Herbois paraît être le commandant ostensible, il existe néanmoins des moteurs couverts, dont l'action a glissé sourdement dans la Convention, au Comité de Salut-Public, à celui de Sécurité-Générale, et qui contrecarre sans paraître les mesures de l'un et de l'autre. Le 19 Février, Robespierre disait à Amar, son affidé au Comité de Sécurité Générale, que, depuis quelque temps, il s'apercevait clairement qu'une main invisible les emportait toujours au delà de leurs volontés, que tous les jours le Comité de Salut-Public faisait ce qu'il avait décidé la veille de ne pas faire; et qu'il existait une faction conduite pour les désoler et les perdre sans qu'ils eussent pu encore en découvrir les directeurs. Ses soupçons tombaient sur Pache, qui affectait de ne se mêler en rien, étranger en apparence aux divers partis, mais incapable par son naturel d'une semblable indifférence.<sup>1</sup>

"Tous les avis, en effet, emportent à regarder Pache comme le principal chef de la faction. Je vous ai dit antérieurement, qu'il gouvernait encore le département de la guerre. Cette foule de commis, d'épaulettes, et d'adjoints, ont été placés par lui, et sont encore ses créatures. Sa place de Maire lui assure une grande influence à la Commune où il se montre sans parler, lâchant à sa place les Hébert et les Chaumette.

"Voilà la récapitulation analytique des élémens de cette faction menaçante qui nous prépare une nouvelle phase révolutionnaire.

"Robespierre lui oppose son crédit encore très étendu, la terreur de son nom, la popularité que lui conserve son désintéressement. Il lui oppose Danton et les siens, la majorité du Comité de Salut-Public, celle de la Convention épouvanté de l'approche d'une nouvelle catastrophe, la majorité actuelle du Club des Jacobins, le gros de l'armée révolutionnaire où il a nombre de créatures qu'il soudoye chèrement, et qui partageait avec le Comité l'exercice du despotisme intérieur. Il lui oppose la clientèle des applaudisseurs à gages, des sans culottes à pension, des espions, des délateurs que le Comité et celui de Sécurité Générale répandent jusque dans les réduits obscurs. Il lui oppose l'opinion de l'armée qui, sous la direction du Comité, a remporté de glorieux avantages. Enfin, autour de Robespierre se rangent les gens paisibles, les hommes à portefeuille ou à propriété, réduits à regarder un conseil d'exécrables ordonnateurs de brigandages et de meurtres comme leur tuteur contre une faction plus exécrable encore, et qui mettra le comble aux énormités.

"Je ne pénètre point qui l'emportera de ces deux partis. Nous avons besoin de quelques semaines de plus pour acquérir à cet égard des lumières moins incertaines. Dans un pareil océan de haines, de fureurs, de complots, de trahisons imprévues, on aperçoit plus clairement les causes que les effets à venir; mais il est sûr que l'étoile du Comité tiendra aux premiers événemens de la campagne. Il est perdu si les Alliés débutent par de grands succès.

"Quel but se propose la faction ascendante? Est-ce un but politique ou seulement personnel? Cassera-t-elle la Convention, en élira-t-elle une nouvelle? Le contentera-t-elle de prendre les places de ses victimes, et de s'emparer du gouvernement sans le détruire? Je ne découvre encore aucune solution satisfaisante de ces questions. Ce qu'on ne peut révoquer en doute c'est le projet certain de massacrer ses antagonistes, d'épurer la Convention et les Jacobins dans un torrent de sang, de faire passer la domination à une ligue encore plus vile et plus cruelle, d'égorger les détenus, d'en augmenter le nombre, et de satisfaire cette soif intarissable de discorde, de révolution, de sang humain, et de rapine.

"Quant à l'opinion de ceux qui supposent aux chefs le dessein d'un bouleversement qui favorisât une contre-révolution, je n'entravois pas une raison tant soit peu plausible qui puisse la justifier.

"L'engagement ne tardera pas à se développer. Le prétexte en est déjà trouvé et en agitation. Il consiste à demander le mort des 61 membres de la Convention, détenus depuis l'été dernier comme coupables d'avoir protesté contre la journée du 31 Mai. Et à poursuivre également les 28,000 signataires de la pétition présentée au Roi Louis XVI. au mois de Juin 1792, pétition où l'on sollicitait la répression des Républicains, et la punition des acteurs du 20 Juin.

“ De leur côté, Robespierre et le Comité entendent de retenir en prison leurs 61 collègues au lieu de les assassiner. Ils résistent à une boucherie trop marquante des gens suspects et détenus ; ils redoutent avec raison que, le signal donné, ils ne soient aussi désignés, eux et leurs cliens, comme gens suspects, et que le glaive d’une St. Barthélemy n’ébranle les fondemens de la Révolution.

“ Pour amortir cette rage, le Comité jette quelques gouttes dedans le volcan. Il vient déjà d’ordonner la saisie générale des biens de tous les gens reconnus suspects, ou ennemis de la Révolution depuis 1789. Allant plus loin, il a placé la clef de la voûte, le 3 Mars, en faisant décréter, sur le rapport de Saint-Just au nom des deux Comités réunis, l’arrestation universelle des personnes suspectes dans toutes les communes ; et la répartition des biens des détenus aux indigens de la République, dont chaque commune fera dresser la liste. Sur la motion additionnelle de Danton, on a étendu le partage aux soldats qui auront été blessés ou mutilés.

“ Cette opération que l’on avait prédite, il y a plusieurs mois, fait le complément de la Révolution. Elle doit réclamer au Comité et à la Convention plus de popularité dans les armées et dans la multitude. Quel que soit l’époque, et les suites du combat que s’élève entre les deux factions, ce combat fera nager Paris dans le sang. Les forces étant moins inégales qu’elles ne le furent au 31 Mai, la résistance sera proportionnée à l’attaque, et le Comité se vendra cher.

“ Il en résultera certainement une secousse effroyable et générale. Les Municipalités et les Directoires de Départemens n’étant plus composés que de la fange de chaque lieu, ces scélérats abjects et ineptes mettront à feu et à sang leurs arrondissemens. Avant qu’une nouvelle autorité ait pris de l’assiette, nous reverrons deux mois de chaos.

“ Mais n’espérez rien de cette commotion en faveur de quelques soulèvemens intérieurs. 500,000 âmes seront égorgées. On tendra la gorge aux bourreaux, où on fuira par toutes les issues. S’il s’élève quelqu’insurrection, ce ne sera vraisemblablement que loin du voisinage des armées ; par exemple, dans l’intérieur de Languedoc où le désespoir est moins lâche, et où le feu du climat embrase plus facilement les têtes. Quant à la masse générale des mécontents, il est peu vraisemblable qu’elle sorte de son inertie. Son abbattement est à tel point, qu’elle redoute beaucoup plus que les Jacobins les armées étrangères, persuadée qu’à leur premiers succès un peu allarmans, tous les détenus et les citoyens soupçonnés, sans distinction d’âge ni de sexe, seront égorgés. Chacun a dans les fers son parent, son ami, son épouse, son fils ; chacun attend d’y être plongé lui-même ; et ne forme qu’un souhait, celui de la paix, à la quelle il attribue la miraculeuse vertu de désarmer la férocité des bourreaux.”

LORD GRENVILLE to GENERAL MACK.

1794, March 15, St. James’s Square.—“ Je ne puis pas douter, Monsieur, que vous n’ayez déjà été prévenu de la détermination finale de votre Cour de ne pas accéder aux conditions auxquelles Sa Majesté Prussienne a attaché la continuance de la co-opération pour la campagne prochaine. Il ne s'agit plus de discuter les raisons de cette résolution ; mais je ne me rappelle que trop combien vous avez toujours insisté sur la nécessité de s'assurer non seulement de la co-opération des Prussiens actuellement sur le Rhin, mais aussi de l'envoi d'un renfort très considérable. Et il n'est, malheureusement, que trop évident combien les suites de ce nouvel ordre de choses pouvaient devenir facheuses, si on n'y remédiait pas en se réglant sur la position dans laquelle on se trouve.

"M. Dundas aura l'honneur d'écrire officiellement à Son Altesse Royale M. le Duc d'York sur ce point intéressant, et je sais d'avance que Son Altesse Royale se fera un vrai plaisir de vous communiquer tout ce qui peut y avoir rapport, et de discuter avec vous quelles sont les mesures à prendre en conséquence. Mais il m'est trop précieuse de cultiver l'avantage que j'ai eu de vous connaître personnellement pour que je ne désire pas de profiter de cette occasion pour me rappeler à votre souvenir.

"Je puis bien vous assurer que, malgré les difficultés qui pourront survenir de ce nouvel incident, on est toujours ici dans la ferme intention de faire tous les efforts possibles pour soutenir, de concert avec l'armée de sa Majesté Impériale, une campagne offensive et vigoureuse du côté des Pays Bas. Mais il nous importe extrêmement de savoir jusqu'à quel point cette circonstance, survenue depuis l'époque de votre voyage à Londres, pourrait changer les mesures dont on est convenu dans ce temps là ; et, surtout, quelle différence elle pourrait opérer dans la distribution et les opérations des troupes Autrichiennes. Il est aussi très important de ne pas vous laisser ignorer que, malgré le peu de succès de négociations qui ont été suivies jusqu'ici en commun pour s'assurer de la co-opération des Prussiens, sa Majesté s'occupe encore (mais séparément) de cet objet pour lequel elle ferait de très grands sacrifices. Il est certain qu'on ne peut compter sur l'effet de ces démarches, mais, de l'autre côté, il paraît important de ne pas précipiter les mesures qui seraient peut-être nécessaires quand on aurait la certitude de la retraite prochaine d'armée Prussienne.

"Vous sentirez bien que cette lettre n'est rien moins qu'officielle. Mais l'impression que vous avez laissée ici de vos talens et de votre caractère nous font (sic) désirer de connaître votre façon de penser sur les circonstances actuelles ; et c'est avec une satisfaction infinie que je saisis une occasion qui me procure le moyen de vous assurer de toute l'étendue de la considération et de l'estime personnelle que vous m'avez inspirées."

GENERAL MACK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, March 20, Valenciennes.—"J'ai reçue la lettre que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'écrire dans un moment où j'étais encore dans une affliction et désolation bien profondes à cause de la retraite prochaine des Prussiens. Vous m'avez rendu un peu la vie. J'avais bien besoin de cette consolation, et j'espère que vous n'aurez jamais sujet de vous repentir de l'avoir donnée. Permettez que Lord Elgin soit l'organe de mes idées, de mes sentimens, de mes douleurs, et de mes espérances. Je l'ai instruit en tout, et muni même de plusieurs papiers qui n'auraient peut-être jamais dû sortir de mes mains. Mais je sais à qui je les communique, et je sais aussi que vos intérêts ne peuvent être que ceux de mon Souverain. Vous daignerez lui permettre aussi qu'il soit l'interprète de mes sentiments d'admiration et d'attachement envers vous et vos dignes et respectables collègues, et quel prix inestimable je mets sur l'honneur de votre confiance. Daignez me la conserver, et daignez être persuadé que je tacherai de la mériter."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT MERCY ARGENTEAU.

1794, April 4, London.—"J'espère que votre Excellence aura la bonté de pardonner la liberté que je prends de m'adresser à Elle pour une affaire importante et confidentielle, et à laquelle je suis persuadé qu'Elle attachera tout l'intérêt qu'elle mérite. J'ai reçu par un canal secret l'avis important que deux hommes devaient incessamment partir de Paris, chargés de la commission horrible d'attenter aux jours du Roi et du Ministre qui, sous les ordres de Sa Majesté, a la direction principale des affaires de ce royaume. L'un de ces hommes m'est désigné comme étant Suisse ou Allemand; l'autre Génois. Le premier se nommant Colla, et l'autre Godoni. L'on ajoute que Colla a une traite sur Londres pour 200 livres sterling, tirée par Pourra sur Bourdieu et Chollet; et que Godoni a une pareille traite pour 300 livres sterling, tirée par Caccia sur Tossier et Compagnie. Leur signalement est: Colla, grand, bien brun, âgé d'environ 40 ans. Godoni, petit, bien jaune, âgé d'environ 32 ans, et il louche.

"Comme on me marque que ces scélérats devaient passer par Liège et par Ostende, j'ai cru ne pouvoir mieux faire que de m'adresser à votre Excellence dans l'espérance que des mesures sûres seront prises pour les arrêter, s'il est possible, dans les Pays-Bas, pour lesquels je crois qu'ils seront déjà en voyage. Peut-être que par l'examen de leurs papiers on pourra trouver des indices qui serviront à la punition de leurs complices; mais, en tout cas, il serait très important d'empêcher leur arrivée dans ce pays-ci, où la nature de notre gouvernement leur donnerait tant de facilité pour se dérober aux poursuites de la police.

"Vous n'ignorez pas qu'on a reçu ici, comme dans toutes les autres cours de l'Europe, beaucoup d'avis de cette nature qui n'ont pas paru mériter une grande attention de la part des gouvernements. De la manière dont celui-ci me parvient, je ne puis pas croire qu'il me soit permis de le négliger; et je prie instamment votre Excellence de vouloir bien l'honorer de son attention; mais, en même temps, de faire en sorte que ses démarches soient secrètes, tant pour le succès de l'objet lui-même, que pour éviter la possibilité de compromettre celui dont je tiens cet avis."

French. Copy.

COUNT MERCY-ARGENTEAU to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, April 8, Brussels.—"Au moment où j'ai reçue la lettre du 4, dont votre Excellence m'honora, je me suis rendu chez M. le Comte de Metternich pour concerter avec ce Ministre toutes les mesures qu'exigeait la circonstance.

"Il a été dépêché avant midi des couriers à Ostende, à Liège, et dans les principales villes du pays, que l'on a supposé pouvoir servir de route détournée pour les deux individus suspects. Leur signalement a été donné d'une manière claire et précise, sans cependant rien motiver qui pût compromettre le secret ni les personnes dont viennent les avis.

“ Nous avons à Liège un homme très adroit. Je ne pourrais en dire autant à l'égard d'Ostende, qui cependant est le lieu le plus essentiel comme point de départ.

“ Cette réflexion m'a porté à redoubler mes moyens en réclamant ceux des militaires en même temps que ceux du civil. J'ai écrit à Monsieur le Prince de Coburg, à tous nos généraux ou commandants dans les postes divers, ne leur disant simplement que ce qui sert à exciter une grande surveillance sans qu'ils en connaissent la cause. Enfin, toutes les précautions qu'il est humainement possible de prendre ont été mises en œuvre sans perdre un instant ; et j'ai cru devoir entrer dans ces détails pour que votre Excellence n'ait pas la moindre doute sur le zèle avec lequel ses intentions ont été remplies dans une conjoncture de si haute importance.

“ Je suis occupé à de nouvelles découvertes des manœuvres commerciales et d'approvisionnements que pratiquent les scélérats de la Convention Française, et que favorise la honteuse connivance des puissances soi-disant neutres du Nord, des cantons Suisses, et de quelques villes d'Allemagne. Tout ce que je pourrai recueillir sur cette matière, ou autre semblable, sera mis sous vos yeux. L'Angleterre, les lumières, l'énergie de ses respectables Ministres, sont devenus le centre du salut de l'Europe. Il faut y porter tous les moyens de l'opérer ; nulle part ailleurs ils ne fructifieraient aussi efficacement.

“ J'attacherai toujours le plus grand prix aux occasions qui me mettront à même de marquer à votre Excellence le souvenir, la reconnaissance des bontés que j'ai éprouvé de sa part, et dont je désire de mériter la continuation par les sentiments sincères d'attachement et de respect.”

COUNT MERCY-ARGENTEAU to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, April 8, Brussels.—“ Le courier qui va être expédié ne me laisse que le temps d'avoir l'honneur de prévenir votre Excellence que les deux particuliers suspects viennent d'être arrêtés, il y a une heure. Ils arrivaient par la diligence de Liège. Ils ont été précédés à Ostende par cinq ou six marchands Italiens, lesquels pourraient avoir des rapports avec Colla et Godoni ; par conséquent, il s'agira des les faire observer. Je verrai tout à l'heure le Lieutenant de Police, et l'instruira de ce qu'il aura à faire pour les papiers et autres preuves. Je supplie votre Excellence de vouloir bien faire savoir comment elle voudra disposer des détenus.”

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT MERCY-ARGENTEAU.

1794, April 11, London.—“ J'a eu l'honneur de recevoir ce matin les deux lettres que votre Excellence a eu la bonté de m'écrire, et je m'empresse de lui témoigner toute ma reconnaissance du zèle et de l'activité avec lesquels elle a bien voulu s'occuper de l'affaire importante dont il a été question. L'arrivée des deux personnes dont il s'agit précisément dans le temps et les lieux qui m'avaient été désignés paraît confirmer les soupçons que j'avais relativement à l'objet de leur voyage. J'ose donc supplier votre Excellence de faire en sorte qu'elles soient détenues jusqu'à ce qu'on pourra savoir si l'examen de leurs papiers ou quelques autres circonstances nous donneront des indices assez fortes pour qu'il soit possible de les poursuivre en justice, elles ou leurs complices. Si cela se trouve impossible, peut-être que par des promesses ou des menaces on pourra tirer des prisonniers eux-mêmes des informations importantes sur la matière dont il s'agit; et, en tout cas, je crois qu'il est absolument nécessaire de les tenir en captivité jusqu'à la fin de la guerre et la termination du pouvoir des scélérats qui les font agir; à moins que leur innocence ne se manifeste d'une manière à ne laisser aucune doute sur leur compte.

"A ce que j'ai déjà eu l'honneur de marquer à votre Excellence, je dois encore ajouter mes remerciements très sincères pour les importantes communications qu'elle a eu la bonté de me faire parvenir. Je m'occupe d'en tirer tous les éclaircissements possibles, et de les rendre utiles à la grande cause dans laquelle nous sommes tous embarqués. Je prie votre Excellence d'être persuadée que je n'abuserai pas de la confiance qu'elle me témoigne, et que je conserverai pendant toute ma vie un souvenir précieux des circonstances qui m'ont donné l'occasion d'avoir ces relations directes avec un Ministre dont le caractère et le mérite distingué m'ont inspiré les sentiments de l'estime et de l'attachement les plus sincères et respectueuse."

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUC D'HARCOURT.

1794, May 28, St. James's Square.—"J'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer la liste des officiers Français qui ont demandé de lever ou de commander des corps Français sous les ordres et à la solde du Roi. Je vous prie de m'indiquer les noms de cinq ou six d'entre eux que vous jugerez les plus propres pour cet emploi, tant par leurs services antérieurs, que par la facilité qu'ils pourraient avoir de compléter leurs corps respectifs au plutôt. On serait dans l'intention d'accorder aux commandants des corps la faculté de proposer au Gouvernement les personnes les plus propres pour remplir les autres emplois dans ces corps."

COUNT LALLY-TOLENDAL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, July 14, London.—"Je reçois dans l'instant une lettre de M. Mounier du 26 Juin dernier. Il me donne une commission pour vous. Plutôt que de vous interrompre par la demande d'un rendez-vous sur un objet très particulier, qui n'est susceptible d'aucune discussion, je trouve beaucoup plus simple de mettre sous vos yeux l'extrait de sa lettre que vous trouverez au revers de cette feuille. Vous y verrez une nouvelle preuve du scrupule consciencieux de mon ami. J'y ai vu, moi, un nouveau gage de la noblesse et de la sensibilité de votre cœur. J'ose, au nom de tous les serviteurs de Louis XVI., vous remercier de votre tendre vénération pour la mémoire de ce vertueux et infortuné Prince."

July 15.—"Je devais finir cette lettre ce matin, mais je ne sais plus ce que j'avais à vous dire; et si je n'avais pas écrit hier l'extrait de la lettre de mon ami, je ne pourrai le faire aujourd'hui. Je reçois dans l'instant l'horrible nouvelle que cette angélique Duchesse de Biron, dont la vertu méritait des autels, vient d'être immolée sur l'échafaud par ces monstres; que la malheureuse Princesse de Poix, le jour même où son amie périssait du dernier supplice, a vu arracher de chez elle son beau-père, le Maréchal de Mouchy, âgé de 79 ans, et la Maréchale. Tout ce que je chéris, tout ce que je respecte en France et hors de France est atteint par là du coup de la mort. J'ose invoquer votre humanité. Vous avez des papiers que nous n'avons pas. La nouvelle ne paraît que trop certaine, puisqu'elle vient du Maréchal de Castries; cependant nous avons eu des nouvelles directes de nos amis du 20 Juin, qui ne nous menaçaient d'aucun de ces malheurs, et la lettre qui nous les apprend est datée de Cologne, 4 Juillet. Si vos informations sont les mêmes, ne prenez pas la peine de m'écrire; j'entendrai votre silence; mais si vous avez lieu de croire ou que ces malheurs, ou qu'au moins une partie ne sont pas réels, daignez par un mot consolateur, adressé à Twickenham Middlesex, suspendre le désespoir d'une tribu entière de parens et d'amis qui ne sont que douleur et terreur. Je dis suspendre car il n'y aura pas une victime d'épargnée; et pendant ce temps trois puissances ne s'occupent que d'aller plonger un autre peuple dans l'abîme où est la France! Il n'y a que vous dans l'Europe entière. Mais serez vous aussi forts que vous êtes grands?

Enclosure.

M. MOUNIER to COUNT LALLY-TOLENDAL.

Extrait.

1794, June 26, Morillon.—“Vous savez qu'un des trois gardes qui avaient accompagné le Roi à Varennes se nommait Du Moutier; et qu'il avait donné dans cette circonstance des preuves sans nombre de fidélité et de courage. Si cet homme se fut adressé à vous, en vous confiant son extrême pauvreté, et le mauvais état de sa poitrine, votre attachement pour la mémoire de Louis XVI. vous eut fait considérer comme un devoir de le servir. J'ai fait connaître sa situation au Lord G[renville], et je lui ai dit que ce brave homme était prêt à porter les armes au poste qu'on voudrait lui indiquer. Le Lord a écrit à son correspondant ordinaire à Berne, pour lui ordonner de compter à M. du Moutier la somme qu'il demanderait pour se rendre à Bruxelles, où il trouverait des instructions pour lui chez le Lord Elgin. M. du Moutier a commencé par demander 100 louis. J'étais absent, et le Lord F[itzgerald] les a payés. Ensuite, au lieu de partir, mon homme s'est marié avec une Bernoise sans fortune. Il s'est mis en route après cette précaution, et un de ses amis vient de m'assurer qu'au lieu d'aller à Bruxelles, il avait dessein de se rendre à Londres. Vous jugez que cet homme qui a le mérite de s'être dévoué à Louis XVI. peut être fort indiscret, et que je ne veux pas répondre de ses prétentions. Je ne voudrais pas lui nuire, après l'avoir obligé; mais je désirerais que vous fissiez vos efforts pour reconstruire le Lord G[renville] et pour lui dire sous le secret que mon unique intention a été de procurer du pain à ce garde fidèle; mais qu'il ne m'avait consulté ni pour taxer ses frais de voyage, ni pour ses démarches ultérieures; et que je n'avais point prétendu l'indiquer comme capable d'un poste militaire supérieur, car il n'a jamais été qu'un simple garde, n'est propre à aucun commandement d'un peu d'importance, et a très peu de lumières.”

French.

BARON THUGUT to COUNT MERCY-ARGENTEAU.

1794, July 30, Vienna.—“Votre Excellence a du avoir été, avant son départ pour Londres, témoin d'autres événemens qui n'ont pas amélioré l'état de nos affaires; la seconde évacuation de Namur, l'abandon successif de nos positions de Tirlemont et de Landen, notre séparation respective d'avec ses alliés par leur retraite vers la Hollande et par la nôtre vers Maestricht, sont autant de nouveaux malheurs. A en juger par l'étrange progression de contrainctés de la fortune, on pourrait craindre que nos revers ne soient pas à leur dernier terme. Il n'est par conséquent plus permis de perdre un seul instant pour prendre un parti décisif, avant que le délai apporté dans la recherche des remèdes ne rende le mal incurable.

“Les déterminations de L'Empereur dépendront des mesures que les Puissances Maritimes vont adopter. Sa Majesté veut bien se résoudre à continuer ses efforts pour la conservation ou la reprise des Pays-Bas, efforts si onéreux pour le reste de la monarchie. Mais Elle ne saurait imposer à ses états héréditaires de courir le danger évident de nouvelles pertes que sans la condition bien exprimée, et la promesse solennelle, que les Puissances Maritimes emploieront franchement et loyalement toutes leurs forces à seconder les entreprises de Sa Majesté en lui fournissant les secours les plus abondants et les plus efficaces. L'Empereur pense que ce système de marches sans cesse rétrogrades, l'abandon successif de tous les postes qu'on a suivi dans ces derniers moments, ne saurait aboutir qu'à la ruine totale des affaires; et qu'il est instant de s'occuper de nouveau d'opérations offensives le plutôt que possible. Sans parler de la nécessité absolue d'aviser aux tentatives qu'en tout cas il serait possible de faire pour prévenir, s'il en est temps encore, la perte à jamais irréparable des forteresses conquises, avec les nombreuses garnisons et le dépôt d'une grande partie de notre artillerie de siège qu'elles renferment, il est de l'intérêt le plus évident de disputer au moins à l'ennemi cette étendue considérable des riches contrées de la Belgique qu'il vient d'envahir, et dont la tranquille possession ne peut qu'ajouter tous les jours de nouvelles ressources à ces moyens déjà d'ailleurs si formidables.

“En se réunissant, en concentrant ses forces, en cherchant à occuper l'ennemi loin des limites de possessions de la République, au moins pendant la saison la plus propre aux grandes entreprises, on pourvoira sans doute au salut de la Hollande beaucoup plus sûrement qu'en abandonnant la campagne, et mettant l'ennemi à même de commencer ses sièges et de travailler à l'exécution de ses projets d'invasion avec l'énergie et la rapidité ordinaire de ses succès.

“Il est infiniment à désirer que la tâche des nouveaux concertis avec le Général Commandant en Chef l'armée de Sa Majesté soit confiée de préférence par les Puissances Maritimes à des personnes bien intentionnées, animées de cet esprit d'équité, de modération, de conciliation, que Sa Majesté recommandera à ses propres généraux; et qui des deux côtés est d'autant plus nécessaire qu'on ne peut pas se dissimuler que des intrigues tendantes à affaiblir l'ancienne union franche et loyale entre les alliés, ont eu quelque part aux derniers malheurs. Mais si à Londres on est déterminé d'accéder aux offres du zèle généreux de Sa Majesté, il est indispensable que l'armée du Duc d'York soit, sans aucune perte de temps, renforcée par tout ce qu'on pourra en Angleterre réunir de troupes, ainsi que par tout ce qu'on pourra s'en procurer ailleurs. Il est également nécessaire d'obtenir des Etats Généraux par l'entremise du Cabinet de St. James, que tout ce qui pourrait se trouver encore de troupes Hollandaises dans l'intérieur des Provinces, soit destiné à augmenter le corps du Prince Héritaire d'Orange, où elles seront employées au salut de la République avec plus de fruit qu'elles ne pourraient l'être nulle autre part.

“Un autre objet de nos justes demandes, et dont sa Majesté ne saurait se départir, c'est que la Grande Bretagne s'applique à nous assister dans nos embarras pécuniaires, embarras dont votre Excellence connaît mieux que personne l'étendue et l'urgence. Sa Majesté désire donc que le Ministère de St. James non seulement emploie tous les moyens qui sont en son pouvoir, et que la conjoncture peut suggérer, pour accélérer la marche et hâter la consommation de l'affaire de notre emprunt à Londres, mais, qu'en même temps, il soit dès à présent pris des arrangements pour subvenir désormais à l'épuisement de nos finances par des avances que Sa Majesté se flatte que les Puissances Maritimes n'hésiteront pas d'accorder à l'énergie de son zèle, à l'efficacité bien constatée de ces efforts, et à la réalité de ces besoins, après en avoir prodigué avec tant de libéralité gratuitement à la Cour de Berlin.

“Sa Majesté serait, sans contredit, autorisée à prétendre à des subsides et à des secours gratuits, et les arguments à l'appui de cette vérité se présenteront en foule aux lumières de votre Excellence ; mais comme les arrangements dont il faudrait convenir à ce sujet exigeraient probablement plus d'intervalle que la pressante pénurie de nos finances n'en saurait admettre, nous serons obligés d'insister provisoirement sur des avances pour lesquelles le crédit du Gouvernement Britannique auprès des principales maisons de banque de Londres, et l'usage de l'émission d'un certain nombre de billets dans les différents départements de son administration lui fournirait de grandes facilités, dont, il est à croire, qu'il ne balancera guères de faire usage, en considérant que son refus, nous laissant sans ressource, pourrait entraîner la dissolution générale de notre armée. En tout cas, Sa Majesté désire que votre Excellence examine l'avantage que, pour obtenir des prêts abondants, l'on pourrait tirer soit auprès des particuliers, soit auprès du Gouvernement même, d'une hypothèque spéciale sur les domaines de Sa Majesté dans les Pays-Bas, sur une partie des revenus ou du territoire même de la Belgique ; hypothèque que non obstant l'état actuel des choses, le Ministère Britannique ne peut regarder comme illusoire, ou qu'il n'ignore pas que, sans souscrire à sa perte certaine, l'Angleterre ne saurait permettre qu'en définitif les Pays-Bas restent jamais à la France.

“L'intention de l'Empereur est que votre Excellence, aidée de Monsieur le Comte de Starhemberg, en vienne sur ces différents objets, avec le Cabinet de St. James à des explications précises, et telles que leur résultat puisse fixer l'opinion de Sa Majesté sur le plus ou le moins d'assistance effective et de co-opération efficace que les dispositions des Puissances Maritimes lui assurent désormais.

“En attendant, l'Empereur a enjoint au Général Commandant en Chef de donner tous ses soins à arrêter les progrès ultérieurs de l'ennemi, et à se tenir toujours à même de se réporter à des opérations offensives, aussitôt que les circonstances le permettront. L'Empereur a également ordonné au Prince de Saxe-Coburg de s'occuper de la sûreté de Maestricht, et malgré le peu de reconnaissance que la République a montré lors de la première délivrance de cette forteresse, Sa Majesté a bien voulu tout oublier pour ne songer en ce moment qu'aux intérêts du salut commun. Sa Majesté a prescrit au Prince de Saxe-Coburg de suivre ces directions avec exactitude jusqu'à ce que votre Excellence l'ait informé du succès de ses conférences à Londres."

MINUTE OF LORD GRENVILLE ON COUNT MERCY'S MISSION TO LONDON.

[1794, August.] "It appears that Comte Mercy's instructions are :

1. "To state the principle of opposing a barrier to the views of aggression on the part of France.

2. "To agree to the principle of not mixing in the internal government of France, provided only that a limited monarchy is re-established.

3. "To carry on the war till all decrees injurious to other countries are repealed, and not to make peace but by common consent.

4. "The barrier in question, as above mentioned, is to consist in the conquests to be made on France, and in the political arrangements which may tend to the safety of the Empire and the Low Countries.

5. "In this latter view the exchange of Bavaria is to be proposed, and the Court of Vienna imagine that we have given ground to hope for facilities on that head.

6. "Comte Mercy is to throw out that, in default of this, the Court of Vienna must take its indemnity also in Poland.

7. "He is to ask a written acknowledgment of the principle of indemnities. And a formal promise of our concurrence in the proposed exchange ; and, in failure of this, the same acquiescence which we have shown to the plans of Berlin and Petersburg.

8. "The military operations are to be to drive the French from Germany and the Low Countries. Then to attack the Flanders barrier, and the frontier towns towards Germany to secure a barrier to the proposed territories of the Elector Palatine ; and, if the war is successful, to acquire something in Alsace as a compensation for the loss Austria will suffer by the exchange.

9. "In these operations the full concurrence of the English and Dutch force is to be asked for.

"Baron Jacobi is instructed :—

1. "To decline positively and definitively any engagement respecting the continuation of the war, or the terms of peace ; the King of Prussia being determined not to conclude any such engagement either with England or any other power.

2. "To discover our views about the proposed exchange, and if we appear favourable to it to support Comte Mercy's overtures, but

3. "In the contrary case, he is to express that, if difficulties arise on that head, the King of Prussia will not oppose his ally's obtaining, by acquisitions on the side of France, that indemnity to which he has a just title.

4. "He is to refuse to say anything on the subject either of the eventual acquisition in Poland which Austria has in view, if the other project fails ; or of the compensation for the pretended loss she will suffer by the exchange of the Low Countries.

"It is to be observed that the above statement of Comte Mercy's instructions contains only what the Court of Vienna has communicated to the King of Prussia."

JOHN JAY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, September 30, Royal Hotel, Pall Mall.—"I have endeavoured to incorporate the two treaties in the enclosed project ; and added some articles, chiefly borrowed from the treaty between Great Britain and France.

"An article to comprehend the provisions contemplated by the Lord Chancellor is still wanting; while the others are under examination it may be prepared.

"When your Lordship shall be ready to converse with me on the subject, do me the honour to name a time most convenient to your Lordship.

"So mutable are human affairs, especially in these mutable times, that the sooner the peace and friendship of our two countries are put out of hazard the better."

LORD GRENVILLE to JOHN JAY.

1794, October 7, St. James's Square.---"It shall certainly be my object to hasten as much as possible the examination and consideration of the contre projet which I have received from you; but, on such attention as I have hitherto been able to give to it, I find so much new matter, and so much variation in the form and substance of the articles proposed in the projet, that I am very apprehensive the discussion of these points will of necessity consume more time than I had flattered myself might have been sufficient to bring our negotiation to a satisfactory issue. If you can conveniently call in St. James's Square to-morrow morning at eleven, I will mention to you a few of the leading points which must, if insisted upon on your part, create, as I fear, insurmountable obstacles to the conclusion of the treaty proposed; but the extent and delicacy of these subjects will require more detailed and particular examination in every part where a departure is proposed from the terms of the projet delivered to you.

"I flatter myself that it is unnecessary for me to repeat the assurances of my sincere desire to bring the business to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion."

GENERAL DE CLERFAIT to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1794, October 7, Mederzier, près de Juliers.---"Je me ferais un grand plaisir de vous donner des nouvelles de ce qui arrivera ici d'intéressant. J'ai eu l'honneur de vous écrire, passé peu de jours, et vous ai dit les motifs qui m'empêchaient de faire le procès aux Commandants de Valenciennes et de Condé puisque je ne le pouvais sans ordre du Conseil de Guerre, auquel j'avais envoyé toutes les pièces relatives à cette affaire. J'ai eu la réponse du Conseil de Guerre; mais aucun ordre encore de faire arrêter ces deux généraux. Je souhaite qu'on sente à Vienne la nécessité de le faire. J'ai dit tout ce que je pensais à cet égard, quoiqu'ils aient des espèces de raison de se légitimer en partie.

"Quant à notre retraite de la Meuse, elle ne peut assurément être soupçonnée de mauvaise volonté. Nous y avons été attaqués par des forces considérables et forcés, après qu'on s'y est bien défendu. Tout le monde sait que l'aile gauche, obligée de se retirer, il s'ensuivrait la retraite de la droite, et l'abandon de Maestricht. Les Anglais avaient repassés la Meuse avant que nous l'avions quitté, puisqu'ils l'ont passé à Graves le 15 et le 16, et notre affaire était le 18. Ils se sont retirés sans se battre, et je ne suis pas convaincu qu'il y avait des forces suffisantes pour les y contraindre. Ils se sont retirés à portée de soutenir la Hollande, à ce qu'ils disent. Son Altesse Royale le Duc d'York m'écrivant tous les jours qu'il était prêt de contribuer à la délivrance de Maestricht, je l'ai prié dans ce cas de vouloir se rapprocher jusqu'à Venloo qu'il empêcherait la prise de cette forteresse; le passage de la Meuse couvrirait mon aile droite, et l'empêcherait d'être tournée, et que notre communication serait appuyée, et qu'on pourrait alors agir conjointement. Qu'il pourrait passer la Meuse, renforcé de ce que je pourrais lui donner de troupes de ma droite; et que si, par ce mouvement, l'ennemi, qui était avec toutes ses forces vis-à-vis de moi, faisait des détachements, que je l'attaquerais. Après beaucoup de sollicitation, il a envoyé quelques mille Hanovriens, non pas à Venloo mais à Wiel, me disant qu'il ne pouvait s'éloigner de la Hollande ce qu'il devait protéger, et jamais passer la Meuse, parcequ'il n'avait pas de pont. Sa dernière lettre du 27, dont je vous joins l'extrait, promettait un corps de 16,000 hommes. J'ai envoyé un officier pour en avoir des nouvelles, et ce matin il n'y avait encore que quelques Hanovriens.

“Les Hollandais n'ont que quelques centaines d'hommes dans Venloo. Cette place, si les Anglais ne s'en approchent pas, sera prise aussitôt qu'attaquée, et le passage de la Meuse libre.

“Les Hollandais qui avaient promis d'approvisionner Maestricht de tout ce qui lui manquait, qui ont eu plus de deux mois pour le faire pendant que nous y étions avec l'armée, ne l'ont pas fait. Il n'a qu'une partie du besoin des choses le plus essentielles, entr'autres de la poudre et des boulets. On leur a cédé 23 pièces de canon de ceux que nous avions à Rotterdam; ils se sont chargé de les faire transporter; 12 sont entrés le lendemain que nous en étions partis, je n'ai pu faire entrer les autres, et ai été au moment de les perdre. Enfin j'ai la plus grande partie des forces de l'ennemi vis-à-vis de moi. Je dois occuper un espace fort étendu de pays, depuis Ruremonde jusqu'à la Moselle. Ainsi ce que j'ai à opposer à l'ennemi de ce côté n'est pas proportionné aux forces qu'il a, et qu'il peut rassembler. Cependant j'ai assuré le Duc d'York que, s'il couvrait ma droite et l'empêche d'être tournée, que j'attendrais d'être attaqué quelque soit la force de l'ennemi; mais que s'il passait la Meuse ou tournait mon aile; que je devrais me retirer; et les officiers qu'il m'a envoyé sont convenus que je ne pouvais faire plus. C'est à quoi j'en suis. Les forces de l'ennemi sont considérables, puisque, voyant que j'étais déterminé à tenir ferme, il a rassemblé vers Duren toutes ses forces, et ne commencera la siege de Maestricht qu'après nous avoir forcé à nous retirer. Je crois être attaqué dans peu de jours. Ma droite n'est pas protégée par les Anglais. Si je n'avais qu'un point à défendre je serais content. Si je ne suis pas secondé ou appuyé d'un côté, j'ignore le parti que je devrai prendre. Ce serait à tort qu'on m'accuserait de ne pas donner toutes les marques de fermeté et de bonne volonté. Son Altesse Royale le Duc d'York m'a souvent fait des offres de contribuer à secourir Maestricht; mais, dans le fait, il n'y sera pour rien, puisqu'il ne veut pas s'éloigner de la Hollande, et qu'il veut que seul je fasse une entreprise qui exige beaucoup plus de force que je n'en ai. Je ne suis pas mieux secondé par les Prussiens, et n'ai rien à en espérer. Il est très avantageux de pousser les autres en avant, et de rester en panne.

“D'après cet abrégé des choses, vous verrez combien il est injuste d'être soupçonné de mauvaise volonté, et l'intérêt actuel des alliés étant de faire tous leurs efforts, ils ne doivent, ni ne peuvent, exiger que l'armée Impériale fasse ce qui n'est pas possible. Rien ne pourrait payer des malheurs auxquels on se serait exposé, sans espoir de succès. Je suis dans ce moment dans une position assez critique, et personne ne m'aidera à m'en tirer. J'ai du regret aux huit bataillons que j'ai laissé à Maestricht, parceque la forteresse n'était pas approvisionnée comme on l'avait promis. Je n'étais pas obligé de tenir l'autre ; j'en ai fait le sacrifice pour n'être pas soupçonné de négliger aucun moyen de contribuer au bien de la cause commune, un reproche que peut-être on aura à me faire dans la suite. Je vous enverrai à l'avenir la copie des lettres que j'écrivai au Duc d'York. J'ai voulu répondre d'abord à la votre du 26, et c'est à la hâte que je vous ai tracé cet abrégé de notre situation.

“ Dans le moment on me dit que des troupes Anglaises sont arrivées à Well.”

GENERAL DE CLAIRFAIT to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1794. October 10, Mulheim.—“ Je n'ai pû que vous écrire un mot après avoir quitté la Roer, et prit le parti de passer le Rhin. J'ai senti combien cette nécessité était cruelle, mais je suis assuré qu'elle était indispensable pour ne pas exposer l'armée à une perte trop considérable pour pouvoir être facilement réparée. Toutes les forces ennemies que tout le monde a pû évaluer au-delà de 90 mil hommes, étaient réunis sur Duren, Juliers, Vladerff. Nos postes au-delà de la Roer, étaient repoussées ; il avait attaqué le lieutenant-général Verneck à Vladerff, le général Krai à Juliers, avait pris possession des passages de la petite rivière ; et c'est dans cet état qu'étaient les choses le 2 au soir, et nous étions très près, et l'événement d'une bataille sanglante certaine pour le lendemain, fort désavantageux pour nous, puisque nous n'étions pas proportionnés pour le nombre, et que l'étendue de l'ennemi débordait nos ailes. Le succès était fort incertain, et la perte n'aurait pû être médiocre. Quelque grande qu'était l'envie que j'avais de combattre, j'ai cédé aux justes représentations de tous ceux qui étaient à même de me donner leur avis, et je ne peux qu'être persuadé encore qu'il n'y avait d'autre parti à prendre que celui de la retraite. Quoique très près de l'ennemi, elle s'est faite en ordre et sans perte. Le 3, nous primes postes derrière la Erff, le 4 près de Cologne, et ce fut la nuit du 5 au 6, lorsque l'ennemi s'apprêtait à nous attaquer, que nous fîmes le passage du Rhin sans aucune perte ; et après avoir sauvé tous les effets que nous avions à Cologne, j'ai fait occuper Dusseldorf. J'ai un corps à Dusseldorf pour la communication avec le duc d'York, à gauche je m'étends jusqu'au-delà de Bonna vers Andermack. Le Général Nauendorft est encore dans les montagnes de la Ahr, et ne retirera à Coblenz que lorsqu'il y sera forcé ; et lors il passera le Rhin pour se joindre à notre gauche. Voilà en abrégé notre position. La nuit du 7, l'ennemi a tiré à boulets rouges sur le Palais-Electoral à Dusseldorf, et n'a cessé que lorsqu'il fut brulé presque en totalité, ainsi que quelques maisons qui en étaient peu éloignées. Toute la Régence, le Gouvernement, le Commandant, toute la garnison Palatine s'est enfui, en abandonnant canons, arséniaux, magasins ; on ne peut décrire la confusion, et la déroute indécente que cet événement a occasionné. Personne n'est encore revenu depuis l'ennemi n'a plus tiré ; il n'en voulait qu'au palais de l'Electeur.

“ Je ne sais où sont les Anglais. Le Duc d'York ne m'a écrit autre chose sinon que je devais sentir ce qu'il devait faire : c'est sans doute de passer le Rhin. Il avait fait commencer un pont à Duyebourg il y a quelque temps, mais il l'a abandonné ; et je sais que celui de Nimègue est achevé, et je crois qu'ils ont passé, il y a trois jours. Je crois même que les Hanovriens nous ont prévenus ; ils étaient du côté de Wesel, et n'y sont plus. J'ai envoyé d'abord un officier au Duc d'York pour lui dire que je portais des troupes vers Duyebourg, à porté de Wesel, et arrangé notre communication. C'est ce qu'il m'avait demandé, et que j'ai fait d'abord. Depuis ce corps a été augmenté. Je le renforcerai encore lorsque j'aurai de ses nouvelles, et que je me serai assuré que ce corps peut avoir des vivres. J'attends le retour de cet officier encore au Duc d'York. Je ferai tout ce qui est en mon pouvoir pour lui complaire et le seconder. Ce que je peux de mieux est d'envoyer un corps qui appuie son aile gauche. C'est ce qu'il a demandé. J'en ai déjà six bataillons; j'en aurai davantage s'il le faut, et à sa réquisition; mais toute son armée étant, je crois, à Nimègue, et au-delà du Rhin, ils sont bien éloignés, et je ne peux m'étendre jusque là. Si j'en crois des rapports non-officiels, il ne se propose pas même de rester à ce point.

“Le Maréchal Möllendorf fait espérer qu'il restera entre la Moselle et le Rhin. Peut-on compter là-dessus. J'en doute, et je suis persuadé au moins qu'il n'attendra pas d'être pressé par des forces considérables. J'ai eu toutes les forces de l'ennemi sur les bras; et l'éloignement et le peu de mouvement qu'on s'est donné pour me seconder, ont été cause que je n'ai pu résister aux forces que l'ennemi a porté de notre côté. Sachant que ce n'était que l'armée Impériale qui pouvait arrêter les succès que cela fait, le reste lui coûterait peu de peine. C'est un malheur dont je ne suis, et ne peut être, responsable. Il est d'ailleurs la suite inévitable des arrangements faits avant que je n'ai été forcé de prendre le commandement, et c'est ce qui me l'a fait refuser, puisque les suites étaient faciles à prévoir. Je ne suis pas moins accablé de tant de malheurs. Les personnes raisonnables et justes savent que j'ai fait ce que j'ai pu, que j'ai tenu jusqu'au dernier moment, que l'ennemi n'a pu nous entamer dans cette retraite difficile, ni pendant le passage d'une fleuve. Mais combien y-a-t-il de gens justes? On juge l'événement, on ne calcule pas les impossibilités d'avoir pu mieux faire.

“Le Duc d'York n'ayant pas écrit que le seconde paiement était suspendu, j'ai envoyé un officier pour le recevoir, mais je crains qu'il ne le fera pas dans ces circonstances. Parmi tous les autres malheurs, celui de manquer d'argent où me laisse la Cour est affreux, et peut avoir les plus mauvaises conséquences. Redoublez d'efforts pour en avoir. De mon côté, je ferai ce que je pourrai pour complaire au Duc d'York. Donnez-moi de vos nouvelles; dites-moi sans détour l'effet que le passage du Rhin a fait. Je sais qu'il doit avoir été bien funeste, mais peut-être aura-t-on l'indulgence de croire que s'il avait été possible de soutenir, je l'aurai fait.

“J'apprends que le Maréchal de Möllendorf, qui voulait rester dans le Nundernik, et couvrir Coblenz, soutenir le poste de Kaisers, et de qui me l'a fait assurer hier encore, a changé d'avis, veut se retirer et abandonner Coblenz; et que le corps que j'ai encore au-delà du Rhin par là devra abandonner sa position et passer aussi de ce côté; car le Duc Albert ne le soutiendra pas davantage. Il n'y a pas de concert ni d'accord; et tant que ce sera, ainsi on ne fera que des sottises.”

AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

1794 [September—October]. Précis of Correspondence relating to alleged breaches of the treaty of peace concluded between Great Britain and the United States of America in 1784.—“When Mr. Hammond arrived in America towards the latter end of the year 1791, disputes subsisted between that country and Great Britain respecting the due observation of the treaty of peace, each accusing the other of having in various respects infringed it.

"In compliance with his instructions Mr. Hammond presented to the Secretary of State a representation of the several infractions of which we complained.

"He began by stating the measures pursued by Congress for giving effect to the engagements of the treaty of peace. These consisted in a Proclamation which immediately followed the ratification of the definitive treaty, and which announced that event; and in a resolve dated 14th January 1784, both of them requiring and enjoining all bodies of magistracy to carry into effect the definitive articles, and earnestly recommending to the Legislatures of the respective States to provide for the restitution of all confiscated estates belonging to real British subjects, and of those belonging to persons resident in districts possessed by the King's arms, between 30th November 1782 and 14th January 1784, who had not borne arms against the United States.

"From the little attention paid to this proclamation and recommendation, and in consequence of the answer given by the Marquis of Carmarthen to the requisition of Mr. Adams respecting the posts, on the 26th February 1786, the Congress, by a circular letter in April 1787 transmitted to the Governors of the respective States, recommended the repeal of such Acts as were repugnant to the treaty of peace; and the deciding in all causes in the Courts of Law or Equity relative to the said treaty, according to the true intent thereof, notwithstanding any such acts to the contrary. And in this circular, the Congress express their regret that, in some of the States, too little attention appears to have been paid to the public faith pledged by treaty.

"These recommendations however appear to have had very little effect. A municipal adoption of the treaty, either by the repeal of existing laws which were repugnant to the treaty, or by a declaratory law establishing the treaty as the supreme law of the land, was confined to a very few of the states.

"Mr. Hammond then proceeded to specify the particular acts which are considered as infractions of the treaty on the part of the United States.

"First, in not repealing laws enacted previous to the peace.

"Secondly, in enacting laws subsequent to the peace, in contravention of the treaty.

"Thirdly, in the decisions of the state courts on questions affecting the rights of British subjects.

"First, in not repealing laws enacted previous to the peace. Several acts (the heads of which are contained in the appendix from Nos. 1 to 34, marked A.) were passed by the respective Legislatures during the war. A general repeal of these, under the stipulated exceptions, would have been a compliance with the treaty; but the restitution of the estates of real British subjects, or persons resident in districts in possession of His Majesty's arms, and who had not borne arms against the States, was not provided for by any local or general regulation; nor was the restitution of the estates of other persons from whom they had been taken by confiscation, facilitated by any provision of the Legislature.

"Secondly, in enacting laws subsequent to the peace in contravention of the treaty. These Mr. Hammond considered under three heads; as they relate to the estates of the royalists; to their persons; and such as obstruct the recovery of debts due to the subjects of the Crown.

"The titles of the Acts to which Mr. Hammond referred as relating to the estates of the loyalists are contained in the Appendix B., from No. 1 to 10 inclusive. These Acts, by which former confiscations are confirmed; and by which persons who had purchased forfeited lands are secured in their possessions were, as Mr. Hammond observed, enacted in contradiction to the spirit of the treaty, to justice, and to that conciliatory line of conduct so strongly recommended by Congress, and on which that Assembly was engaged to proceed.

"The Acts (the heads of which are contained in Appendix C., from No. 1 to 19 inclusive) relative to the persons of loyalists, which had been left unrepealed as to numbers of persons, though repealed with regard to certain individuals; and those Acts which passed on the same subject subsequent to the peace, contain sentences of proscription, attainder, and banishment against persons who, under the express terms of the treaty, were at liberty to go to any part of the States, to make personal application in order to obtain restitution of their estates; and against others who, though restrained within narrower limits, were still to be allowed privileges and indulgences of which these Acts deprive them.

"With regard to the recovery of debts due to the subjects of the Crown, Acts (mentioned in Appendix D. to No 22 inclusive) prohibiting suits, suspending the recovery of the debts, directing courts to admit the reduction of interest, and providing for the absolute reduction of interest for a number of years, have been passed since the peace; and others of the same purport made during the war have remained unrepealed, and been protracted to periods subsequent to the peace; both of them in direct contradiction to the stipulation of the treaty, 'that creditors on either side should meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money of all bonâ fide debts heretofore contracted.'

"With respect to the third point, the decisions of State Courts on questions affecting the rights of British subjects, Mr. Hammond considered those decisions as they regard the claims, and the persons of British subjects. In the prosecution of claims for debts contracted previous to the war, many juries have invariably abated interest on the debts for seven years and a half, though proof has been uniformly established of the usage of the trade to allow interest after the expiration of a year on the amount of the goods shipped, or, of the specific contract between the debtor and creditor.

"Mr. Hammond mentioned several instances of the claim of interest being denied in different States for the term of the duration of the war, and, after being suspended for that term, allowed to recommence only from the date of the definitive treaty. In other States the delay of justice has operated equally with a denial of it. All these cases are in direct opposition to the recommendatory resolves of Congress, and infractions of the 4th article of the treaty of peace.

"The few attempts to recover British debts in the county courts of Virginia have failed, and many debts, from the smallness of the sums, can be recovered in such Courts only. The decisions of the state courts on points affecting the persons of British subjects have been equally repugnant to the terms of the treaty; and, in cases specified under this head by Mr. Hammond, are direct and positive violations of the 6th article.

"Mr. Hammond concluded with stating the conduct of the States as a sufficient ground for the delay on the part of His Majesty in fulfilling entirely the terms of the treaty, but with expressions of the King's readiness to enter into a negotiation respecting those articles of it which have not yet been executed.

"In the answer given to Mr. Hammond's representation it was contended by the American Ministers that, as the infractions on the part of Great Britain had preceded, so they had produced the Acts of which we complain. That, contrary to an express stipulation of the treaty, we had carried away the negroes from New York. That, instead of evacuating the upper posts with all convenient speed, no order has yet been given for their evacuation; from whence they think it natural to conclude that none had ever been intended. That when one party refuses to fulfil a treaty, the other is free to break it also, either in the whole or in equivalent parts, at its pleasure. That, consequently, the modifying the recovery of debts; firstly, by indulging the American citizens with longer and more practicable times of payment; secondly, by liberating their bodies from execution, on their delivering property to the creditor to the full amount of his demand; and thirdly, by admitting, during the first moments of the non-existence of coin among them, a discharge of executions by paper money, were fair and moderate acts of retaliation. That Congress, however, in consequence of assurances from the British Court that they would concur in a fulfilment of the treaty, had, in 1787, declared to the States its will that even the appearance of obstacle raised by their acts should no longer continue; and that every act of that nature should be formally repealed; which was complied with so fully that no such laws remained in any State of the Union except one; and that one could not have resisted, if any symptom of compliance on the part of Great Britain had rendered it expedient for Congress to repeat it's requisition.

"It was also argued that exile and confiscations were lawful acts of war, and that the 5th Article was recommendatory only. That this word, having but one meaning, establishes the intent of the parties; and, moreover, that it was particularly explained by the American negotiators that the Legislatures would be free to comply with the recommendation or not, and that probably they would not comply.

"With respect to the article of interest it was observed, that the decision whether it shall or shall not be allowed during the war rests, by the American Constitution, with the courts altogether. That if these have generally decided against the allowance, the reasons of their decision appear sufficiently weighty to clear them from the charge of that palpable degree of wrong which may authorise national complaint; or give a right of refusing execution of the treaty, by way of reprisal.

"This answer of the American Ministers appeared so unsatisfactory to Mr. Hammond that he felt it his duty to inform them that he was not authorised to conclude the negotiation, and that all he could do was to submit the paper he had received to the consideration of Her Majesty's Ministers.

"As the restorations of the negroes carried away at the time of evacuating New York has been insisted upon by the American Government, it seems necessary to remark that part of them may be presumed to have been captured during the war, and were therefore acquired by the rights of war; but that the principal part of them had fled to the British lines in consequence of proclamations issued by the British Commanders-in-Chief, which promised them freedom on their joining the British army; and of which freedom the British Government could not now deprive them.

"The breaking out of the war between Great Britain and France gave rise to fresh causes of dispute between the former Power and the Government of the United States.

"The Americans having resolved to observe a strict neutrality, a proclamation was issued by the President in which the citizens of the United States were warned and exhorted carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever that could in any manner tend to contravene the friendly and impartial conduct which was to be adopted and pursued towards the belligerent Powers.

"From this it might naturally have been expected that a just sense of their own rights and duties would have inclined the United States to resent any violation of the established principles of neutrality. The event, however, has proved the contrary, for, in various and repeated instances, the most unjustifiable partiality has been shown towards the French. They have been permitted to equip and arm vessels in the American ports, to molest the British trade within the jurisdiction of the United States, and finally to condemn by tribunals of their own the prizes they have thus taken.

"Immediately after the President's proclamation had been issued, a French frigate, called the Ambuscade, captured a small English brig off the Capes of Delaware; and, some days afterwards, the British ship Grange, lying at anchor within the Bay of Delaware, was also taken by her as a prize.

"From Charlestown Mr. Hammond received intelligence that two privateers had been fitted out from that port under French commissions.

"From the same quarter he also heard that two English brigantines, captured by the Ambuscade, had been condemned by the French Consul at Charlestown, and exposed to sale with their cargoes, under his authority. About the same period Mr. Hammond learnt from various respectable authorities that a considerable quantity of arms collected in America, and purchased by the French Government, were preparing to be shipped for France.

"Off the Capes of Delaware, and not more than two miles from the coast, the Ambuscade frigate captured the brig Catherine, and sent her into New York.

"At Charlestown, in South Carolina, the Americans permitted and were parties in a flagrant breach of the neutral rights.

"An English ship from Jamaica arrived there to take in provisions. The commander of a French privateer, then in the harbour, declared his intention of capturing her, and actually sold her to a merchant of Charlestown, under an engagement to deliver her in a certain number of weeks. The master of the English vessel, being apprized of this, applied, but without success, for protection to the Lieutenant Governor. He then took on board two six pounders and some ammunition; but a Republican Society of that place, gaining intelligence of this circumstance, forcibly entered the English vessel with a party of the militia artillery, carried off the arms, and deposited them in the public stores.

"The French fleet stationed at New York established a regular succession of cruisers for the purpose of annoying or intercepting any vessels which they might happen to encounter; and, in the above mentioned city, a species of jurisdiction was established by the person representing the actual rulers of France, which avowedly arrogated to itself all the authority and functions exercised by the Directors of the Marine, and by the Admiralty tribunals of France.

"By one of these cruisers the William Tell, a British brigantine, was captured at the distance of about a half a mile from the shore of the American coasts.

"The Pilgrim, a British brigantine from Nanticoke in Maryland, bound to Barbadoes, was captured by the French privateer Le Sans-Culotte of Marseilles, at a distance of two miles and a half, or three miles at the farthest, from the American shore, and consequently within the jurisdiction of the United States. The brigantine was publicly sold under the authority of the pretended tribunal of the French Consul at Baltimore.

"A French privateer, named the Industry, was illegally fitted out in the port of Baltimore, and, within a few days after her departure from that port, she captured the British ship Roehampton.

"The British ship Charles, and British schooner Delight, were captured as they were lying at anchor (the former at the distance of one mile, and the latter at the distance of half a mile, from the shore) off the Capes of Virginia, by a French armed ship, which had been for some weeks previously at Baltimore.

"It is true indeed that, in consequence of Mr. Hammond's remonstrations, the American Government has from time to time given some redress to the British sufferers. In some cases restitution has been ordered. In others compensation for the losses sustained has been granted by the Americans themselves.

"Regulations were made which, if they had been carried into execution, would have fully answered the intended purpose of enforcing respect to the American neutrality, and of manifesting an unremitted impartiality towards all the belligerent Powers; but even these have been so repeatedly eluded, and so explained away by subsequent declarations of their meaning, that they have been, in fact, of no material advantage to the British trade against the insults and depredations of French cruisers.

"Promises were given to Mr. Hammond by the American Ministers that effectual measures should be taken to prevent the practice of commissioning, equipping, and manning vessels in their ports, to cruise on any of the belligerent Powers.

"Mr. Hammond was also assured that measures were taken for excluding from all further asylum in the American ports vessels armed in them to cruise on nations with which they were at peace; and for the restoration of prizes taken by such vessels; and that, should the measures for restitution fail in their effect, the President considered it as incumbent on the United States to make compensation to the sufferers.

"After having received such assurances, Mr. Hammond was much astonished to hear from the American Ministers that the warlike equipment of the privateers in the ports of the United States, provided they elude the vigilance of the officers of the Executive Government, does not invalidate the legality of any prizes they may happen to make, and bring into those ports.

"Such a principle, if once established, would be productive of the most dangerous consequences; since it presents a scope for collusion, of which the present agent of the ruling party in France would not fail to take advantage.

"But the Americans suppose that they have more than equal causes of complaint against Great Britain.

"They accuse her of having given assistance to the hostile Indians.

"They complain that her privateers plunder their vessels, throw them out of their course by forcing them, upon groundless suspicion, into ports different from those to which they are destined; and detain them even after the hope of a regular confiscation is abandoned. That British ships of war have forcibly seized mariners belonging to American vessels. That by British regulations, their corn and provisions are driven from the ports of France. And that, without the imputation of a contraband trade, their vessels are captured for carrying on a commercial intercourse with the French West Indies.

"In addition to these grievances, the Instructions dated 6th November 1793, given to the commanders of British ships of war and privateers, by which they are directed to take all vessels that may be either bound to the French West Indies, or that may be laden with the produce of those Islands, are regarded as peculiarly hostile to the United States.

"The truce also with the Algerines is asserted to have been procured through the intervention of England, for Portugal and Holland; and, being considered as another insidious attempt to check the growing prosperity of America, it afforded an additional topic of abuse against the former power.

"The popular resentment being thus previously excited against Great Britain, Mr. Jefferson, the American Secretary of State, made a report on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries, the fallacies and falsehoods of which are sufficient proofs that the avowed tendency of the whole report is to recommend a closer connexion with France, and to inculcate the expediency of a direct system of commercial hostility with Great Britain.

"In the course of a fortnight after Mr. Jefferson's report had been presented, Mr. Madison (the ostensible leader of the party to which the former gentleman is attached) offered to the consideration of the House of Representatives certain specific propositions, analogous to the principles laid down in that paper.

"These propositions were fortunately rejected; but, if they had been carried into execution, not only all commercial intercourse with America must in fact have ended, but the hope also of obtaining payment of the debts due from that country to Great Britain would in all probability have been lost; as it is expressly stated, that 'provision ought to be made for liquidating the losses sustained by citizens of the United States, from the operation of particular regulations of any country contravening the law of nations.'

"Another measure however of commercial hostility against Great Britain soon afterwards took place.

"It has been already mentioned that the instructions of the 6th November were loudly complained of in America; but, on accounts being received from St. Christopher's of several American vessels that had been carried into that island, and condemned there in pursuance of them, the national resentment was carried to the highest pitch, and it was immediately resolved that all trade should be prohibited from the United States for thirty days; from the operation of which Act it was expected that the English West India Islands would suffer most essentially.

"This measure was immediately followed by others of a more hostile tendency. On the 27th of March several resolutions were proposed in the House of Representatives, of which the amount is to sequester all debts due to British subjects, and to hold them as a security for the purpose of providing an indemnification for any American property captured by British cruisers.

"The discussion of these resolutions was suspended, and revived according to circumstances; and the final determination is indefinitely postponed to some future day.

"Another resolution, of a nature equally inimical to Great Britain, was proposed in the House of Representatives on 2nd of April, of which the purport is to prohibit all intercourse with Great Britain, until a compensation shall be granted for all losses arising from captures made by British armed vessels, and until the ports on the confines of Canada shall be surrendered. This resolution was subsequently amended by adding to the specification of the other grievances imputed to Great Britain, a compensation for the negroes carried off at the conclusion of the war. In this form this motion was carried in a Committee of the whole House, by a majority of 53 to 44.

"The main question was not however taken, and consequently the decision on this point also is indefinitely deferred.

"Mr. Hammond could not easily conjecture the motives which induced the promoter of these resolutions to carry them through all the preliminary stages of deliberation, and to proceed no farther for the present, unless indeed they are intended to be held out as a mode of intimidating Great Britain; or, at least, as affording to the citizens of America the expectation of their being capable of producing such an effect.

"The popular ferment was raised to such a height that the American Government, for the purpose of in some measure allaying it, despatched a gentleman of Philadelphia to the British West Indies, in order to institute in those islands appeals in the cases of such American prizes as might appear to him to have been illegally condemned; and to secure an indemnification on the part of the United States to any individuals who may become securities for the prosecution of such appeals.

"In addition to the other marks of ill will manifested towards Great Britain, a member of the House of Representatives gave notice that he intended to move 'that over and above all duties imposed on the importation of foreign commodities into America, ten per cent. of extra duty should be laid on all articles the growth or manufacture of Great Britain.'

"This, if carried into a law, must tend inevitably farther to reduce the number of British vessels, which has been annually and gradually diminishing ever since the importation of the first discriminating duty.

"It must be owned that this motion was afterwards withdrawn by the mover of it; on an express assurance, however, from him that, previously to the close of the session, it should be revived in some other form.

"The spirit of hostility to Great Britain was much increased by Lord Dorchester's speech to the Indians, and by Governor Simcoe's expedition to the foot of the Miami rapids. The American Ministers complained in the strongest terms that Lord Dorchester was fostering and encouraging in the Indians hostile dispositions towards the United States; and that an unjustifiable aggression had been committed by Governor Simcoe, who was preparing to build a fort on their territory, notwithstanding orders had been given, in compliance with Mr. Hammond's demands, that the encroachment should be suppressed which the State and individuals of Vermont were accused of having committed on the territory occupied by His Majesty's garrison.

"Mr. Hammond contended that those encroachments had never been in any manner suppressed; but that recent infringements in that quarter and on the territory in its vicinity, had been since committed. To this he attributed the sentence in Lord Dorchester's speech which had given so much offence. In regard to Governor Simcoe's expedition, he owned he had no intelligence that such an event had occurred. But, in his opinion, much depended on the place on which the fort was intended to be erected. And whether it was for the purpose of protecting subjects of his Majesty residing in districts dependent on the fort of Detroit, or of preventing that fortress from being straightened by the approach of the American army. To either of which cases, he imagined, that the principle of the status quo, until the final arrangement of the points in discussion between the two countries shall be concluded, will strictly apply.

"Mr. Hammond thought this a fit opportunity for recapitulating the various breaches of neutrality that have been committed, as well by the State officers and individuals, as by the Federal Government itself. He adverted particularly to the insult which had been recently offered at Newport, Rhode Island, by the Governor and Council of that State to the British flag; in the violent measures pursued towards His Majesty's sloop of war Nautilus; and in the forcible detention of the officers by whom she was commanded.

"It is however to be hoped that the French cruisers, fitted out from American ports, will not in future be permitted to molest the British trade; for an Act has been passed authorising the President so employ the naval and military force of the United States to effect the prevention and suppression of so flagrant a violation of neutrality."

JOHN JAY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, October 13, Royal Hotel, Pall Mall.—"I received last evening, by a vessel in twenty-one days from New York, despatches from the Secretary of State. They contain much information respecting the then present state of affairs in the United States.

"Among other interesting circumstances, the transaction of Governor Simcoe relative to an American settlement at the Great Soders, is stated, and accompanied with copies of the papers respecting it.

"Extracts from these papers, and from Mr. Randolph's letter to me of the 30 August, I have now the honour of laying before your Lordship. A subsequent letter from Mr. Randolph of the 5 September enclosed a copy of one he had written to Mr. Hammond on the subject, and also a copy of Mr. Hammond's answer expressing his intention of transmitting them to Governor Simcoe, and to His Majesty's Ministers.

"These papers were sent to me, not merely for my information, but to enable me to make proper representations on the subject.

"Considering the present promising state of the negotiation I cannot think it necessary to make any formal applications to your Lordship respecting these painful occurrences.

"It is to be regretted that the same disposition to conciliation which animates your Lordship, does not appear to be entertained and seconded by His Majesty's officers and agents in America and the West Indies. I flatter myself, however, that instructions tending to produce a conduct conformable to that disposition have been sent, and that it will not be long before their effects will become visible, and relieve the President's mind from apprehensions which, I find, have taken strong hold of it.

"These considerations restrain me from troubling your Lordship with details and remarks concerning an opinion, which has become general and fixed, of unfriendly measures with the Indians.

"The treaty now preparing will, I hope, be such as to remove every cause of complaint, and produce sentiments and sensations of a different kind.

"I saw the captain of the Philadelphia ship last night; he told me he expects to sail next Sunday. In case a few days more should happen to be necessary to complete the treaty, I will endeavour to detain him at the expense of the United States."

Enclosure 1.

MR. SECRETARY RANDOLPH to JOHN JAY.

1794, August 30.—"Last night we received from Captain Williamson, living at Soders in Ontario county, in the State of New York, the enclosed letter containing the most unwarrantable demand from Governor Simcoe, through Lieutenant Sheaff, that he should desist from the prosecution of his settlement there.

"Soders is probably well known to you; if it be not, I add the only information which I can obtain of its position; that it lies between Oswego on lake Ontario, and Niagara, about twenty-five miles from the former, and nearly three times that distance from the latter.

"What might we not be justified in saying or doing on this new aggression? Mr. Hammond has promised to procure the truth of the report as to Governor Simcoe's seizure of the rapids of Miami, but, with a full scope of time, he remains silent; while it is firmly believed, that British troops were associated with the Indians in the late attack on Fort Recovery; and it is certain that the Governor of Upper Canada threatens us if we clear our own lands, and build houses to shelter our labourers.

"The admonition which your letter of June 23rd gives to prevent the arrival of any irritating intelligence in London, is but a comment upon the unvaried policy of the President, and of every member of the administration. This is evidenced by the step on which the President has now resolved; which is, to transmit copies of the papers to Mr. Hammond, now at New York (where he has been for a considerable time, and whither he went, after an intermission of visits to the President for more than two months) to afford him an occasion to explain this procedure away; or, if he should perchance have power, to check it; to inform Captain Williamson that he is right in his determination to push on his settlement, and that the owner of lands may repel force brought by an invader; and to offer to the Governor of New York, on loan, arms for the purposes of defence.

"My letter to Mr. Hammond cannot be prepared early enough for the express, but it will not be requisite or immediately useful to you; since the outrage of the principle asserted in Governor Simcoe's challenge will instantaneously occur to you; and, compared with similar acts on the part of the British Government, will establish our love of peace, in triumph over the calumnies which British agents, indisposed to us from interest or other motives, may propagate on the other side of the Atlantic."

Extract.

Enclosure 2.

CAPTAIN WILLIAMSON to MR. SECRETARY RANDOLPH.

1794, August 19, Bath.—I have the honour to transmit to you, by express, a protest in writing delivered by a British officer to a young man that manages my business at the settlement of Great Soders. You will find the protest is against that settlement, and all the settlements in that country.

"The officer who delivered the protest was attended by a subaltern, and a guard of eight or ten men.

"I shall, on meeting Mr. Sheaf, endeavour to draw from him the intended consequences of inattention to these orders of His Britannic Majesty.

"As it is believed that large supplies of military stores have been lately forwarded to Oswego, I think it not improbable but the intention may be taking possession of this place.

"As to my own part, I feel too sensibly to pay any attention whatever to orders from any foreign Power ; and will, of course, proceed with my improvements (which are merely clearing land and building houses) until I am driven off by a superior force."

Extract.

Enclosure 3.

LIEUTENANT R. H. SHEAFFE to CAPTAIN WILLIAMSON.

1795, August 16, Soders.—"Having a special commission and instructions for that purpose from the Lieutenant-Governor of His Britannic Majesty's Province of Upper Canada, I have come here to demand by what authority an establishment has been ordered at this place, and to require that such a design be immediately relinquished, for the reasons stated in the written Declaration accompanying this letter ; for the receipt of which protest, I have taken the acknowledgment of your agent Mr. Little. I regret exceedingly, in my private as well as public character, that I have not the satisfaction of seeing you here, but I hope on my return, which will be in about a week hence, to be more fortunate."

Copy.

Declaration.

"I am commanded to declare that during the inexecution of the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, and until the existing differences respecting it shall be mutually and finally adjusted, the taking possession of any part of the Indian territory, either for the purposes of war or sovereignty, is held to be a direct violation of His Majesty's rights, as they unquestionably existed before the treaty, and has an immediate tendency to interrupt, and in its progress to destroy, that good understanding which has hitherto subsisted between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America.

"I therefore require you to desist from any such aggression."

JOHN NUTT and WILLIAM MOLLESON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, October 24, 33, Broad Street.—"We are sorry to be under the necessity of giving your Lordship this trouble, but we are instructed and urged by the general committee to request some communication of the situation of our claim for debts due to the British merchants trading to North America previous to the year 1776, so far as your Lordship may deem proper and consistent with the existing state of the negotiation with Mr. Jay.

"We trust with confidence in your Lordship's assurances of protection and relief, and that our just expectations which involve the welfare of thousands will be realized."

M. MALOUEY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, December 14, Welbeck Street.—“Je ne doute pas que vous n'ayez des avis plus détaillées et plus sûrs que ceux qui me parviennent, mais lorsque je vois les événements suivre à peu près les prédictions de M. Mallet du Pan dans lettres qu'il m'écrit, je me reproche de ne pas vous les avoir communiqué au moment où je les reçois. Je prends donc la liberté de vous envoyer les deux dernières. Il est très possible qu'elles vous soient inutiles, qu'elles ne vous apprennent rien que de fausses conjectures; mais j'ai remarqué que sa manière de voir était toujours juste sur quelques points.”

French.

M. MALLET DU PAN to M. MALOUEY.

1794, November 5, Berne.—“Deux heures après le départ de ma dernière lettre du 2, Mr. W[ickham] m'apporta la vôtre du 15 Octobre, et la poste celle du 10 précédent. L'une et l'autre me prouvent que vous êtes loin du point de la question, qu'on n'est informé que très superficiellement à Londres de l'état intérieur actuel de la France; et que les distances vous laissent fort en arrière des variations extraordinaires du moment. Je ne puis vous mettre au fait par de simples lettres; ma dernière aura déjà rectifié quelques unes de vos opinions.

“L'erreur fondamentale de tous ceux qui raisonnent au loin sur la France est de porter leurs raisonnements sur la fausse base de l'analogie. Ils se persuadent que les Jacobins, triomphants cinq ans consécutifs, doivent triompher éternellement. Cette férocité, cette audace, ces prétendus talents dont vous me parlez, n'ont pas empêché que Robespierre leur chef succombât, que la terreur, les guillotines, les mesures révolutionnaires ne fussent emportées d'emblée, et qu'ils ne se regardent comme tellement écrasés qu'ils sont venus en Suisse tenter des négociations avec les Aristocrates, au moyen d'un billet du jeune Roi, qu'ils avaient dicté à ce malheureux enfant. J'ai lu ce billet en original; j'ai reçu la confiance de ce qui s'est passé; et j'ai dissuadé les intermédiaires aux quels on s'adressait de répondre à une si dangereuse ouverture. Il ne faut pas s'allier à un parti qui s'en va; il ne faut pas souiller la cause royale par une connexion avec des scélérats qui ont exécuté les noyades, les foudroyades, les mariages républicains, et qui sont l'objet de l'exécration universelle. Une union si monstrueuse serait un crime en morale, et une faute irrémissible en politique; car il suffirait que le peuple, que les royalistes même de l'intérieur soupçonnassent cette liaison, pour faire rétrograder toutes les dispositions au retour d'une royauté rendue par les Jacobins. S'ils en avaient la puissance, ils n'en auraient pas la volonté. Ce sont les tentatives d'agonisants. Billand Varennes, d'Herbois, et Barrère leurs chefs sont perdus sans ressource. Le premier est à-peu-près fou; le second va expier les meurtres de Lyon; le troisième sa servilité à Robespierre. Les sociétés populaires, déjà affaiblies, sont presque partout attaquées ou dissoutes. La majorité de la Convention voyant ce parti écrasé par la haine publique, s'est dispensée de recourir à l'insurrection pour l'achever. Elle a tout laissé faire aux formes légales. Voilà Carrier en jugement, sans que les Jacobins aient osé rien entreprendre.

“S'il n'y a point de talents parmi eux; il n'y en a pas d'avantage chez leurs adversaires. Mais ceux-ci ont pour eux l'opinion publique; et observez bien qu'ils ne l'ont pas formée, et que si elle les protège, c'est qu'ils lui obéissent. Ce mouvement des esprits les entraîne, bon gré, mal gré. Plusieurs de principaux ont témoigné des dispositions conciliatrices ; le système auquel ils sont forcés les rapproche invinciblement des Fédéralistes et des Constitutionnels. Nul autre parti n'offre les mêmes rapports, la même position, les mêmes espérances.

“En vertu des conseils que nous leur avons transmis, ils se sont rendus maîtres des deux grands Comités de Salut-Public et de Sûreté Général ; ils ont relevé les 164 Deputés or restants qui avaient voté l'appel au peuple dans le jugement du Roi ; ils ont mis en train le largissement et la re-intégration des 74 membres du même parti qui se trouvaient détenus depuis 15 mois ; ils ont replacé dans les autorités constituées une infinité de Constitutionnels ; ils ont fait rentrer les bourgeois de Paris dans leurs sections.

“Tout ce qu'on vous débite du prétendu ascendant des Jacobins dans les emplois, les tribunaux, est une reminiscence et non un fait ; ils sont dépossédés en très grande partie, et le seront partout avant le fin du mois.

“Malgré ce que je vous annonce du rapprochement des chefs Modérés, gardez-vous de croire qu'ils aient aucun plan ferme de royauté. Ils hésitent, ils tâtonnent, ils craignent pour leurs têtes ; ils se défient de tout ce qui les entoure. D'ailleurs, ils espèrent obtenir la paix, ou la donner aux Puissances ; et s'ils l'ont, ils se regardent comme affermis. Alors la vanité législative, et l'amour de la domination leur feront tenter un nouveau code républicain. Le tiers de la Convention tient à ce régime par nécessité, ou par goût ; un quart est Jacobin ; le reste est composé de politiques qui attendent les événements ; mais la pensée individuelle, dominante, est de se tirer à tout prix des tempêtes de factions sanguinaires, et de sauver vies et propriétés.

“Voilà les éléments sur lesquels on travaille. Le besoin irresistible et la soif effrénée de la paix leur donnent une grande activité ; mais pour qu'ils composent autre chose que le cahos, il faut que la crainte de la guerre accompagne l'espoir de la paix. Plus de ressources si les Puissances, au lieu de marchander celle-ci au prix du rétablissement de la monarchie constitutionnelle, la jettent à la tête de la Convention. Celle-ci ayant rempli le principal vœu public, sera alors maîtresse se donner le gouvernement qui lui plaira, et très probablement elle ne reviendra pas à la monarchie. La nation lassée, voyant tomber une partie de ses chaînes, acceptera tout ce que présenteront ses délégués, et chacun verra trop d'incertitudes et de dangers à reparler d'un Roi. Si, au contraire, les Puissances en renonçant à toute idée de guerre contre la France et pour lui donner des loix, étaient d'accord à déclarer qu'elles ne poseront les armes qu'après le rétabli de la monarchie constitutionnelle, vous verriez les Modérés, unis aux 200 membres non régicides, se servir, en faveur des vues royalistes, de ce cri de paix nécessaire ; ils remettraient les Constitutionnels en attitude ; ils opposeraient le vœu national pour la paix aux efforts des Républicains ; ils auraient pour eux majorité dans le peuple, et majorité dans la Convention.

“En ce moment, les modérés jouent serré. Ne vous méprenez pas aux discours des autres ; souvenez-vous que Monck ne parlait que de République la vieille du jour où il proclamait le Roi.

“Cette crise offre certainement une infinité d'obstacles et de chances défavorables ; mais la pire de toutes est la conduite de l'Empire. On ne doute plus que le Roi de Prusse n'ait fait sa paix ; ses troupes se retirent entièrement ; quatre autres Electeurs ont proposé à la Diète de traiter ; la [défection du] Roi de Prusse, l'horrible affaire de Pologne, la crainte de ses usurpations [porte] la Cour de Vienne, d'ailleurs très mécontente des Anglais et des Hollandais, de négotier aussi.

L'Espagne, battue tout les huit jours, traite aussi de son côté. Vous verrez éclore des paix séparées, comme à la paix de Nimègue, et alors notre principal ressort est démonté ; car l'Angleterre seule influe plutôt en sens contraire sur un ennemi qui la déteste, et qui n'aura plus qu'elle à craindre. Toute marche ultérieure est donc suspendue par cette incertitude sur la paix et la guerre. Cependant on ne néglige rien. En ce moment la Convention est un cahos, et la fermentation excessive. Il surviendra dans peu des explosions, dans un sens ou dans un autre.

“ Quoiqu'il arrive, à moins que les Jacobins ne triomphent, la France sera rouverte aux émigrés qui n'ont pas porté les armes. Il serait à désirer que vous vous entretinssiez des circonstances avec deux ou trois des principales Constitutionnels. Montlosier devrait voir Duport qui le caressa à Paris. Quant aux colonies, votre idée est très heureuse, mais l'orgueil résistera à rien céder aux Anglais. On rendra plutôt tout aux autres Puissances, qu'on ne leur abandonnerait un village. Ecrivez moi plus régulièrement.”

French.

LORD GRENVILLE to the DUKE OF PORTLAND.

1794, November 9, Dover Street.—“ In the course of the discussions with Mr. Jay, which are, I hope, now brought to a satisfactory issue, a great deal has passed respecting the Prize Courts in the West Indies, and the facts mentioned by him, together with those which have in other ways come to my knowledge, have satisfied me of the necessity of our providing some effectual remedy for the evils arising from the present frame and constitution of those Courts. Unless this can be done, there is, I fear, no hope of establishing any permanent good understanding with America; for let us make what regulations we please by treaty, the West India and Bermuda privateers will continue their depredations upon the American trade as long as they find the West Indies Courts disposed to countenance their proceedings.

“ I have attentively considered the report which was made to your Grace by the Advocate, Attorney, and Solicitor General on this subject, under date of the 9th of August; and, though it is impossible not to acknowledge that some of the difficulties stated by them, respecting the execution of the plan which had been referred to them, are of weight, I own I am not satisfied that they are sufficiently important to prevent the adoption even of that plan if done by authority of Parliament. But I am sure that, if that plan should really be impracticable, we should not be justified in leaving matters as they are, without trying whether some other remedy might not be effectual.”

“ Supposing a controlling power in Parliament respecting both the Prize Courts and the Courts of Vice-Admiralty in the Colonies, which I apprehend clearly exists, those being strictly matters of an Imperial nature, I should suppose there could be no difficulty in uniting all the Vice-Admiralty Courts into one, as well as all the Prize Courts. If it were necessary, the several judges of the present Courts in the different islands might all be members of the new Court, and might continue to reside in the separate islands to do such acts relative to causes brought into the General Court, either of Vice-Admiralty or Prize, as might properly be done by single judges out of court. And the General Court might and ought to be an Itinerant Court, holding its sessions in all the islands. And the appointment of one civilian of character and abilities to preside as Chief Justice would operate as a great check on the proceedings of the Court in each island. There would also be derived from this arrangement the advantage of uniformity of practice and decision; a point in which the present system is greatly defective.

Such an arrangement would much diminish the inconvenience suggested in the report respecting causes now depending. I should think these might be transferred to a Court differing so little in any part of its constitution from that in which they now are. But if not, the present Court might be continued, as with respect to those causes only, but being restrained from entertaining any new cause."

"I throw these suggestions out to your Grace on a point with the detail of which I am not conversant, with a desire that they may be considered both by the King's servants and by those whose local and professional knowledge make them more competent judges of such a business, but in the earnest hope that some new arrangement will be made to obviate a mischief the continuance of which cannot fail to produce the most serious evils."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1794 ], Downing Street.—"I have just read Eliot's account from the Hague of the opening made by Monsieur Martanges, which strikes me as deserving every encouragement; and I should imagine you will think it right to authorize Eliot to make a favourable answer, referring at the same time to the previous conditions, which we mean to require from the Princes. The number of émigrés who can be collected within the time named is probably overrated; but, if our conditions are accepted, the larger the force is of this description, the better."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794? [September-October], Wimbledon.—"I return you the papers you sent me; the principles of your projet I much approve of; but, before communicating it, I should wish it to be reconsidered whether it is right to admit any other nations whatever to interfere in our differences with them. In truth, I know not who these nations could be, but, if any of such a description as you give could be found, I would not relish the idea of any nation being referees between you and your former subjects.

"On the subject of the ports and the future boundary, I would wish, for our mutual satisfaction, before it goes out of your hands, that Mr. Pitt, you, and I could, with a map before us, and General Clarke in company, run over the report made up by Simcoe on the defence of the two Canadas. The day will be so broke tomorrow it would not answer, but as early on Saturday as is convenient.

"I am rather against King's suggestion as to duties, as mentioned, respecting the first article. This however may be talked of in our conversation with Clarke."

JOHN JAY to LORD GRENVILLE.

1794, November 22, Royal Hotel, Pall Mall.—"I have had the pleasure of receiving the letter which your Lordship did me the honour to write yesterday, enclosing a copy of one that you had written to Mr. Hammond. Marks of confidence from those who merit it are grateful to the human mind; they give occasion to inferences, which, by soothing self-love, produce agreeable emotions.

"Being aware that our mutual efforts to restore good humour and goodwill between our two countries, should be continued beyond the date of the treaty, I am happy that our sentiments in this respect coincide.

"The letters I have written to America with the two copies of the treaty, which are already despatched, leave me little to add on the subject of your Lordship's letter. They are indeed concise, for I had not time to amplify. They will be followed by others less general, and more pointed. There are men among us to whom those ideas will be familiar, and who will not omit to disseminate them. Their opinions and example will have influence, but it will be progressive, not sudden and general. The storm I hope and believe will soon cease, but the agitation of the waters will naturally take some time to subside. No man can with effect say to them, peace, be still. By casting oil upon them, they will doubtless be the sooner calmed. Let us do so.

"I have a good opinion of Mr. Hammond, nay more, I really wish him well. The asperities however which have taken place lead me to apprehend that official darts have frequently pierced through official characters, and wounded the men. Hence I cannot forbear wishing that Mr. Hammond had a better place; and that a person well adapted to the existing state of things was sent to succeed him. I make this remark on the most mature reflection, and found it on those active principles in human nature which, however they may be repressed, cannot easily be rendered dormant, except in cases of greater magnanimity than prudence will usually allow us to calculate upon. It is not without reluctance that I give this remark a place in this letter. I class Mr. Hammond among those who, I think, are friendly to me. I have experienced his attentions and hospitality. Not an unkind idea passes in my mind respecting him. Public and common good is my object and my motive. That official letters and documents have been prematurely and improperly published in America is evident. I have not been sparing of animadversions on this head, and flatter myself that more circumspection in future will be used.

"The consuls and other public officers and agents in the two countries will have it much in their power (especially in America, from the nature of the government and state of society) to promote or to check the progress of conciliation and cordiality. I have but imperfect knowledge of those now in the United States, except Sir John Temple, whose conduct and conversation appeared to me to be conciliatory. I have been informed very explicitly that Mr. Hamilton, the consul in Virginia, is not esteemed, and that his private character is far from being estimable. I mention this only as meriting inquiry.

"There being no French merchant ships in the American seas, the privateers must either prey on neutral vessels, or return without spoil. Hence they become exposed to temptations not easy for them to resist. The privateers of two hostile nations have no desire to seek and to fight each other. Between mere birds of prey there are few conflicts. If they were recalled, their crews might be usefully employed in ships of war or of commerce. Pardon the liberty of these hints; they occur to me, and I let my pen run on, perhaps too far.

"Permit me to assure you that my endeavours to cultivate amity and goodwill between our countries and people shall continue unremitted, and that they will not cease to be animated by your Lordship's co-operation.

"To use an Indian figure, may the hatchet be henceforth buried for ever, and with it all the animosities which sharpened, and which threatened to redden it."

MILITARY CONVENTION FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC AND GERMANY.

[1794, December.]—NOTE by LORD GRENVILLE of the Prussian case, in regard to the violation of this Convention, as presented by BARON JACOBI.

"On the 26th or 27th July, M. Moellendorff made a Convention for the military operations, with Duke Albert and the Duke of York.

"In August the English Ministers were well contented with the Prussians.

"The middle of September, official assurances were given that the subsidy would be paid

"On the 20th September, M. M. Hohenloe and Frensen gained a victory at Kaiserlautern.

"On the 30th September, notice was given that the subsidy would not be paid for the month of October, because engagements were not fulfilled.

"On the 8th or 10th October this news arrived at Berlin, at the moment they expected payment.

"On the 20th or 24th October, a Declaration was delivered at Berlin that, if a new concert was made with the Duke of York and the commanders of the Austrian and Prussian armies, the subsidy past and future would be paid. Prussia consented to this, provided the arrears were first paid, and that the Prussian army should not act under the Commissary Briel and Haafs, but according to a convention of the tenor of the Convention of the Hague.

"This answer arrived in London the 9th November. On the 28th November the payment refused; but it was declared that if Prussia had any propositions to make for next campaign, they would be considered."

ABSTRACT by LORD GRENVILLE of letters received from Brittany, from November 1794 to January 1795.

3 Messidor.—Republican signals, between the coast and their vessels.

N. B.—These are regulated by the days of the month, which must of course be understood of the Republican month.

Qy.—Whether these signals will not have been changed on the discovery of Prigeant and his associates.

15 November.—This paper is certified by the Baron de Cormantin.

16 November.—Resolutions of the conseil militaire of the army of Brittany.

Art. 2.—Danger of delay; requisitions of men and grains in force all through the province.

Art. 3.—Resolution not to act in a body till the English come. If only 12,000 men come, they shall be joined. Will protect their debarkation, but without the certainty of their coming at a given time will not rise.

Art. 4.—Three points of attack proposed. Vannes, St. Brien, St. Malo.

The first a false attack with a debarkation of 2,000 men. May be joined by 12,000 or 15,000 men, but say here only 7,000.

Royalists in Morbihan 8,000.

Real attack near St. Brien with a debarkation of 8,000 men. May be joined in twenty-four hours by 6,000 men, and the whole country would be with them.

No troops dans cette province.

Third attack at St. Malo with 2,000 émigrés. May be joined in twenty-four hours by 2,000 or 3,000 Royalists; and the latter would probably at that time be in possession of Chateauneuf.

Art. 5. During these attacks the Royalists in the interior will rise in ten or twelve different places, to occupy the attention of the few troops who are in the province.

Chiefs in Brittany to Puisaye.

7 December 1794.—They send Bourdonnaye and Allégre who will explain their plan. The spirit of the country improves, but the danger grows pressing.

Cormartin to Puisaye.

20 December.—Account of what has passed since his departure; successful endeavours to excite a general disposition in the province. He would not know the country again, the whole is with them.

Danger from moderantism, &c. the armistice* has produced des traitres.

They sent six weeks ago to press his return as above all things necessary. The cantons are pressed by Republican troops, and remain in a state of inactivity which it is at once difficult and dangerous to prolong. They sent dispatches by his aide-de-camp to press—1. his return. 2. the suspension of all partial debarkations. 3. not to send émigrés except in a body.

The Republicans are in great want of troops.

Seeing the urgency of the moment Cormartin meant to have come to England, with the determination of returning at the end of January; but the other chiefs would not agree to it. Urges his return.

Council of the Army of Brittany to Puisaye.

22 December.—Insist on his return and prompt succours. Send articles on which they press,

1 and 2. Puisaye's return, &c.

3. Immediate succours from England.

4. Cessation of partial debarkations.

5. Dufour's return.

6. Till the end of January the committee desire only one boat with our answer, and some pecuniary assistance. Puisaye should come in it.

7. Ditto.

8. Detail of succours asked.

1. A Prince of the blood of France.

2. The return of Puisaye.

3. The émigrés in mass.

4. All those in England to be obliged to come.

---

* Qy. amnesty, or does it mean the truce.—G.

5. The émigré corps raised by England.
6. The British army.
7. Arms, &c., and money.
8. Cannot wait longer. The first British corps to be of 12,000 men, who are to force a landing; but the Royalists could assist any such undertaking.
9. The signals, &c.

The remaining articles not material.

The Chiefs to Puisaye.

22 December 1794.—Danger of delay; no troops in the province; the people with them; absolute necessity of his return; must act immediately.

Cormartin to Puisaye.

25 December.—Difficulties of his personal situation. Refers to Dufour.

Pierrot to Puisaye.

28 December.—Uncertain state of things in the Republic. Inconvenience of his absence.

Invitations from the Representatives of the Convention, and the Republican general to Boishardy.

Solhilac and Pierrot go to Moncontour; are received by the aide-de-camp of General Humbert, and the commandant of the town with civility. Return in safety having delivered a letter from Boishardy for Humbert.

Boishardy and Cormartin are now with Humbert; wait to know the issue.

All this makes it necessary to lose no time in Puisaye's return and the British succours

Everything is still well disposed to them, but may change in a month.

They continue to chouaner in order to keep up the spirit. They have daily successes.

Refers to Dufour.

Report that Boisguy has surrendered to the Republicans with all his forces. Disbelieves this, but it has some foundation.

His defection would carry with it all that canton.

In the canton of M. ——— above twenty Chouans have surrendered.

Names of others who have made their peace; danger that this will spread.

Reports of armistice, and approaching peace in the Vendée.

Want of money very great.

Guerre des assignats alone would ruin the Republic.

Exorbitant price of everything.

In all the country from Vannes to Dinant money passes currently.

Cider sells from thirty to forty sols in assignats, and from three to four in money.

Their friends begin to murmur at Puisaye's absence.

This whole country is good, 15,000 fighting men might be drawn from it.*

---

* This is meant of the part where the writer is.—G.

[Cormartin] to Puisaye.

31 December.—Account of interview with Humbert.

Offers made by him; will see him again before they decide; a similar interview at Nantes between Charette and Canclaux. He is going there with a pass to learn the particulars, as they will regulate his conduct.

He adds in cipher, that he is determined never to surrender; and that he goes only to amuse the enemy, to deliver the letter from Puisaye to Canclaux, and to establish a correspondence with Charette.

December . . . . . to . . . . .

Successful endeavours to gain over that Canton.

Cannot reckon on more than fifty or sixty men; if he could stay a month there, could greatly increase this number.

Further details.

The spirit of the country excellent. There are troops in all the parishes, but little to fear, the number des coquins* being very small.

Suspicious from Puisaye's absence; danger of more delay.

† Theobalde to Puisaye.

2 January, 1795.—Perschaze has perished.

Prigeant is taken. Despatches which they had sent by Perschaze were very detailed. Presses Puisaye's return; some of their officers are taken; others have surrendered. The Rector of Maizière has betrayed them.

The country is well disposed, but no time is to be lost.

Chouannerie has succeeded very well, particularly in Boishardy's canton.

They have seen Humbert again who has renewed his solicitations to them to surrender.

Refers on this point to his cipher.

He and Solhilac are going to Nantes with a passport to know what Charette is doing, and mean to do the same. They supped with Humbert at Boishardy's house.

The Convention is alarmed at their force, and the Republican soldiers tired of the war.

During his journey there is to be a suspension of hostilities. Boishardy is gone to Moncontour with Humbert—danger of this. Urgency of immediate succours, loss of time, &c.

Details of officers, names, &c.

Assignats are at eighteen and twenty per cent., when compared with money.

They are in great want of money, for they can now do nothing with assignats.

Cormartin to Prince de Bouillon.

2 January 1795.—This letter contains the same points as the preceding letters, with no material variation.

N.B. 3 January 1795.—Agreement for an armistice between the army of Brittany and the Republicans.

The terms are very remarkable.

* Are these the troops? or the patriots in the parishes?

† This is plainly Cormartin. (Lord Grenville's Notes.)

It is to last till contrary orders are given, and eight days notice are to be given of its being broken off on either side.

Chantreau and Boishardy to Puisaye.

5 January 1795.—Press in the most urgent terms his immediate arrival.

Chantreau and Boishardy to Puisaye.

11 January 1795.—Necessity of his return. Very fortunate that the Republicans cannot hurt them in this moment, or they would be dissolved.

But from what the enemy has learnt from Prigeant, he will be enabled to take means for seizing them all.

Cormartin and Humbert are gone to Canclaux. The negotiation does not include the Morbihan, who are too scrupulous for it. Bourdonaye is good for nothing but to be a priest.

They learn from the Republicans that the whole department of Mayenne is in insurrection.

Advantage of seizing this opportunity.

Immense offers of the Republicans.

With money they could answer for the force armée des parages,* which he says is surprising, but proves the influence of their party.

They have all passports from the Republican generals, and eat with them when they choose.

Presses Puisaye's return, with arms and money.

Chantreau to Puisaye.

14 January 1795.—Bourdonnaye and his companions had despatches, but they have been obliged to tear them. Refers to their verbal accounts.

Charette has entered into conference with Canclaux; he demands that all his country should be restored to its former state. Stofflet refuses to listen to any terms; he fights like a devil.

These facts are certain, for they are in the despatches from Cormartin and Humbert.

He has received to-day a letter from Bollet the Représentative du Peuple, who is a bon et brave homme.

Boishardi and another are still in conference at Lamballe.

De Sorville to Puisaye.

19 January 1795.—Refers to Dufour.

Solhilac and he tried to get to the Vendée, but could not.

He and another have each taken the direction of a canton. His, though new, is much advanced.

He wants arms and ammunition; sends a list of articles.

Presses Puisaye's return; means of it. Never was the country better disposed. General discontent even among the troops.

L'énergie commence à devenir le caractère du peuple Breton. La chouannerie est devenue à la mode. Tout le monde s'en mêle. Les

Municipaux les plus enragés nous recherchent en demandant leur grace, et promettant de la mériter par leur conduite.

Assignats fall daily. They are at 10 per cent. With money they could have on their side almost all the troops; presses for money, arms, and ammunition.

Urgency of present succour rather than delaying it. Refers to the persons from Morbihan on the subject of the suspension of arms.

Great want of good officers to be sent, particularly those who speak Breton.

One letter from Boishardy, Solhilac and Torville, to Cormartin and Chantreau proposing an immediate explosion without waiting for England.

One from Boishardy, Chantreau, Solihac, and the other chiefs, to Puisaye, urging in the strongest terms the necessity of immediate assistance, and stating that without this is done immediately the Republicans will send troops, who will render a descent impossible.

They state the favourable disposition of the country, and the certainty of corrupting the Republican troops with money; and, on the other hand, the danger that, unless supplies are sent, the want of provisions will oblige 40,000 deserters who are in Brittany to return to the Republican army.

A STATE PAPER ON IRELAND.

[Without date, address, or signature, probably written in 1792.]—"I find it necessary not only in order to explain myself more clearly, but to collect and methodise my own thoughts on the subject of Ireland, to take up the consideration of the affairs of that kingdom from a very early period. I feel, at the same time, that I shall be inaccurate as well as prolix, for, excepting about six weeks in Lord Buckingham's Government, when a good deal of information on a few points was put into my hands, I have not for many years given any attention to the detail of Irish business, and I have not even the Statutes, and Journals of Parliament, the notes I have myself taken at different times, nor any other document by which I might correct what I write. The references, however, which I am obliged to make to former transactions are, for the most part, only used as illustrations of my opinions, and provided what I say makes my meaning clear, I shall think I have been sufficiently exact; especially as there is no danger of my misleading you, as to any particular fact, who are so much more fully acquainted than I can ever have been, not only with all the late transactions in Ireland, but with the real causes, and springs from whence they have been produced.

"Though the injustice and mischievous effects of the restraints which had been imposed by the British Parliament should be admitted; though the judicature arrogated by the English House of Lords should be considered as a manifest violence, and usurpation; both the one and the other had been suffered so long, the habits of the people were so moulded to them, and the security of so much property apparently depended upon an adherence to the same system, that it is more than probable the situation of affairs would have undergone no material change, if it had not been for what I have always considered to be an abuse of power, as wanton and corrupt, as it was mischievous and oppressive; and a long continuance of most improvident management; so that I have often thought the English interest in Ireland must have been preserved by a particular Providence, as it was scarcely possible to concert measures better calculated for its destruction.

"Ireland, it is well known, was governed not with an immediate view to the prosperity of its inhabitants, nor even to the augmentation of the general strength and greatness of the British empire, to which it was only remotely and indirectly contributory, by the monopoly which our merchants enjoyed of its trade. Under such a system, it became necessary to depress the political importance of the people. The national interest and that of Government were plainly in opposition to each other; and without examining the general policy of such a system, it must be allowed that the mode of administration was well calculated to maintain it. The operation of Poyning's Law had reduced the House of Lords to absolute insignificance. The business of Government was committed, in the House of Commons, to the Attorney General, a professional man; and the only person who appeared with any leading or consequence when the House of Lords were allowed to take a part, was the Chancellor, who was, upon a fixed principle, to be always an Englishman. No other situation to which either power or dignity was attached remained, so that the great men of the land were excluded from all share of executive as well as legislative authority. The House of Commons was constituted in such a manner as to have the least possible dependance upon the people. The right of election was confined to very few by the original constitution of the greater number of the boroughs, and, by the exclusion of Papists, reduced within still narrower bounds. The choice was for a long and indefinite time, the life of the member, or the King. The members of the Privy Council were nominated by the Crown, and removable at pleasure. The final judicature resided in England; the whole power of the Church was in the disposal of the Crown, and committed to the hands of Englishmen. There was revenue sufficient for all the necessary purposes of Government; the Civil Establishment was, in its nature, as little expensive as possible, and the system of policy such as to lead to its reduction rather than increase; the military was limited by a British Act of Parliament. There was even a great surplus of revenue, and a large sum of money in the Treasury at the disposal of the Crown. The commercial restraints must, when they were first imposed, have been felt as a cruel grievance, and occasioned the distress, and ruin of numbers. But, after they had been submitted to for such a course of years, and all the remaining industry of the kingdom had been confined to particular channels, there was no considerable body of men whose interest was immediately affected by them, and it was become in some degree the private interest of the bulk of the nation to concur with the views of Government. The North depended upon the linen manufacture, the South upon the provision trade; Great Britain was the principal market for both. A free trade, by increasing the general wealth and population of the country, might, in the end, be beneficial to the linen manufacturer and increase the demand for that article, but the markets already opened to him furnished a vent for more than he could supply, and the prospect of a contingent and very remote advantage could never have reconciled him to the immediate danger of Great Britain's shutting her ports against him, or even withdrawing the bounty. It was, besides, notorious that, notwithstanding the restraint, the country prospered exceedingly, and was improving rapidly. The taxes were moderate in themselves, and the limited expenses of Government called for no extraordinary supplies, so that there was as little to apprehend from the temper, as from the power of the people, which we have already seen was circumscribed in the strictest manner.

"When every national principle is excluded, and Government acts for a partial end, it will be the more exposed to the danger of its
